THE SEVENTH BOOK,

Beginning with the Reign of King HENRY the Eighth.

Anno

Notes formerly collected and repeated of things done in the time of K. Henry the seventh.

A Stouching the civil state and administration of the Commonwealth, and likewise of the state of the Church under the Reign of King Henry the Seventh; how he entred first into possession of the Crown: how the two Houses of York and Lancaster were in him conjoined through marriage with Elizabeth the eldest Daughter to King Edward the fourth, by the prudent counsel of John Morton then Bishop of Ely, after Archbishop of Canterbury, and Cardinal: how long the said King reigned, and what Persecution was in his time for lack of search and knowledge of God's Word, both in the Dioceses of Lincoln under Bishop Smith, (who was executor of the House of Braxen-Nose in Oxford) as also in the Dioceses of Coventry, and other places more: and further, what punishment and alteration God commonly sendeth upon Cities and Realms publick, for neglecting the safety of his Flock, sufficiently in the former Book hath been already specified; whereto many things more amply might have been added, incident in the Reign of this Prince, which we have for brevity pretermitted. For he that studieth to comprehend in story all things which the common course and use of life may offer to the Writer, may sooner find matter to occupy himself, than to profit others. Otherwile I might have inserted mention of the seditious Tumult of Perkin Warbeck, with his Retinue, Anno 1494. also of Blackheath-Field by the Blacksmith, Anno 1496. I might also have recited the glorious commendation of Georgius Lilius in his Latine Chronicle, testifying of King Henry the seventh, how he sent three Iohann Orators to Pope Julius the second, to yield his obedience to the See of Rome, An. 1506. And likewise how Pope Alexander the ninth, Pius the third, and Julius the second, sent to the said King Henry the seventh three sundry famous Embassadors, with three Swords, and three Caps of Maintenance, electing and admitting him to be the chief Defender of the Faith. The commendation of which fact, how glorious it is in the eyes of Georgius Lilius, and Fabian, that I leave to them. This I suppose, that when King Henry sent to Pope Julius three Orators with obedience, it be had

K. Hen. 8. sent him three thousand Harc ubuffers to furnish his Field against the French King fighting at Ravenna, he had pleased Pope Julius much better. If Georgius Lilius had been disposed to illustrate his story with notes, this had been more worthy the noting, how Lodowick 12. the French King, calling his Parliament, moved this question against Pope Julius. Whether a Pope might invade any Pounce by waslike force without cause? and whether the Prince might withdraw his obellence from that Pope or not? And it was concluded in the said Parliament with the King, against the Pope. Also it was concluded the same time (which was in the Reign of this King Henry the seventh) that the Pragmatical Sanction should be received in full force and effect through all the Realm of France.

And forasmuch as we are fallen into the mention of Georgius Lilius, this in him is to be found not unworthy noting. How after the burning of Thomas Norice above mentioned, at the City of Norwich, the same year followed such a Fire in Norwich, that the whole City well near was therewith consumed. Ex Georg. Lilio. Like as also after the burning of the foresaid good aged Father in Smithfield the same year (which was 1500) we read in the Chronicle of Fabian, a great Plague to fall upon the City of London, to the great destruction of the Inhabitants thereof. Wherein again is to be noted (as is aforesaid) that according to the state of the Church the disposition of the Commonwealth commonly is guided, either to be with adversity afflicted, or else in prosperity to flourish. But after these Notes of King Henry the seventh now to the Story of K. Henry the eighth.

This King Henry the seventh finishing his course in the year above-said, which was 1509, had by Elizabeth his Wife above-named, four Men-children, and of Women-children as many. Of whom three only survived, to wit, Prince Henry, Lady Margaret, and Lady Mary: Of whom King Henry the eighth succeeded after his Father; Lady Margaret was married to James the fourth, King of Scots; Lady Mary was affied to Charles King of Castile.

Not long before the death of King Henry, Prince Arthur his eldest Son had espoused Lady Katharine Daughter to Ferdinandus, being of the age of fifteen years, and the about the age of seventeen; and shortly after his marriage, within five months departed at Ludlow, and was buried at Worcester. After whose decease, the succession of the Crown fell next to King Henry the eighth, who being of the age of eighteen years, entered his Reign the year of our Lord 1509, and shortly after married with the foresaid Katharine, his late brother Prince Arthur's Wife to the end that her Dowry being great, should not be transported out of the Land. In the which his Marriage, being more politick than Scripture-like, he was dispensed with by Pope Julius, at the request of Ferdinandus her Father. The Reign of this King continued with great nobleness and fame the space of thirty eight years. During whole time and reign was great alteration of things, as well to the Civil state of the Realm, as especially to the state Ecclesiastical, and matters to the Church appertaining. For by him was extiled and abolished out of the Realm the usurped Power of the Bishop of Rome, Idolatry and Superstition somewhat repressed, Images and Pilgrimages defaced, Abbies and Monasteries pulled down, Sects of Religion rooted out, Scriptures reduced to the knowledge of the vulgar Tongue, and the state of the Church and Religion redressed. Concerning all which things, in the procees of this Volume here following, we will endeavour (Christ willing) particularly and in order to discourse; after that first we shall comprehend a few matters, which within the beginning of his Reign are to be noted and collected. Where, leaving off to write of Empton and Dudley, who in the time of King Henry the seventh, being great doers in executing the penal Laws over the People at that time, and purchasing thereby more malice than lands, with that which they had gotten were fit only after the entering of this King beheaded, the one a Knight, the other an Esquire: leaving also to intermeddle with his Wars, Triumphs, and other temporal Affairs, we mean in this Volume principally to bellow our travel in declaration of matters concerning most chiefly the state of the Church and of Religion, as well in this Church of England, as also of the whole Church of Rome.

Wherein first cometh to our hands a turbulent Tragedy, and a fierce Contention which long before had troubled the Church, and now this present year 1509 was renewed afresh between two certain Orders of Begging-Friars, to wit, the Dominick Friars and the Franciscans, about the conception of the Virgin Mary the Mother of Christ.

The Franciscans were they which did hold of St. Francis, and followed the rule of his Testament, commonly called Gray-Friars or Minorites. Their opinion was this, That the Virgin Mary, prevented by the grace of the Holy-Ghost, was so sanctified, that she was never subject one moment in her conception to original Sin. The Dominick Friars were they which holding of Dominick, were commonly called Black-Friars, or Preaching-Friars. Their opinion was this, That the Virgin Mary was conceived as all other children of Adam be: so that this Privilege only belongeth to Christ, to be conceived without original Sin: notwithstanding, the said blessed Virgin was sanctified in her Mother's womb, and purged from her original Sin, so as was John Baptist, Jeremy, or any other privileged Person. This frivolous question kindling and engendering between these two Sects of Friars, burst out into such a flame of parts and fides talking, that it occupied the Heads and Wits, Schools and Universities almost through the whole Church; some holding one part with Scotus, some the other part with Thomas Aquinas. The Minorites holding with Scotus their Master, disputed and concluded, That she was conceived without all spot or note of original Sin; and thereupon caused the Feast and Service of the Conception of St. Mary the Virgin to be celebrate and solemnized in the Church. Contrary, the Dominick Friars taking side with Aquinas, preached, That it was Heresy to affirm that the blessed Virgin was conceived without the guilt of original Sin; and that they which did celebrate the Feast of her Conception, or said any Masses thereof, did sin grievously and mortally.

In the mean time, as this Fanstasy waxed hot in the Church, the one side preaching against the other, came Pope Sixtus the fourth, Anno 1476, who joining side with the Minorites or Franciscans, first sent forth his Decree by authority Apostolick, willing, ordaining, and commanding all Men to solemnize this new-found Feast of the Conception in holy Church for evermore: offering to all Men and Women, which devoutly requesting the Church, would hear Mass and Service from the first Even-song of the said Feast, to the Octaves of the same, as many days of Pardon, as Pope Urban the fourth, and Pope Martin the fifth did grant for hearing the Service of Corpus Christi day, &c. And this Decree given and dated at Rome, Anno 1476.

Moreover, the same Pope, to the intent that the devotion of the People might be the more, encouraged to the celebration of this Conception, added a clause more to the Ave Maria, granting great indulgence and release of Sins to all such as would invoke the blessed Virgin with the same addition, saying thus: Ave Maria gratia plena, Dominus tecum, benedicta tu in mulieribus, & benedictus fructus ventris tui, Iesus Christus; & benedicta sit Anna mater tua, de qua sine macula, tua procreavit caro virginia. Amen. That is, 'Hail Mary' full of grace, the Lord is with thee, blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb, Jesus Christ: 'and blessed is Anna thy Mother, of whom thy Virgin's flesh hath proceeded without blot of original Sin. Amen.

Wherein thou mayest note (gentle Reader) for thy learning three things: First, how the Pope turneth that unproperly into a Prayer; which properly was sent of God for a message or tidings. Secondly, how the Pope addeth to the words of the Scripture, contrary to the express precept of the Lord. Thirdly, how the Pope exempteth Mary the blessed Virgin not only from the seed of Abraham and Adam, but also from the condition of a mortal creature. For if there be in her no original sin, then the beareth not the image of Adam, neither doth she defend of that feed, of whose feed evil proceedeth upon all men and women to condemnation, as St. Paul doth teach, Rom. 5. Wherefore if the defend of that feed, then the infection of original evil must necessarily proceed unto her. If the defend not thereof, then cometh the not of the seed of Abraham, nor of the seed of David, &c. Again, seeing that death is the effect and stipend of sin, by the doctrine of St. Paul, Rom. 6. then had her flesh injury by the Law, as Christ himself had, to suffer the malediction and punishment of death, and so should never have died, if original sin had no place in her, &c. But to return unto our Story: This constitution of the Pope being set forth for the conception of the blessed Virgin, which was the year of our Lord 1476, it was not long after but the said Pope Sixtus, perceiving that the Dominick Friars with their complices complices would not conform themselves hereunto, directed forth, by the authority Apotolical, a Bull in effect as followeth:

Sane cum sancta Romana Ecclesia de intererata sempiterna Virginis, &c. In English:

Whereas the holy Church of Rome hath ordained a special and proper Service for the publick solemnization of the Feast of the Conception of the blessed Virgin Mary; certain Orders of the Black-Friars in their publick Sermons to the People in divers places, have not ceased hitherto to preach, and yet daily do, that all they which hold or affirm the said glorious Virgin to have been conceived without original sin, be Hereticks; and they which celebrate the Service of the said her Conception, or do hear the Sermons of them which do so affirm, do sin grievously: Also not contented herewith, do write and set forth Books moreover, maintaining their assertions to the great offence and ruine of godly minds. We therefore to prevent and withstanding such presumptuous and perverse assertions which have risen, and more hereafter may arise, by such opinions and preachings aforesaid, in the minds of the faithful; by the authority Apotolical, do condemn and reprove the same; and by the motion, knowledge, and authority aforesaid, decree and ordain, That the Preachers of God's Word, and all other persons, of what state, degree, order, or condition soever they be, which shall presume to dare affirm or preach to the People these aforesaid opinions and assertions to be true, or shall read, hold, or maintain any such Books for true, having before intelligence hereof, shall incur thereby the sentence of Excommunication, from which they shall not be absolved otherwise than by the Bishop of Rome, except only in the time of death.

This Bull, being dated the year of our Lord 1483, gave no little heart and encouragement to the Gray-Friars Franciscans, which defended the pure conception of the holy Virgin against the Black Dominick Friars, with their confederates, holding the contrary side. By the vigour of which Bull, the Gray Order had got such a conquest of the Black Guard of the Dominicks, that the said Dominicks were compelled at length for a perpetual memorial of the Triumph, both to give to the glorious Virgin every night an Anthem in praise of her conception, and also to subscribe unto their doctrine; in which doctrine these with divers other points be contained.

1. That blessed Mary the Virgin suffered the griefs and adversities in this life, not for any necessity inflicted for punishment of original Sin, but only because she would conform her self to the imitation of Christ.

2. That the said Virgin, as she was not obliged to any punishment due for sin, as neither was Christ her Son; so she had no need of remission of Sins, but instead thereof had the divine preservation of God's help, keeping her from all sin, which grace only she needed, and also had it.

3. Item, That where the Body of the Virgin Mary was subject to death, and died; this is to be understood to come not for any penalty due for Sin, but either for imitation and conformity unto Christ, or else for the natural constitution her body, being elemental, as were the bodies of our first parents: who, if they had not tasted of the forbidden fruit, should have been preserved from death, not by nature, but by grace, and strength of other fruits and meats in Paradise: Which meats because Mary had not, but did eat our common meats, therefore she died, and not for any necessity of original sin. Clitoveus lib. 2. cap. 2.

4. The universal proposition of St. Paul, which saith, That the Scripture hath concluded all Men under Sin, is to be understood thus, as speaking of all them which be not exempted by the special privilege of God, as is the blessed Virgin Mary.

5. If Justification be taken for reconciliation of him that was righteous before, and now is made righteous: then the blessed Virgin is to be taken, not for justified by Christ, but just from her beginning by preservation.

6. If a Saviour be taken for him which saveth men fallen into perdition and condemnation; so is not Christ the Saviour of Mary, but is her Saviour only in this respect, for sustaining her from not falling into condemnation, &c.

7. Neither did the Virgin Mary give thanks to God, nor ought so to do, for expiation of her sins, but for her conservation from case of sinning.

8. Neither did she pray to God at any time for remission of her sins, but only for the remission of other mens sins the K.Hen. 8. prayed many times, and counted their sins for hers.

9. If the blessed Virgin had deceased before the passion of her Son, God would have repaid her soul not in the place among the Patriarchs, or amongst the Just, but in the same most pleasant place of Paradise where Adam and Eve were before they transgressed.

These were the dotting dreams and fantasies of the Franciscans, and of other Papists, commonly then holden in the Schools, written in their Books, preached in their Sermons, taught in their Churches, and set forth in Pictures. So that the People was taught nothing else almost in the Pulpits all this while, but how the Virgin Mary was conceived immaculate and holy, without original sin, and how they ought to call to her for help, whom they with special terms do call, The way of mercy, The mother of grace, The lover of piety, The comforter of mankind, The continual intercessor for the salvation of the faithful, and an advocate to the King her Son which never ceaseth, &c. Verba Papa Sexti in dicat. And altho the greatest number of the School-Doctors were of the contrary faction, as Peter Lombardus, Thomas Aquinas, Bernardus, Bonaventura, and others: yet these new Papists shifted off their objections with frivolous distinctions and blind evasions, as thus: Petrus Lombardus, they said, is not received nor holden in the Schools as touching this article, but is rejected. Clitoveus lib. 2. cap. 15.

Bernardus, in Epist. ad Lugdunens. altho he seemeth to deny the conception of the blessed Virgin to be void of original sin, saying, that he could not be holy when he was not, and lived not: to this they answer, That albeit he was not yet in essence, yet he was holy in her conception, and before conception, in the divine presence of God, which had chosen and pre-elected her before the worlds, to be the Mother of the Lord.

Again; Where Bernard doth argue, that she was not without original sin conceived, because she was not conceived by the Holy-Ghost: to this they answer, That the Holy-Ghost may work two ways in conception: either without company of Man, and so was Christ only conceived; or else with company and help of man, and thus was the blessed Virgin conceived. Clit. lib. 2. cap. 14.

Bonaventura (say they) was an holy Father, but he spake then after the custom and manner of his time, when as the solemnity and purity of this conception was not yet decreed nor received by the publick consent and authority of the Church: now seeing the authority of the Church of Rome hath established the same, it ought not to be contrariet, nor can, without dangerous disobedience. In all mens actions diligent respect of time must be had. That which bindeth not at one time, afterward the same by law being ratified, may bind at another. Ibid.

Finally, for the number and multitude on the contrary side, thus they answer for themselves, as we now in these our days likewise in defence of the Truth, may well answer against the Pope, and all his Popish Friars, turning their own weapons against themselves: Multitude, say they, ought not to move us: Victory consisteth not in number and heaps, but in fortitude and hearts of Souldiers; yea, rather fortitude and stomach cometh from heaven, and not of man. Judas Machabeus with a little bandial overthrew the great army of Antiochus. Strong Sampson with a poor Asses bone slew a thousand Philistines. David had no more but a silly sling, and a few stones, and with these strook down terrible Goliath the Giant, &c. Lib. eod. cap. 13.

With these and such other like reasons the Gray Franciscans voided their Adversaries, defending the conception of the Virgin Mary to be unblemished, and pure from all contagion of original Sin. Contrariwise, the Black-Guard of the Dominick Friars for their parts were not all mute, but laid husily from them again, having great authorities, and the Scripture on their side. But yet the other having the See Apotolical with them, had the better hand, and in fine got the victory triumphantly over the other, to the high exaltation of their Order. For Pope Sixtus (as I said) by the authority Apotolical, after he had decreed the conception-day of the Virgin perpetually to be sanctified, and also with his terrible Bull had condemned for Hereticks all them which withstood the same; the Dominick Friars, with authority oppressed, were driven to two inconveniences: the one was, to keep silence; the other was, to give place to their adversaries the Franciscans. Albeit, where the mouth Anno 1509. Whereupon it happened the same year of our Lord 1509, after this dissention between the Dominick Friars and the Franciscans, that certain of the Dominicks, thinking by subtil flight to work in the Peoples heads that which they durst not achieve with open preaching, devised a certain Image of the Virgin so artificially wrought, that the Friars by privy gins made it to stir, and to make gestures, to lament, to complain, to weep, to groan, and to give answers to them that asked; inasmuch that the People therewith were brought in a marvellous perfusion, till at length the fraud being eplied, the Friars were taken, condemned, and burnt at Bern the year above-mentioned, 1509. Ex Pencer. Schaft. Munsters, Carione, & alit. In the Centuries of John Bale I find their names to be, Joannes Vetter, Franciscus Vlisens, Stephanus Balizschoff, and Henricus Steinegger.

In the Story of John Stunfius, this Story aforesaid doth partly appear: but in the Registers and Records of the City of Bern, the order and circumstance thereof is more fully exprest and set forth, both in Metre and Prose, and is thus declared.

In the City of Bern there were certain Dominick Friars, to the number chiefly of four principal doers and chieftains of that Order, who had inveigled a certain simple poor Friar, who had newly planted himself in the Cloister: whom the foresaid Friars had to infatuated with fundry superstitions, and feigned apparitions of St. Mary, St. Barbara and St. Katharine, and with their incantments, and imprinting moreover in him the wounds of St. Francis, that he believed plainly, that the Virgin Mary had appeared to him, and had offered him a red Host consecrated, with the blood also of Christ miraculously; which blessed Virgin also had sent him to the Senators of Bern, with instructions, declaring unto them from the mouth of the Virgin, That she was conceived in sin; and that the Franciscan Friars were not to be credited, nor suffered in the City, which were not yet reformed from that erroneous opinion of her conception. He added moreover, That they should resort to a certain Image there of the Virgin Mary, (which Image the Friars by engines had made to sweat) and should do their worship, and make their oblations to the same. &c.

This feigned device was no sooner forged by the Friars, but it was believed of the Peoples; so that a great while theaged-coloured Host was undoubtedly taken for the true body and blood of Christ, and certain coloured drops thereof sent abroad to divers noble Personages and States for a great Relique, and that not without great recompence. Thus the deceived People in great numbers came flocking to the Image, and to the red Host, and coloured Blood, with manifold gifts and oblations. In brief, the Dominick Friars so had wrought the matter, and had so swept all the far to their own beads from the Order of the Franciscans, that all the Alms came to their box. The Franciscans seeing their estimation to decay, and their kit him to wax cold, and their paunches to be pinched, not able to abide that contumely, and being not ignorant or unacquainted with such counterfeited domes, (for as the Proverb saith, It is ill halting before a Cripple) effcoons espied their crafty juggling, and detected their fraudulent miracles. Whereupon the four chief Captains above-named were apprehended, and put to the fire, of whom the Provincial of that Order was one.

And thus much touching the beginning and end of this tumultuous and Popish Tragedy, wherein evidently it may appear to the Reader, how neither these turbulent Friars could agree among themselves, and yet in what frivolous trifles they wrangled together. But to let these ridiculous Friars pass with their trifling Phantasies, most worthy to be derided of all wise men: in the mean time this is to be lamented, to behold the miserable times of the Church, in which the Devil kept the minds of Christ's people so attentive and occupied in such fiery toys, that nothing else almost was taught or heard in the Church, but only the commendation and exaltation of the Virgin Mary: But of our justification by faith, of grace, and of the promises of God in Christ, of the strength of the Law, of the horror of Sin, of difference between the Law and the Gospel, of the true liberty of Conscience, &c. no mention or very little was heard. Wherefore in this so blind a time of darkness it was much needful and requisite, that the Lord of his mercy should look upon his Church, and send down his gracious Reformation, which also he did: For shortly upon the same, through the gracious excitation of God, came Martin Luther, of whom the order of his story now requireth we should, and will intreat, (Christ willing) after the story of Richard Hunne, and a few other things premised, for the better opening of the story to follow.

Mention was made sufficiently before of the doings of Pope Anno 1510. Julius, and of his warlike affairs, for which he was condemned, and not unjustly, in the Council of Thorne in France, Anno 1510, and yet all this could not affuage the furious affection of this Pope, but the same year he invaded the City of Matina and Mirandula in Italy, and took them by force of war. Which Pope Julius not long after, in the year of our Lord 1512, refusing peace offered by Maximilian the Emperor, was encountered by Lewis the French King about Ravenna, upon Easter-day, where he was vanquished, and had of his Army slain to the number of sixteen thousand, Ex Chron. Carion. And the year next following, Anno 1513, this Apostolical Warriour, which had reigned his keys unto the River of Tybris before, made an end together both of his fighting and living, after he had reigned and fought ten years. After whom succeeded next in the See of Rome, Pope Leo the tenth: about the compass of which time great mutations and stir began to work, as well in States Temporal, as especially in the State of the Church.

In the time of which Pope, Emperor, and Kings of England and of France, great alterations, troubles, and turns of Religion were wrought in the Church, by the mighty operation of God's hand, in Italy, France, Germany, England, and all Europe; such as have not been seen (alho much groaned for) many hundred years before: as in further discourse of this History (Christ willing) shall more manifestly appear.

But before we come to these alterations, taking the time as it lieth before us, we will first speak of Richard Hunne, and certain other godly-minded Persons here in England, afflicted for the Word of Christ's Gospel in great multitudes, as they be found and taken out of the Registers of Fitzjames Bishop of London, by the faithful help and industry of R. Carkis, Citizen of London.

The History of divers good Men and Women, persecuted for Religion in the City and Diocess of the Bishop of London; briefly extracted out of the Registers of Richard Fitzjames.

AMONGST and beside the great number of the faithful Martyrs and Professors of Christ, that constantly in the strength of the Holy-Ghost gave their lives for the testimony of his Truth, I find recorded in the Register of London, between the years of our Lord 1509 and 1517, the names of divers other persons, both Men and Women, who in the fulness of that dark and misty time of Ignorance had also some portion of God's good Spirit, which induced them to the knowledge of his Truth and Gospel, and were diversly troubled, persecuted, and imprisoned for the same: notwithstanding by the proud, cruel, and bloody rage of the Catholic Seat, and through the weakness and frailty of their own nature, (not then fully strengthened in God) it was again in them for the time suppressed and kept under, as appeareth by their several abjurations made before Richard Fitzjames, then Bishop of London, (in his time a most cruel Persecutor of Christ's Church) or else before his Vicar-general deputed for the same. And forasmuch as many of the Adversaries of God's Truth have of late days diddantly and braggingly cried out, and made demands in their public Assemblies, and yet do, asking, Where this our Church and Religion was within three hity or sixty years? I have thought it not altogether vain, somewhat to stop such lying crackers, both by mentioning their names, and likewise opening some of the the chief and principal matters for which they were so unmercifully afflicted and molested: thereby to give to understand, as well the continuance and consent of the true Church of Christ in that age, touching the chief points of our Faith, tho' not in like perfection of knowledge and constancy in all: as also by the way something to touch what fond and frivolous matters the ignorant Prelates shamed not in that time of blindness to object against the poor and simple people, accounting them as heinous and great offences, yea, such as deserved death both of body and soul. But lest I should seem too prolix and tedious herein, I will now briefly proceed with the story, and first begin with their names, which are these:

	Thomas Vincent.

Here followeth the particular Examination of all these here above named.

To these were divers and sundry particular Articles (besides the common and general for customably used in such cases) privately objected, even such as they were then accused of either by their Curate, or other their Neighbours. And because I think it somewhat superfluous to make any large recital of all and every part of their several Proceedings, I mind therefore briefly only to touch so many of their Articles, as may be sufficient to induce the Christian Reader to judge the sooner of the rest, being (I assure you) of no greater importance than these that follow: except that sometime they were charged most scandalously with horrible and blasphemous Lies against the Majesty and Truth of God; which as they utterly denied, so do I now for this present keep secret in silence, as well for brevities sake, as also somewhat to colour and hide the shameful practices of that lying Generation. But to our purpose.

Joan Baker.

Against worshipping of the Crucifix or Cross.

Testimony for the Lady Yvonne, Martyr.

William Pottier.
False slander of the Advocates.

Answer.

The chiefest Objection against Joan Baker was, That she would not only her self not reverence the Crucifix, but had also persuaded a Friend of hers lying at the point of death, not to put any trust or confidence in the Crucifix, but in God which is in Heaven, who only worketh all the miracles that be done, and not the dead Images, which be but stocks and stones; and therefore she was sorry that ever she had gone so often on pilgrimage to St. Saviour and other Idols. Also, that she did hold opinion that the Pope had no power to give pardons, and that the Lady Tong (who was not long before that time burned) died a true Martyr of God; and therefore the wildest of God, that she her self might do no worse than the said Lady Tong had done.

Unto William Pottier, besides divers other false and slanderous Articles, (as that he should deny the benefit and effect of Christ's Passion) it was also alleged, That he should affirm there were six Gods: the first three was the holy Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy-Ghost; the fourth was a Priest's Concubine being kept in his chamber; the fifth was the Devil; and the sixth, that thing that a Man setteth his mind most upon.

The first part of this Article he utterly denied, confessing most firmly and truly, the blessed Trinity to be only one God in one unity of Deity. As to the other three he answered, That K. Hen. 8. a Priest delighting in his Concubine, made her as his God: Likewise a wicked Person, persisting in his sin without repentance, made the Devil his God. And lastly, he granted, that he once hearing of certain Men, which by the singing and chattering of Birds would seek to know what things were to come either to themselves or others, said, that these Men esteemed their Birds as Gods; and otherwise he spake not.

Amongst the manifold and several Articles objected against Thomas Goodred, Thomas Walker, Thomas Forge, Alice Forge his Wife, John Forge their Son, John Calverton, John Woodroff, Richard Woolman, and Roger Hilliar, (as that they should speak against Pilgrimages, praying unto Saints, and such like) this principally was propounded, That they all denied the carnal and corporal presence of Christ's body and blood in the Sacrament of the Altar; and further, had concealed and consented unto their Teachers and Instructors in that Doctrine, and had not, according to the Laws of the Church, accused and presented them unto the Bishop or his Ordinary. Also great and heinous displeasure was conceived against Richard Woolman, for that he termed the Church of Pauls a House of Thieves, affirming, that the Priests and other Ecclesiastical Persons there were not liberal givers unto the poor (as they ought) but rather takers away from them what they could get.

Likewise as Thomas Ausly, Joan Ausly his Wife, Thomas Grant, John Garter, Christopher Ravins, Dyonise Ravins his Sister, Thomas Vincent, Lewis John, Joan John his Wife, and John Web, were of one fellowship and profession of Faith with divers of the last before recited; so were they almost all apprehended about one time, and chiefly burthened with one opinion of the Sacrament. Which declareth evidently, that notwithstanding the dark ignorance of those corrupted times, yet God did ever in mercy open the eyes of some to behold the manifest truth, even in those times whereof the Papists make now greatest vaunt, and brag of longest continuance. Furthermore, many of them were charged to have spoken against Pilgrimages, and to have read and used certain English Books repugning the Faith of the Romish Church, as the four Evangelists, Wickliff, Wicket, a Book of the Ten Commandments of Almighty God, the Revelation of St. John, the Epistles of Paul and James, with other like, which those holy ones could never abide: and good cause why; for as darkness could never agree with light, no more can ignorance, the maintainer of that Kingdom, with the true knowledge of Christ and his Gospel.

It was further particularly objected against Joan John, the Wife of Lewis John, That (besides the premises) she learned and maintained, that God commanded no Holy-days to be kept, but only the Sabbath-day, and therefore she would keep none but it; nor any Falling-days, affirming, that to fast from sin was the true Fast. Moreover, that she had despised the Pope, his pardons and pilgrimages; inasmuch that when any poor body asked an alms of her in the worship of the Lady of Walsingham, she would straight answer in contempt of the pilgrimage, The Lady of Walsingham help thee: and if she gave any thing unto him, she would then say, Take this in the worship of our Lady in Heaven, and let the other go. Which declareth, that for lack of better instruction and knowledge, she yet ignorantly attributed too much honour to the true Saints of God departed, the otherwise she did abhor the idolatrous worshipping of the dead Images. By which example, as also by many others (for shortness sake at this present omitted) I have put occasion to condemn the wilful subtilty of those, that in this bright shining light of God's truth, would yet under colour of godly remembrance, still maintain the having of Images in the Church, craftily excusing their idolatrous kneeling and praying unto them, by affirming, that they never worshipped the dead Images, but the things that the Images did represent. But if that were their only doctrine and cause of having of them, why then would their predecessors so cruelly compel these poor simple people thus openly in their recantations to abjure and revoke their speaking against the gross adoration of the outward Images only, and not against the thing represented, which many of them (as appeareth partly by this example) in their ignorant simplicity confessed might be worshipped? Howbeit, God be thanked, (who ever in his mercy continue it) their colourable and hypocritical excuses cannot now take such place in the hearts of the Elect

William Couper and his Wife.

IT was alleged against William Couper, and Alice Couper his Wife, that they had spoken against Pilgrimages, and worshipping of Images: but chiefly the Woman, who having her child on a time hurt by falling into a pit or ditch, and earnestly persued by some of her ignorant Neighbours to go on pilgrimage to St. Laurence, for help of her child, said, That neither St. Laurence, nor any other Saint could help her child, and therefore none ought to go on Pilgrimage to any Image made with Man's hand, but only to Almighty God; for Pilgrimages were nothing worth, saving to make the Priests rich. Vide supra inferius.

John Houshold, &c.

Unto John Houshold, Robert Raschal, and Elizabeth Stamford, as well the Article against the Sacrament of the Altar was objected, as also that they had spoken against praying to Saints, and had despised the authority of the Bishop of Rome, and others of his Clergy. But especially John Houshold was charged to have called them Antichrists and Whoremongers, and the Pope himself a strong Strumpet, and a common Baud unto the World, who with his Pardons had drowned in blindness all Christian Realms, and that for money.

George Browne.

Also among divers other ordinary Articles propounded against George Browne, these were counted very hainous and heretical: First, that he had said, that he knew no cause why the Crofs should be worshipped, seeing that the same was an hurt and pain unto our Saviour Christ in the time of his passion, and not any ease or pleasure; alledging for example, that if he had had a Friend hanged or drowned, he would ever after have loved that Gallows or Water, by the which his Friend died, rather worse for that than better. Another Objection was, That he had erroneously, obstinately, and maliciously said, (for so are their words) That the Church was too rich. This matter, I may tell you, touched somewhat the quick, and therefore no marvel tho they counted it erroneous and malicious; for take away their Gain, and fawered their Religion. They also charged him to have refused holy Water to be caft about his chamber, and likewise to have spoken against Priests, with other vain matters.

John Wikes.

The greatest matter wherewith they burthened John Wikes was, That he had often and of long time kept company with divers persons suspected of Heresy, (as they termed them) and had received them into his House, and there did suffer and hear them sundry times read erroneous and heretical Books, contrary to the Faith of the Romish Church; and did also himself consent unto their Doctrine, and had many times secretly conveyed them from the taking of such as were appointed to apprehend them.

To Southlake, Richard Butler, &c.

Like as the greatest number of those before mentioned, so were also John Southlake, Richard Butler, John Sam. William King, Robert Durdant, and Henry Woolman, especially charged with speaking words against the real presence of Christ's body in the Sacrament of the Altar, and also against Images, and the rest of the seven Sacraments. Howbeit they burthened the last five persons with the reading of certain English Heretical Books, accounting most blasphemously the Gospel of Jesus Christ, written by the four Evangelists, to be of that number, as appeareth evidently by the eighth Article objected by Thomas Bennet Doctor of Law, Chancellor and Vicar-general unto Richard Fitzjames then Bishop of London, against the said Richard Butler, the very words of which Article, for a more declaration of truth, I have thought good here to infer, which are these: Alls we object to you, that divers times, and especially upon a certain Night, about the space of three years last past, in Robert Durdant's House of Yver-Court near unto Stanes, you erroneously and damably read in a great Book of Heresy of the said Robert Durdant's, all that same Night, certain Chapters of the Evangelists in English, containing in them divers erroneous and damnable opinions and conclusions of Heresy, in the presence of the said Robert Durdant, John Butler, Robert Carder, Jenkin Butler, William King, and divers other suspected Persons of Heresy, then being present, and bearing your said erroneous Lectures and Opinions. To the same effect and purpose tended the tenor of some of the Articles propounded against the other four. Whereby (as also by others like before specified) we may easily judge what reverence they, which yet will be counted the true and only Church of Christ, did bear to the Word and Gospel of Christ, who shamed not to blaspheme the same with most horrible titles of erroneous and damnable opinions and conclusions of Heresy. But why should we marvel thereat, seeing the Holy-Ghost in sundry places of the Scripture doth declare, that in the latter days there should come such proud and cursed speakers, which shall speak lies through hypocrisy, and have their Consciences marked with an hot Iron? Let us therefore now thank our heavenly Father for revealing them unto us; and let us also pray him, that of his free mercies in his Son Christ Jesus, he would (if it be to his glory) either turn and mollify all such hearts, or else (for the peace and quietness of his Church) he would in his righteous judgment take them from us.

About this time Richard Fitzjames ended his life, after whole death Cuthbert Tunfall (afterward Bishop of Durham) succeeded in the See and Bishoprick of London; who soon upon his first entry into the room, minding to follow rightly the footsteps of his Predecessor, caused Edmund Spelman, Priest, Henry Chambers, John Higgins, and Thomas Egglestone to be apprehended, and so to be examined upon sundry like Articles as before are expressed; and in the end, either for fear of his cruelty, and the rigor of death, or else through hope of his flattering promises, (such was their weakness) he compelled them to abjure and renounce their true professed Faith touching the holy Sacrament of Christ's Body and Blood, which was, That Christ's corporal Body was not in the Sacrament, but in Heaven; and that the Sacrament was a figure of his Body, and not the Body itself.

The death of Rich. Fitzjames, Bishop of London. Cuthbert Tunfall, Bishop of London.

The real presence denied.

Moreover, about the same time there were certain Articles objected against John Higges, alias Nike, alias Johnson, by the said Bishop's Vicar-general, amongst which were these: First, That he had affirmed, that it was as lawful for a temporal Man to have two Wives at once, as for a Priest to have two Benefices. Also, that he had in his custody a Book of the four Evangelists in English, and did often read therein: and that he favoured the Doctrines and Opinions of Martin Luther, openly pronouncing, that Luther had more learning in his little finger, than all the Doctors in England in their whole bodies; and that all the Priests in the Church were blind, and had led the People the wrong way. Likewise it was alleged against him, that he had denied Purgatory, and had said, that while he was alive he would do as much for himself as he could, for after his death he thought that Prayers and Alms-deeds could little help him.

Against a Priest to have two Benefices.

Testimony touching Martin Luther.

These and such like matters were they wherewith these poor and simple Men and Women were chiefly charged, and as hainous Heretics excommunicated, imprisoned, and at last compelled to recant: and some of them in utter shame and reproach (besides the ordinary bearing of faggots before the Crofs in Procession, or else at a Sermon) were enjoined for a penance (as they termed it) as well to appear once every year before their Ordinary, as also to wear the sign of a faggot painted upon their sleeves, or other part of their outward garment, and that during all their lives, or so often and long as it pleased their Ordinary to appoint. By which long, rigorous and open punishing of them, they meant (as it should seem) utterly to terrify and keep back all others from the true knowledge of Jesus Christ and his Gospel. But the Lord be evermore praised, what effect their wicked purposes therein have taken, these our most light-forn days of God's glorious Gospel do most joyfully declare.

There were also troubled, besides these, certain others more simple and ignorant, who, having but a very small smack or taste of the Truth, did yet at the first (as it may seem) gladly consent unto the same; but being apprehended, they quickly again yielded, and therefore had only assigned them for their penance, the bearing of a little candle before the Crofs, without any further open abjuring or recanting. Amongst which I find two especially: the one a Woman, called Ellen Hoyer, to whom it was objected, That she had neither confessed her self unto the Priest, nor yet received the Sacrament of the Altar by the space of four years, years, and notwithstanding had yearly eaten flesh at Easter, and after, as well as others that had received the same, contrary to the usual manner and conversation of all other Christian People.

The other was a Man named Robert Berkway, who (besides most wicked blasphemies against God, which he utterly denied) was charged to have spoken heinous words against the Popes holy and blessed Martyr, Thomas Becket, calling him Micher and Thief, for that he wrought by crafts and imaginations.

Thus have I, as briefly as I could, summarily collected the principal Articles objected against these weak, infirm, and earthly Vessels; not minding hereby to excuse or condemn them in these their fearful falls and dangerous defections, but leaving them unto the unmeasurable rich mercies of the Lord. I thought only to make manifest the unsatisfiable bloody Cruelty of the Popes Kingdom against the Gospel and true Church of Christ, nothing mitigating their envious rage, no, not against the very simple Idiots, and that sometimes in most frivolous and irreligious cases. But now leaving to say any further herein, I will (by God's grace) go forward with other somewhat more serious matters.

The Death and Martyrdom of William Sweeting, and John Brewster.

Wm. Sweeting, John Brewster, Martyrs.

IN searching and perusing of the Register, for the collection of the Names and Articles before recited, I find that within the compass of the same years there were also some others, who after they had once flattered themselves as frail and unconstant as the reft, (being either therewith pricked in conscience, or otherwise zealously overcome with the manifest truth of God's most sacred Word) became yet again as earnest professors of Christ as ever they were before, and for the same profession were the second time apprehended, examined, condemned, and in the end were most cruelly burned. Of which number were William Sweeting, and John Brewster, who were both burned together in Smithfield the eighteenth day of October, in the year of our Lord 1511. The chiefest case of Religion alleged against them in their Articles, was their faith concerning the Sacrament of Christ's Body and Blood, which because it differed from the absurd, gross, and Capernaical opinion of the new Schoolmen, was counted as most heinous Heresy. There were other things besides objected against them, as the reading of certain forbidden Books, and accompanying with such persons as were suspected of Heresy. But one great and heinous offence counted amongst the rest, was their putting and leaving off the painted faggots, which they were at their first abjuring enjoined to wear as badges during their lives, or so long as it should please their Ordinary to appoint, and not to leave them off upon pain of relapse, until they were dispensed withal for the same. The breach of this injunction was esteemed to be of no small weight, and yet the matter well and thoroughly considered, it seemeth by their confessions, they were both therewith by necessity enforced.

Against transubstantiation and corporal presence in the Sacrament.

The cruel rigour of the Catholic Clergy against the professors of the Gospel.

For the one, named Sweeting, being for fear of the Bishop's cruelty constrained to wander the Countries to get his poor living, came at length unto Calcester, where by the Parson of the Parish of Mary Magdalen, he was provoked to be the Holy-Water Clerk, and in that consideration had that infamous badge first taken away from him. The other (which was Brewster) left off his at the commandment of the Controller of the Earl of Oxford's House, who hiring the poor Man to labour in the Earl's household-business, would not suffer him working there to wear that counterfeit cognizance any longer. So that (as I said) necessity of living seemeth to compell both of them at the first to break that injunction: and therefore if Charity had born as great sway in the hearts of the Popes Clergy, as did Cruelty, this trifle would not have been so heinously taken, as to be brought against them for an Article, and cause of condemnation to death. But where tyranny once taketh place, as well all godly love, as all humane reason and duties are quite forgotten. Well, to be short, what for the causes before recited, as also for that they had once already abjured, and yet (as they term it) fell again into relapse, they were both (as you have heard) in the end burned together in Smithfield; altho the same parties (as the Register recordeth) did again before their death fearfully forsake their former revived constancy, and submitting themselves unto the discipline of the Romish

Church, craved absolution from their excommunication. K. Hen. 8. Howbeit, because many of the Registers notes and records in such cases may rightly be doubted of, and so called into question, I refer the certain knowledge thereof unto the Lord, (who is the trier of all truths) and the external judgment unto the godly and discreet Reader: Not forgetting yet by the way (if that the report should be true) upon so just an occasion, to charge that Catholic Clergy, and their wicked Laws, with a more shameless tyranny and uncharitable cruelty than before: for if they nothing flay their bloody malice towards such as so willingly submit themselves unto their cruelties; what favour may the faithful and constant professors of Christ look for at their hands? I might here also ask of them, how they follow the pitiful and loving admonition (or rather precept) of our Saviour Christ, (whose true and only Church they so stoutly brag to be) who in the seventeenth chapter of St. Luke saith, Thou thy brother sin against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn to thee, saying, It repenteth me; thou shalt forgive him. But what go I about to allure them unto the following of the Rule and Counsel of him, unto whose Word and Gospel they seem most open and utter enemies? Wherefore not purposing to flay any longer thereupon, but leaving them unto the righteous revengement of the Lord, let us now hereunto adjoin the story of one John Browne, a good Martyr of the Lord, burnt at Alford about this fourth year of King Henry the eighth, whose story hereunder followeth.

No mercy in the Popes Court.

John Browne, Father to Richard Browne, which Richard was in Prison in Canterbury, and should have been burned, with two more besides himself, the next day after the death of Queen Mary, but by the proclaiming of Queen Elizabeth they escaped.

THE occasion of the first trouble of this John Browne, was by a Priest sitting in Gravesend-Barge. John Browne, being the same time in the Barge, came and fate hard by him; whereupon, after certain communication, the Priest asked him; Dost thou know, said he, who I am? thou fittest too near me, thou fittest on my clothes: No, Sir, said he, I know not what you are. I tell thee I am a Priest. What, Sir, are you a Parson, or Vicar, or a Lady's Chaplain? No, quoth he again, I am a Soul-Priest, I sing for a Soul, saith he. Do you so, Sir, quoth the other, that is well-done; I pray you Sir, quoth he, where find you the Soul when you go to Mass? I cannot tell thee, said the Priest. I pray you, where do you leave it, Sir, when the Mass is done? I cannot tell thee, said the Priest. Neither can you tell where you find it when you go to Mass, nor where you leave it when the Mass is done, how can you then save the Soul? said he. Go thy ways, said the Priest, thou art an Heretic, and I will be even with thee. So at the landing, the Priest taking with him Walter More, and William More, two Gentlemen Brethren, rode straightways to the Archbishop Warham; whereupon the said John Browne within three days after, his Wife being churched the same day, and he bringing in a Mef of Portage to the Board to his Guests, was sent for, and his feet bound under his own horse, and so brought up to Canterbury, neither his Wife, nor he, nor any of his, knowing whether he went, nor whither he should; and there continuing from Low-Sunday, till the Friday before Whitunday, his Wife not knowing all this while where he was; he was let in the stocks overnight, and on the morrow went to death, and was burnt at Alford, Anno 1517. The same night, as he was in the stocks at Alford where he and his Wife dwelt, his Wife then hearing of him, came and fate by him all the night before he should be burned: to whom he declaring the whole story how he was handled, flattered and told, how that he could not let his feet to the ground, for they were burned to the bones; and told her, how by the two Bishops Warham and Fisher, his feet were heat upon the hot coals, and burned to the bones, to make me, said he, to deny my Lord, which I will never do; for if I should deny my Lord in this world, he would hereafter deny me. I pray thee, said he, therefore, good Elizabeth, continue as thou hast begun, and bring up thy children veruouly in the fear of God. And so the next day on Whitunday Even, this godly Martyr was burned. Standing at the Stake, this Prayer he made, holding up his hands:

John Browne burned at Alford about the fifth year of King Henry 8.

Chilton of Weymouth being arrested, and one Beare of Wilkesborough, with two of the Bishops servants, let him upon the horse, and so carried him away.

K. Hen. 8.

O Lord, I yield me to thy Grace,
Grant me mercy for my Trespases;
Let never the Fiend my Soul chase.
Lord, I will bow, and thou shalt beat,
Let never my Soul come in Hell-beat.

Into thy hands I commend my Spirit; thou hast redeemed me, O Lord of Truth.

And so he ended.

children also, for they would spring (said he) of his ashes.

This blessed Martyr, John Browne, had born a faggot seven years before, in the days of King Henry the seventh.

As it is the property of Satan ever to malign the propo-ritous estate of the Saints of God, and true professors of Christ; so cease he not continually to stir up his wicked members to the effectual accomplishing of that which his envious nature so greedily delireth; if not always openly by colour of tyrannical Laws, yet at leastwise by some sub-til practice of secret Murther. Which thing doth most plainly appear, not only in a great number of the blessed Martyrs of Christ's Church mentioned in this Book, but also and especially in the discourse of this lamentable History that now I have in hand, concerning the secret and cruel murthering of Richard Hunne, whose Story here consequently enfueth, deceived and collected partly out of the Registers of London, partly out of a Bill exhibited and denounced in the Parliament-house.

The Story of Richard Hunne.

Richard Hunne
Martyr.

Here was in the year of our Lord 1514, one Richard Hunne, Merchant-Tailor, dwelling within the City of London, and Freeman of the same, who was esteemed during his life, and worthily reputed, and taken not only for a Man of true dealing and good substance, but also for a good Catholic Man. This Richard Hunne had a child at nurse in Middlesex, in the Parish of St. Mary Masfilon, which died; by the occasion whereof one Thomas Dryfield Clerk, being Parson of the said Parish, sued the said Richard Hunne in the Spiritual Court for a bearing-Sheet, which the said Thomas Dryfield claimed unjustly to have of the said Hunne, for a Mortuary for Stephen Hunne, Son of the said Richard Hunne, which Stephen being at nurse in the said Parish, died, being of the age of five weeks, and not above Hunne answered him again, That forasmuch as the Child had no propriety in the Sheet, he therefore neither would pay it, nor the other ought to have it.

Whereupon the Priest, moved with a covetous desire, and loth to lose his pretended Right, assented him to appear in the Spiritual Court, there to answer the matter. Whereupon the said Richard Hunne being troubled in the Spiritual Court, was forced to seek counsel of the learned in the Law of this Land, and pursued a Writ of Premunire against the said Thomas Dryfield, and other his Aiders, Counsellors, Proctors, and Adherents, as by the process thereof is yet to be seen. Which when the rest of the Priestly Order heard of, greatly disdainning that any Layman should so boldly enterprize such a matter against any of them, and fearing also, that if they should now suffer this Priest to be condemned at the suit of Hunne, there would be thereby ever after a liberty opened unto all others of the Laity to do the like with the rest of the Clergy in such like cases; they straightways, both to stop this matter, and also to be revenge of him for that he had already done, sought all means they possibly could how to intrap and bring him within the danger of their own cruel Laws. And thereupon making secret and diligent Inquisition, and seeking all comers they could against him, at length they found a means how to accuse him of Heresy unto Richard Fitz-james then Bishop of London, and so did, who (desirous to satisfy the revenging and bloody affection of his Chaplains) caused him thereupon to be apprehended and committed unto prison within the Lollards Tower at Pauls, so that none of his friends might be suffered to come to him.

The Defen-

lics to be

Rich Hunne came tried in Lollards Tower.

This Richard Hunne being clapt in the Lollards Tower, shortly after, at the earnest instigation of Dr. Horsley, the Bishop's Chancellor, (a Man more ready to prefer the Clergies cruel tyranny, than the truth of Christ's Gospel) was brought before the Bishop at his Manor of Fulham, the 2d day of December, in the year before mentioned, where within his Chappel he examined him upon these Articles following, collected against him by the said Horsley and his Complices:

First, that he had read, taught, preached, published, and obstinately defended, against the Laws of Almighty God, that Tithes, or paying of Tithes, was never ordained to be due, saving only by the Covetousness of Priests.

The Articles objected against Rich-
Hunne.

2. Item, That he had read, taught, preached, published, and obstinately defended, that Bishops and Priests be the Scribes and Pharisees that did crucify Christ, and damned him to death.

3. Item, That he had read, taught, preached, &c. That Bishops and Priests be teachers and preachers, but no doers, neither fulfillers of the Law of God, but catching, ravening, and all things taking, and nothing ministring, neither giving.

4. Item, Where and when one Joan Baker was detected and abjured of many great Heretics, (as it appeareth by her Abjuration) the said Richard Hunne said, published, taught, preached, and obstinately took upon him, saying, That he would defend her and her opinions, if it cost him five hundred Markes.

5. Item, Afterwards (where and when the said Joan Baker, after her Abjuration, was enjoined open Penance according to her demerits) the said Richard Hunne said, published, taught, and obstinately did defend her, saying, The Bishop of London and his Officers have done open wrong to the said Joan Baker, in punishing her for Heresy; for her sayings and opinions be according to the Laws of God:
wherefore the Bishop and his Officers are more worthy to be punished for Heresy than she is.

6. Item, That the said Richard Hunne hath in his keeping divers English Books prohibited and damned by the Law; as the Apocalypse in English, Epistles and Gospels in English, Wickliffs damnable Works, and other Books containing infinite Errors, in the which he hath been a long time accustomed to read, teach, and study daily.

Particular Answer unto these several Objections in the Register I find none, saving that next under them there is written in his name, with a contrary hand, these words following: As touching these Articles, I have not spoken them as they be here laid; howbeit unadvisedly I have spoken Words somewhat founding to the same, for the which I am sorry, and ask God mercy, and submit me to my Lord's charitable and favourable Correction. Which they affirm to be written with Hunne's own hand: but how likely to truth that is, let the discreet wisdom of the Reader indiferently judge by the whole sequel of this Process. And further, if it were his own act, what occasion then had they so cruelly to murder him as they did? seeing he had already so willingly confessed his fault, and submitted himself to the charitable and favourable correction of the Bishop, (for the which, even by their own Law, in cases of most heinous Heresy, he ought to be again received and pardoned) except perhaps they will account horrible Murther to be but the Bishop's favourable correction. Against it seems they had very few credible witnesses to prove certainly that this was his Answer and Hand-writing; for the Register, or some other for him, appointed to record the same, hath certified it as of hear-say from others, and not of his own proper light and knowledge, as the words noted in the margin of the Book, adjoining to the fore said Answer, plainly do declare, which are these; Hoc fuit scriptum manu propria Ricardi Hunne, ut dicitur. Now if he had any sure ground to stablish this Certificate, I doubt not but he would instead of ut dicitur, have registered the names of the Assitants at the time of his examination, (which he confesseth to be many) as generally they do in all their Acts, especially in cases of Heresy, as they term it. But how scrupulous those good fellows that spared not so shamefully to murder him, would be to make a lie of him that was already dead, let, as I said, the indifferent judgment of the godly wife discern.

again the same day unto the Lollards Tower; and then, by the appointment of Dr. Horsley, his Chancellor, he was colourably committed from the custody of Charles Joseph the Sumner, unto John Spalding the Bell-ringer, a Man by whose simpleness in wit (tho otherwise wicked) the subtil Chancellor thought to bring his devillish pretended Homicide the easier to pass; which most cruelly he did, by his Ministers suborned, within two nights next then following accomplished, as is plainly proved hereafter, by the diligent Enquiry, and final Verdict of the Coroner of London and his Inquest, made by order of the Laws in that behalf limited. But when this usual practice of the Papists was once accomplished, there wanted then no secret shifts nor worldly-wiles for the crafty colouring of this mischief: and therefore the next morning after they had in the night committed this Murder, Spalding (I doubt not but by the counsel of his Master Chancellor) gat himself out of the way into the City, and leaving the Keys of the Prison with one of his fellows, willed him to deliver them unto the Sumners boy which customably did use to carry Hunne his meat and other necessities that he needed; thinking that the boy, first finding the prisoner dead, and hanged in such sort as they left him, they might by his relation be thought free from any suspicion of this matter. Which thing happened in the beginning almost as they willed. For the Boy the same morning (being the fourth day of December) having the keys delivered him, accompanied with two other of the Bishop's Sumners, went about ten of the Clock into the Prison, to serve the Prisoner as he was wont to do; and when they came up, they found him hanged with his face towards the wall. Whereupon they (astonished at this sight) gave knowledge thereof immediately unto the Chancellor, being then in the Church, and watching, I suppose, of purpose for such News, who forthwith got unto him certain of his Colleagues, and went with them into the Prison, to see that which his own wicked Conscience knew full well before, as was afterwards plainly proved, altho then he made a fair face to the contrary, blazing abroad among the People by their Officers and Servants, that Hunne had desperately hanged himself. Howbeit the People having good experience as well of the honest life and godly conversation of the Man, as also of the devillish malice of his Adversaries the Priests, judged rather, that by their procurement he was secretly murdered. Whereof arose great contention; for the Bishop of London on the one side, taking his Clergies part, affirmed stoutly that that Hunne had hanged himself: The Citizens again on the other side, vehemently suspecting some secret Murder, caused the Coroner of London, according to Law, to chuse an Inquest, and to take good view of the dead Body, and so to try out the truth of the matter. Whereby the Bishop and his Chaplains were then driven to extremity of shifts: and therefore minding by some subtil shew of Justice to stop the mouths of the People, they determined, that in the mean while as the Inquest was occupied about their charge, the Bishop should for his part proceed Ex Officio, in case of Heresy against the dead Person; supposing, most like, that if the Party were once condemned of Heresy, the Inquest durst not then but find him guilty of his own death, and so clearly acquit them from all the former suspicion of privy Murder. This determination of theirs they did immediately put in practice, in order as followeth:

First, besides the Articles before mentioned, which they affirm were objected against him in his life-time, Dr. Head did now also after his death collect certain others out of the Prologue of his English Bible, remaining then in the Bishop's hands, which he diligently perused, not to learn any good thing therein, but to get thereout such matter as he thought might best serve their cursed purpose, as appeareth by the tenor of the Articles, which are these:

1. First, the said Book damneth all holy Canons, calling them Ceremonies and Statutes of sinful Men and cunning, and calleth the Pope Sathanas and Antichrist.
2. Item, it damneth the Pope's Pardons, saying they be but Leafings.
3. Item, The said Book faith, That Kings and Lords called Christian in name, and Heathen in conditions, denie the Sanctuary of God, bringing Clerks full of Covetousness, Heresy and Malice, to stop God's Law, that it cannot be known, kept, and freely preached.
4. Item, The said Book faith, that Lords and Prelates pursue fully and cruelly them that would teach truly and freely the Law of God, and cherish them that preach sinful Mens Traditions and Statutes, by which he meaneth the holy Canons of Christ's Church.
5. Item, That poor Men and Idiots have the truth of the holy Scriptures, more than a thousand Prelates, and religious Men, and Clerks of the School.
6. Item, That Christian Kings and Lords set Idols in God's House, and excite the People to Idolatry.
7. Item, That Princes, Lords, and Prelates so doing, be worse

8. Item, That every Man, swearing by our Lady, or any other Saint or Creature, giveth more honour to the Saints than to the Holy Trinity, and so he saith they be Idolaters.

9. Item, He saith that Saints ought not to be honoured.

10. Item, He damnth Adoration, Prayer, Kneeling, and offering to Images, which he calleth Stocks and Stones.

11. Item, He saith, that the very Body of the Lord is not contained in the Sacrament of the Altar, but that Men receiving it shall thereby keep in mind that Christ's Flesh was wounded and crucified for us.

12. Item, He damnth the University of Oxford, with all degrees and faculties in it, as Art, Civil, Canon, and Divinity: saying, that they let the true way to come to the knowledge of the Laws of God and holy Scripture.

13. Item, He defendeth the translation of the Bible and holy Scripture into the English Tongue, which is prohibited by the Laws of our Mother Holy Church.

An holy Mother Church which cannot abide the Word of God to be translated.

These Articles thus collected, as also the others before specified, they caused, for a more shew of their pretended Justice and Innocency, to be openly read the next Sunday following, by the Preacher at Pauls-Croft, with this protestation made before.

The Bishops Publication at Pauls-Croft, against Richard Hunne.

Matters and Friends, for certain causes and considerations, I have in commandment to rehearse, shew, and publish here unto you, the Articles of Herefy upon which Richard Hunne was detected and examined: And also other great Articles and damnable Points and Opinions of Herefy contained in some of his Books, be come to light and knowledge here ready to be shewn.

And therewith he read the Articles openly unto the People, concluding with these words:

And Matters, if there be any Man desirous to see the specialty of these Articles, or doubt whether they be contained in this Book or not, for satisfying of his mind let him come to my Lord of London, and he shall see it with good will.

Moreover, here I counsel and admonish, that if there be any Persons that of their impudency have been familiar and acquainted with the said Richard Hunne in these Articles, or have heard him read upon this Book, or any other founding to Herefy, or have any like Books themselves, let them come unto my Lord of London betwixt this and Candlemas next, and acknowledge their fault, and they shall be charitably intreated and dealt withal, so that both their Goods and Honesty shall be saved: and if they will not come of their own offer, but abide the Process of the Law, then at their own peril be it, if the rigor of the Law be executed against them.

After which open publication and admonition, the Bishop at sundry times examined divers of his Priests, and other Lay-Persons, upon the contents of both these Articles. Among which Examined there was a Man-servant and a Maid of the said Hunne's, who altho they had of long time dwelt with him, were not able to charge him with any great thing worthy reprehension, no, not in such points as the Bishop chiefly objected against him. But yet the Priests (through whose procurement this mischief was first begun) spared no whit stoutly and maliciously to accuse him, some in the contents of the first Articles, and some in the second. Wherefore having now, as they thought, sufficient matter against him, they purposed speedily to proceed to his condemnation. And because they would seem to do all things formally, and by prescript Order, they first drew out certain short and summary Rules, by which the Bishop should be directed in this solemn Session, which are these:

For Report of the Priests, London.

1. First, let the Bishop sit in his Tribunal-Seat in our Ladies Chapel.

2. Secondly, let him recite the cause of his coming, and take Notaries to him to enact what shall be there done.

Mark the manner of this proceeding.

3. Thirdly, let him declare, how upon Sunday last at Pauls-Croft, he caused to be published a general Monition or Denunciation, that all Fautors and Maintainers of Richard Hunne should come in as by this day, and submit themselves: And let him signify withal, how certain have come in, and have appeared already.

4. Fourthly, let him protest and say, that if there remain any yet behind, which have not appeared according to the former Monition and Denunciation, yet if they will come and appear, and submit themselves, they shall be heard and received with grace and favour.

5. Fifthly, let the Bishop, or some other at his appointment, recite the Articles objected against Richard Hunne in the time of his Life, and then the other Articles likewise, which were out of his great Book of the Bible extracted.

6. Sixthly, Let the Answers and Confessions of the said Richard Hunne summarily be recited, with the Attestations made to the same Articles. Also let his Books be exhibited, and then Thomas Brooke his Servant be called for.

7. Seventhly, let it be openly cried at the Quire-Door, That if there be any which will defend the Articles, Opinions, Books, or the Memory of the said Richard Hunne, let them come and appear, and they shall be heard as the Law in that behalf shall require.

8. Eighthly, let it be openly cried as in manner before, for such as be receivers, favourers, defenders or believers of the said Richard Hunne, that all such do appear and submit themselves to the Bishop, or else he intendeth to proceed to the Excommunication of them in general, according to the exigence of the Law in that behalf.

9. Ninthly, let the Bishop speak to the standers-by, and to them of the Clergy which fit with him upon the Bench, demanding of them, what their Judgment and Opinion is touching the Premises? and whether they think it convenient and agreeable for him to proceed to the Sentence against the said Richard Hunne in this part to be awarded?

10. Tenthly, After their consent and counsel given, let the Bishop read out the Sentence.

11. Finally, after the Sentence read, let the Bishop appoint the publication and denunciation of the foresaid Sentence to be read at Pauls-Croft, or elsewhere, as to him shall seem expedient, with a Citation likewise generally against all them that be receivers, favourers, and believers of the said Hunne, to give to understand why he ought not further to proceed against them, &c.

Now according to the tenour of these Prescripts and Rules, the Bishop of London, accompanied with the Bishops of Durham and Lincoln, sat in Judgment the sixteenth day of December then next following, within the place by the same appointed: adjoining also unto them as Witnesses of their proceedings, six publick Notaries, his own Register, and about twenty five Doctors, Abbots, Priors, and Priests of name, with a great Rabble of other common anointed Catholics. Where after a solemn Proclamation made, that if there were any that would defend the Opinions and Books of Richard Hunne, they should presently appear and be heard according to Law, he commanded all the Articles and Objections against Hunne openly to be read before the Assembly: and then perceiving that none durst appear in his defence, by the advice of his Assistants, he pronounced the Sentence definitive against the dead Carcase, condemning it of Herefy, and therewith committed the same unto the Secular Power, to be by them burned accordingly. Which ridiculous Decree was as fondly accomplished in Smithfield the twentieth day of the same month of December, (being full sixteen days after they had thus barbarously murdered him) to the great grief and disdain of all the People. And because the Bishop in his Sentence definitive useth a more formal and ample Order of Words than accustomedly is used in others, and also pretendeth full hypocritically in the beginning, as it were by way of Induction, divers causes that moved him to proceed against the dead Carcase: I thought good therefore here to insert the same, as a final conclusion of their crafty-coloured Tragedy, the tenour whereof is this:

A solemn Process of Sir James Bishop of London against Rich. Hunne being dead.

The Corps of Richard Hunne burned after his death.

Notwithstanding, after all this tragical and cruel handling of the dead Body, and their fair and colourable threat of Justice, yet the Inquest no whit stayed their diligent searching out of the true cause and means of his death. In former that when they had been divers times called both before the King's Privy-Council, (his Majesty himself being sometime present) and also before the chief Judges and Justices of this Realm, and that the matter being by them thoroughly examined, and perceived to be much bolstered and born withal by the Clergy, was again wholly remitted unto their determination and ending: they found by good proof, and sufficient evidence, that Doctor Horsey the Chancellor, Charles Joseph the Sumner, and John Spalding the Bell-ringer, had privily and maliciously committed this Murder, and therefore indicted them all three as wilful Murderers. Howbeit, through the earnest will of the Bishop of London unto Cardinal Wolsey, (as appeareth

* What final obijciat was in him, when you say before that by his own hand-writing he sheweth himself to be Bishop's favourable correction.

Dr. Horsey Chancellor, Charles Joseph the Sumner, and John Spalding the Bell-ringer, had privily and maliciously committed this Murder, and therefore indicted them all three as wilful Murderers. Howbeit, through the earnest will of the Bishop of London unto Cardinal Wolsey, (as appeareth Jan. 8. by his Letters hereafter mentioned) means was found, that at the next Sessions of Goal-delivery the King's Attorney pronounced the Indictment against Dr. Horsey to be false and untrue, and him not to be guilty of the Murder. Who, being then thereby delivered in Body, having yet in himself a guilty Conscience, got him unto Exeter, and durst never after for shame come again unto London. But now that the truth of all this may seem more manifest and plain unto all Mens eyes, here shall follow, word by word, the whole Enquiry and Verdict of the Inquest, exhibited by them unto the Coroner of London, and so given up and signed with his own hand.

The Verdict of the Inquest.

The Verdict of the Inquest.

THe fifth and the sixth day of December, in the sixth year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord King Henry the eighth, William Barnwell, Coroner of London, the day and year above said, within the Ward of Castle-Baynard of London, assembled a Quest, whose names afterward do appear, and hath sworn them truly to enquire of the death of one Richard Hunne, which lately was found dead in the Lollards-Tower within Paul's Church of London: Whereupon all we of the Inquest together went up into the said Tower, where we found the body of the said Hunne hanging upon a Staple of Iron, in a Girdle of Silk, with fair countenance, his head fair kembered, and his bonnet right sitting upon his head, with his eyne and mouth fair closed, without any staring, gaping, or frowning, also without any drivelling or spurning in any place of his body: Whereupon by one assent all we agreed to take down the body of the said Hunne, and as soon as we began to heave the body it was loose: whereby by good advisement we perceived that the girdle had no knot about the staple, but it was double-cast, and the links of an iron chain, which did hang on the same staple, were laid upon the same girdle whereby he did hang: Also the knot of the girdle that went about his neck, stood under his left ear, which caused his head to lean towards his right shoulder. Notwithstanding there came out of his nostrils two small streams of blood to the quantity of four drops; save only these four drops of blood, the face, lips, chin, dublet, collar, and shirt of the said Hunne was clean from any blood. Also we found that the skin both of his neck and Throat, beneath the girdle of silk, was fretted and failed away, with that thing which the Murderers had broken his Neck withal. Also the hands of the said Hunne were wrung in the wrists, whereby we perceived that his hands had been bound. Moreover, we find that within the said prison was no mean whereby a Man might hang himself, but only a Stool, which Stool stood upon a Bolster of a Bed, so tickle, that any Man or Beast might not touch it so little, but it was ready to fall: whereby we perceived, that it was not possible that Hunne might hang himself, the Stool so standing. Also all the girdle from the staple to his neck, as well as the part which went about his neck, was too little for his head to come out thereat. Also it was not possible that the soft silken girdle should break his neck or skin beneath the girdle. Also we find in a corner, somewhat beyond the place where he did hang, a great parcel of blood. Also we find upon the left side of Hunne's Jacket, from the breast downward, two great streams of blood. Also within the flap of the left side of his Jacket we find a great cluster of blood, and the Jacket folded down thereupon; which thing the said Hunne could never fold nor do after he was hanged. Whereby it appeareth plainly to us all, that the neck of Hunne was broken, and the great plenty of blood was shed before he was hanged. Wherefore all we find, by God and all our Consciences, that Richard Hunne was murdered. Also we acquit the said Richard Hunne of his own death.

Also there was an end of a Wax-candle, which, as John Bell-ringer saith, he left in the Prison burning, with Hunne that same Sunday at night: that Hunne was murdered; which Wax-candle we found sticking upon the Stocks, fair put out, about seven or eight foot from the place where Hunne was hanged, which candle after our opinion was never put out by him, for many likelihoods which we have perceived. Also at the going up of Master Chancellor into the Lollards Tower, we have good proof that there lay on the Stocks a Gown, either of Murrey, or Crimson in grain, furred with Shauks, whose Gown it was we could never prove, neither who bare it away. All we find, that Master William Horsey, Chancellor to my Lord of London, hath had at his commandment both the rule and guiding of the said Prisoner. Moreover, all we find, that the said Master Horsey, Chancellor, hath put Charles Joseph out of his Office, as the said Charles hath confessed, because he would not deal and use the said Prisoner so cruelly, and do to him as the Chancellor would have had him to do. Notwithstanding the deliverance of the Keys to the Chancellor by Charles on the Saturday at night before Hunne's death, and Charles riding out of the Town, on that Sunday in the morning ensuing, was but a Convention made betwixt Charles and the Chancellor to colour the Murder. For the same Sunday that Charles rode forth, he came again to the Town at night, and killed Richard Hunne, as in the depositions of Julian Little, Thomas Chicheley, Thomas Simonds, and Peter Turner, doth appear.

After colouring of the Murder betwixt Charles and the Chancellor conspired, the Chancellor called to him one John Spalding, Bell-ringer of Pauls, and delivered to the same Bell-ringer the Keys of the Lollards-Tower, giving to the said Bell-ringer a great charge, saying, I charge thee to keep Hunne more straitly than he hath been kept, and let him have but one meal a day: moreover, I charge thee let no body come to him without my licence, neither to bring him Shirt, Cap, Kerchief, or any other thing, but that I see it before it come to him. Also before Hunne was carried to Fulham, the Chancellor commanded to be put upon Hunne's Neck a great Collar of Iron, with a great Chain, which is too heavy for any Man or Beast to wear, and long to endure.

Moreover, it is well proved, that before Hunne's death the said Chancellor came up into the said Lollards-Tower, and kneeled down before Hunne, holding up his hands to him, praying him of Forgiveness of all that he had done to him, and must do to him. And on Sunday following the Chancellor commanded the Penitentiary of Pauls to go up to him, and say a Gospel, and make for him holy Water, and holy Bread, and give it to him, which he did: and also the Chancellor commanded that Hunne should have his dinner. And the same dinner-time Charles's Boy was shut in Prison with Hunne, which was never so before; and after dinner, when the Bell-ringer set out the Boy, the Bell-ringer said to the same Boy, Come no more hither with meat for him till tomorrow, for my Master Chancellor hath commanded that he should have but one meal a day: and the same night following Richard Hunne was murdered, which Murder could not have been done without consent and licence of the Chancellor, and also by the witting and knowledge of John Spalding Bell-ringer: for there could no Man come into the Prison but by the keys, being in John Bell-ringer's keeping. Also, as by my Lord of London's Book doth appear, John Bell-ringer is a poor innocent Man. Wherefore all we do perceive, that this Murder could not be done but by the commandment of the Chancellor, and by the witting and knowing of John Bell-ringer.

Charles Joseph, within the Tower of London, of his own free will and unconstrained, said, That Master Chancellor devised and wrote with his own hand all such Heresies as were laid to Hunne's charge; record John God, John True, John Pasmore, Richard Gibson, with many other. Also Charles Joseph saith, That when Richard Hunne was slain, John Bell-ringer bare up the stains into the Lollards Tower a Wax-candle, having the keys of the doors hanging on his arm; and Charles went next to him, and Master Chancellor came up last: and when all we came up, we found Hunne lying on his Bed; and then Master Chancellor said, Lay hands on the Thief; and so all we murdered him: and then Charles put the girdle about Hunne's neck; and then John Bell-ringer and I Charles did heave up Hunne, and Master Chancellor pulled the girdle over the staple, and so Hunne was hanged.

mer.*

The Deposition of Julian Littell late Servant of Charles Joseph, by her free will, unconstrained, the sixth Tear of our Sovereign Lord King Henry the Eighth, within the Chappel of our Lady of Bethlehem, shewed to the Inquest.

The Witness of Julian Littell, as gainst Ch. Joseph.

I lift, Julian faith, that the Wednesday at night, after the death of Richard Hunne, Charles Joseph her Master came home to his Supper: Then Julian said to him, Master, it was told me that ye were in Prison. Charles answered, It is merry to turn the Penny: and after Supper Charles trusted up a parcel of his Goods, and with help of Julian, bare them into Mr. Porter's Houle to keep: and that done, Charles said to Julian; Julian, if thou wilt be sworn to keep my counsell, I will then thee my mind. Julian answered, Yea, if it be neither Felony nor Treason. Then Charles took a Book out of his Parle, and Julian sware to him thereupon. Then said Charles to Julian, I have destroyed Richard Hunne. Alas Master, said Julian, how? he was called an honest Man. Charles answered, I put a wyre in his Nose. Alas said Julian, now be ye cast away and undone. Then said Charles, Julian, I trust in thee that thou wilt keep my counsell: And Julian answered, Yea, but for God's sake Master thinke for your self. Then Charles said, I had lever than 100 pound it were not done; but what is done, cannot be undone. Moreover Charles said then to Julian, Upon Sunday when I rode to my Cousin Barington's house, I tarried there and made good cheer all day till it was night: and yet before it was midnight I was in London, and had killed Hun: and upon the next day I rode thither again, and was there at dinner, and sent for Neighbours, and made good cheer. Then Julian asked Charles, Where set you your Horse that night you came to Town, and wherefore came you not home? Charles answered, I came not home for fear of bewraying. And then Julian asked Charles, Who was with you at the killing of Hun? Charles answered, I will not tell thee. And Julian faith that upon the Thursday following Charles tarried all day in his house with great fear: and upon Friday following, early in the morning before day, Charles went forth, as he said, to Pauls; and at his coming in again he was in a great fear, saying halflie, Get me my Horse: and with great fear and haste made him ready to ride; and bad Mr. Porter's Lad lead his Horse into the Field by the backside: and then Charles put into his sleeve his Male, or Malor, with other Plate borrowed of Mr. Porter, both Gold and Silver, but how much I am not sure: and Charles went into the Field after his Horse, and Julian brought his Budget after him. Also upon Friday in Christmase week following, Charles came home late in the night, and brought with him three Bakers and a Smith of Stratford, and the same night they carried out of Charles's his Houle, all his Goods by the Field side, to the Bell in Shoreditch, and early in the morning conveyed it with Carts to Stratford.

Moreover Julian faith, that the Saturday at night before the death of Hun, Charles came home, and brought with him a Gurtard, saying, it was for Hun; and Charles's Boy told to Julian, that there was also ordained a piece of fresh Salmon, which John Bellinger had.

Also Charles said to the said Julian, Were not this ungracious Trouble, I could bring my Lord of London to the doors of Hereticks in London, both of Men and Women, that be worth a thousand pounds; but I am afraid that the ungracious Midwife shall bewray us all.

Also Charles said unto Mrs. Porter likewise & more largely, speaking of the best in London: Whereunto Mrs. Porter answered, The best in London is my Lord Mayor. Then Charles said, I will not fault him quite, for that he taketh this Matter to hart.

Whereas Charles Joseph faith he lay at Neckyl with a Harlot, a Man's Wife, in Barington's Houle, the same Night that Richard Hun was murdered, and there abode until the morrow at eleven of the clock: and thereupon brought before the King's Council, for his purgation, the forsaide Baud Barington's Wife, and also the forsaide Harlot: this purgation we have proved all untrue, as right largely may appear, as well by the Deposition of Julian Littell, as of Thomas Chicheley Tailor, Thomas Simonds Stationer, of Robert Johnson and his Wife, of John Spalding Belinger: Also of Peter Turner Son-in-law of the forsaide Charles Joseph, who said before, to an honest Woman, a Wax-chandler's Wife, that before this day seventh night Hun should have a mischievous death, &c. Also of John Ederby Baker, to whom John Spalding himself declared these words, that there was ordained for Hun so grievous penance, that when Men hear of it, they shall have great marvel thereof, &c. Besides the Deposition moreover of Allen Creswell Waxchandler, and Richard Horsenail Bailiff of the Sanctuary Town, called Godshure in Essex. Which Testimonies and Depositions hereafter follow.

The Deposition of Allen Creswell Waxchandler.

He said Allen faith, That John Granger servant with my Lord of London, in my Lord of London's Kitchen, at such time as the said Allen was fearing Hun's Coffin, that Granger I say, told him, that he was present with John Belinger the same Sunday at night that Richard Hun was found dead in the morrow, when the Keeper let him in the Stocks; inasmuch that the said Hun desired to borrow the Keeper's Knife: and the Keeper asked him what he would do with his Knife; and he answered, I had lever kill my self than to be thus entreated. This Deposition the said Allen will prove as far forth as any Christian Man may; saying, that Granger shewed to him these words of his own free will and mind, without any question or enquiry to him made by the said Allen. Moreover the said Allen faith, that all the evening Granger was in great fear.

The Deposition of Richard Horsenail, Bailiff of the Sanctuary-Town called Godshure in Essex.

He said Richard faith, That the Friday before Christmase day last past, one Charles Joseph, Sumner to my Lord of London, became a Sanctuary-Man, and the aforesaid Friday he registred his Name; the said Charles saying it was for the safeguard of his Body, for there be certain Men in London so extream against him for the death of Richard Hun, that he dare not abide in London. Howbeit the said Charles faith, he knowledgeth himself guiltles of Hun's death; for he delivered the Keys to the Chancellor by Hun's life. Also the said Bailiff faith, that Charles paid the Duty of the said Registring, both to him and Sir John Studley Vicar.

The Copy of Richard Fitzjames's Letter, then Bishop of London, sent to Cardinal Wolsey.

I beseech your good Lordship to stand so good Lord unto my poor Chancellor now in Ward, and indited by an untrue Quest, for the Death of Richard Hun, upon the only Accusation of Charles Joseph made by pain and avarice; that by your intercession it may please the King's Grace to have the matter duly and sufficiently examined by indifferent Persons of his discrete Council, in the presence of the Parties, ere there be any more done in the Cause; and that upon the innocency of my said Chancellor declared, it may further please the King's Grace to award a Plackard unto his Attorney to confess the said Indictment to be untrue, when the time shall require it: for assured am I, if my Chancellor be tried by any twelve Men in London, they be so maliciously set, in favour of hereticke pravitatis, that they will cast and condemn any Clergy, who be more innocent as Abel. Quare si potes beate Pater, adjuva inimizates nostras, & tibi in perpetuum devincturimus. Over this, in most humble wise I beseech you, that I may have the King's gracious Fav' to, whom I never offended willingly; and that by your good means I might speak with his Grace and you: and I with all mine shall pray for your prosperous estate long to continue.

Your most humble Orator R. L.

Lastly, now it remaineth to infer the Sentence of the Quettmen, which followeth in like sort to be seen and expended, after I have first declared the words of the Bishop spoken in the Parliament-house.

The words that the Bishop of London spak before the Lords in the Parliament-house.

Memorandum, That the Bishop of London said in the Parliament-house, that there was a Bill brought to the Parliament, to make the Jury that was charged upon the

And furthermore said, that there came a Man to his House, whose Wife was appeached of Heresy, to speak with him ; and he said that he had no mind to speak with the same Man ; which Man spake and reported to the Servants of the same Bishop, that if his Wife would not hold still her Opinions, he would cut her Throat with his own hands : with other words.

The Sentence of the Inquest, subscribed by the Crowner.

The Inquisition intended and taken at the City of London, in the Parish of St. Gregory, in the Ward of Baynard Castle in London, the sixth day of December, in the sixth year of the Reign of King Hen. 8. before Thomas Barnewel Crowner of our Sovereign Lord the King within the City of London aforesaid. Also before James Tarford and John Munday, Sheriffs of the said City, upon the fight of the Body of Richard Hun, late of London Tailor, which was found hanged in the Lollards Tower ; and by the oath and proof of lawful Men of the same Ward, and of other three Wards next adjoining, as it ought to be, after the custom of the City aforesaid, to enquire how, and in what manner wife the said Richard Hun came unto his death : and upon the Oath of John Bernard, Thomas Stert, William Warren, Henry Abraham, John Aborow, John Turner, Robert Allen, William Marler, John Burton, James Page, Thomas Pickhill, William Burton, Robert Bridgewater, Thomas Buxted, Gilbert Howell, Richard Gibson, Christopher Crafton, John God, Richard Holt, John Palmer, Edmund Hudson, John Arnsfell, Richard Cooper, John Tim : The which said upon their Oaths, that where the said Richard Hun, by the commandment of Richard Bishop of London, was imprisoned and brought to hold in a Prison of the said Bishops called Lollards Tower, lying in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul in London, in the Parish of St. Gregory, in the Ward of Baynard Castle aforesaid ; William Horsley of London Clerk, otherwise called William Horsley, Chancellor to Richard Bishop of London ; and one Charles Joseph late of London Sumner, and John Spalding of London, otherwise called John Bellringer, feloniously as Felons to our Lord the King, with force and arms against the peace of our Sovereign Lord the King, and dignity of his Crown, the fourth day of December, the sixth year of the Reign of our Sovereign Lord aforesaid, of their great malice, at the Parish of Saint Gregory aforesaid, upon the said Richard Hun, made a fray, and the same Richard Hun feloniously strangled and smothered, and also the Neck they did break of the said Richard Hun, and there feloniously slew him and murdered him ; and also the Body of the said Richard Hun, afterward the same fourth day, year, place, parish, and ward aforesaid, with the proper Girdle of the same Richard Hun, of silk, black of colour, of the value of twelve pence, after his death, upon a hook driven into a piece of timber in the wall of the Prison aforesaid, made fast, and so hanged him, against the Peace of our Sovereign Lord the King, and the Dignity of his Crown : and so the said Jury hath sworn upon the Holy Evangelists, that the said Wil. Horsley Clerk, Charles Joseph, and John Spalding, of their set malice, then and there feloniously killed and murdered the said Richard Hun in manner and form above-said, against the Peace of our Sovereign Lord the King, his Crown and Dignity.

Thomas Barnewel, Crowner of the City of London.

After that the twenty four had given up their Verdict, sealed and signed with the Crowner's Seal, the Cause was then brought into the Parliament-house, where the truth was laid so plain before all Mens faces, and the fact so notorious, that immediately certain of the bloody murderers were committed to Prison, and should no doubt have suffered what they deserved, had not the Cardinal by his authority practised for his Catholicick Children, at the suit of the Bishop of London. Whereupon the Chancellor, by the King's Pardon, and secret shifting, rather than by God's Pardon and his deserving, escaped, and went, as is said, to Exeter, &c. Nevertheless the justice took no place where favour did save, yet because the innocent Cause of Hun should take no wrong, the Parliament became suiters unto the King's Majesty, that whereas the Goods of the said Hun were confiscated into the King's hands, it would please his Grace to make restitution of all the said Goods unto the Children of the said Hun. Upon which motion, the King of his gracious disposition, did not only give all the fore-said Goods unto the fore-said Children under his broad Seal yet to be seen, but also did send out his Warrants (which hereafter shall follow) to those that were the cruel Murderers, commanding them, upon his high displeasure, to deliver all the said Goods, and make restitution for the death of the said Richard Hun : all which Goods came to the sum of fifteen hundred pounds Sterling, besides his Plate and other Jewels.

Trusty and Welbeloved, We greet you well. Whereas by the complaint to us made, as well as also in our high Court of Parliament, on the behalf and part of Roger Whapplot of our City of London Draper, and Margaret his Wife, late the Daughter of Richard Hun : And whereas you were indicted by our Laws, of and for the death of the said Richard Hun, and the said Murder cruelly committed by you, like as by our Records more at large plainly it doth appear, about the fifth day of December, in the sixth year of our Reign ; the same we abhor : Nevertheless we of our special grace, certain science, and meer motion, pardoned you upon certain considerations us moving : for the intent that the Goods of the said Richard Hun, and the administration of them, were committed to the said Roger Whapplot. We then supposed and intended your amendment, and restitution to be made by you to the Infants, the Children of the said Richard Hun ; as well for his death, as for his goods, embazelled, wasted, consumed, by your tyranny and cruel act so committed, the same being of no little value : and as hitherto ye have made no recompence, according to our Laws, as might stand with Equity, Justice, right and good Conscience, and for this cause due satisfaction ought to be made by our Laws : Wherefore we will and exhort, and otherwise charge and command you, by the Tenor of these our special Letters, that ye justify and recompense the said Roger Whapplot, and the said Margaret his Wife, according to our Laws in this case, as it may stand with right and good conscience, else otherwise at your further peril ; so that they shall have no cause to return unto us, for their further remedy elswhere in this behalf, as ye in the same tender to avoid our high displeasure : otherwise that ye upon the sight hereof, set all excesses apart, and repair unto our presence, at which your hither coming you shall be further advertised of our mind.

From our Mannor, &c.

Defence of Richard Hun against Sir Thomas More and Allen Cope.

I Doubt not but by these Premises, thou hast (Christian Reader) sufficiently to understand the whole discourse and story of Richard Hun, from top to toe. First how he came in trouble for denying the bearing-Sheet of his young Infant departed : then how he was forced for succour of himself to sue a Præmunire : and thereupon what conspiracy of the Clergy was wrought against him, what snares were laid, what latches were practised, and Articles devised to snarl him in the Trap of Heresy, and so to imprison him. Furthermore, being in Prison, how he was secretly murdered ; after his murder, hanged ; after his hanging, condemned ; after his condemnation, burned ; and after his burning, lastly, how his death was inquired by the Crowner, and cleared by acquittal of the Inquest. Moreover, how the cause was brought into the Parliament, and by the Parliament the King's Precept obtained for restitution of his Goods. The debating of which tragical and tumultuous story, with all the branches, and particular evidences of the same, taken out as well of the publick Acts, as of the Bishop's Registers, and special Records remaining in the custody of Dunstan VWhapplot, the Son of the Daughter of the said Richard Hun, and there to be seen. I thought here to unwrap and discover so much this more, for three special purposes :

First,

The Sentence of the Inquest.

Rich. Hun cleared by the Inquest, not to have hanged him.

The King's Letter for the restitution of Hun's Goods.

Defence of Rich. Hun.

See publick Acts & Registers & Regist. Lond.

Three purposes considered.

First, as is requisite, for testimony and witness of Truth fully slandered, of Innocency wrongfully condemned, and of the Party cruelly oppressed.

The second cause moveth me for Sir Thomas More's Dialogues, wherein he dallieth out the matter, thinking to jett poor simple Truth out of countenance.

The third cause which constraineth me, be the Dialogues of Alanus Copus; which two, the one in English, the other in Latin, railing and barking against Richard Hun, do double-wise charge him, both to be an Heretick, and also a desperate Homicide of himself. Which as it is false in the one, so it is to be found as untrue in the other, if simple Truth, which hath few Friends, and many times cometh in crafty handling, might freely come to indifferent hearing.

Answer for Rich. Hun against Sir Tho. More Right.

Sir T. More having many good verses had some great vice.

The Reasons of Sir Tho. More refuted.

The circumstances of Hun's hanging considered.

Utopia Moti.

Wherefore as I have hitherto described the order and manner of his handling, with the Circumstances thereof, in plain and naked narration of Story, simply laid out before all Mens faces; so something here to intermit, in the defence as well of his oppressed cause, as also in discharge of my self, I will now compendiously answer to both these foresaid Adversaries, stopping as it were, with one both two gaps; and the mouths also, if I can, of them both together.

And first against Sir Thomas More, albeit in Degree worshipsful, in Place superior, in wit and Learning singular, if his judgment in Christ's matters had been correspondent to the same, being otherwise a Man with many worthy Ornaments beautified: yet being but a Man, and one Man, I lay and object against the Person of him, the persons and censures of twenty four Questmen, the depolation of so many Jurates, the judgment of the Crown, the approbation of the Parliament; and lastly, the King's Bill assigned for restitution of his goods, with his own broad Seal confirmed, &c. And thus much to the Person and Credit of Sir Thomas More.

Now as touching his Reasons: whereas he coming in with a flim-flam of a Horse-mill or a Mills-horle (in his own terms I speak) thinketh it probation good enough, because he could not see him taken by the sleeve which murdered Hun: against these Reasons unreasonable of his, I alledge all the Evidences and demonstrations of the History above prefixed, to be considered, and of all indifferent Men to be peered.

First, How he was found hanging, with his countenance fair, with his beard and head fair kembed, his bonnet right set on his head, with his eie and mouth fair cloied, without any driving or spurning. His body being taken down, was found loose (which by hanging could not be) his neck broken, and the skin thereof beneath the throat, where the girdle went, fret and forced away; his girdle notwithstanding being of silk, and so double cast about the staple, that the space of the girdle between the staple and his neck, with the residue also that went about his neck, was not sufficient for his head to come out at. His hands moreover wrung in the wrists, his face, lips, chin, doublet, and shirt-collar unstained with any blood: whereas notwithstanding in a manner somewhat beyond the place where he did hang a great quantity of blood was found. Also, whereas as the staple whereon he hanged was so that he could not climb thereto without some mean, there was a stool set up upon the bolster of a bed, so tickle, that with the least touch in the World it was ready to fall: and how was it possible that Hun might hang himself upon that staple, the stool so standing? Besides the confession moreover of Charles Joseph's own mouth to Julian Littlell, of Robert Johnson, John Spalding the Bell-ringer, Peter Turner, and others. All which Testimonies and Declarations being so clear and undeniable, may suffice (I trust) any indifferent Man to see where the truth of this case doth stand: unless Mr. More being a Gentleman of Utopia, peradventure after some strange guise of that Country, used to carry his eyes not in his head, but in his affection, not seeing but where he liketh, nor believing but what he listeth.

Finally, where Sir Thomas More, speaking of himself, so concludeth, That he hearing in the matter what well might be said, yet could not find contrary but Hun to be guilty of his own death: so in as many words to answer him again, I perusing and searching in the story of Rich. Hun what may well be searched, cannot but marvel with my self, either with what darkness the eyes of Mr. More be dazled, not to see what is so plain: or else with what conscience he could dissemble that which shame cannot deny.

Thirdly, Touching the Dialogues of Allen Cope, which had rather the Bishop's Chancellor and Officers to be recounted among thieves and murderers, than Hun to be numbred among the Martyrs; I have herein not much to say, because himself faith but little: and if he had said less, unless his ground were better, it had made as little matter. But so far as he saying not much, fendeth us to seek more in More; so with like brevity again I may send him to William Tindall to shap him an answer. Yet notwithstanding left Cope, in saying something, should think Hun's innocent cause to lack some friends, which will not or dare not adventure in defence of Truth; somewhat I will answer in this behalf.

And first touching this murder of Hun not to be his own wilful act, but the deed of others; besides the demonstrations above premised to Sir Thomas More, now to Mr. Cope: If I had no other evidences but only these two, I would require no more; that is, his cap found so freight standing upon his head, and the stool so tottering under his feet. For how is it, I will not say like; but how is it possible for a Man to hang himself in a filken girdle double cast about a staple, in such shortness, that the space of the knot could not well compass his head about, and yet have his cap so freight set upon his head as his was?

Again, How is it possible, or can it be imagined for him to hang himself, climbing up by a stool which had no stay for him to stand upon, but stool so tickle, that if he had touched the same never so little, it must needs have fallen?

But Cope being something more provident in this matter, seemeth to exceed not altogether so far as doth Mr. More. For he, understanding the case to be ambiguous and doubtful, so leaveth it in suspense, not determining that Hun did hang himself, and yet not admitting that he died a Martyr, no more than they which are quelled by thieves and murderers by high-ways side. Well, be it so as Cope doth agree, that they which die by the hands of Felons and Murderers in their own ways, be no Martyrs; yet notwithstanding this his own similitude, comparing the Bishop's Chancellor and Officers to Thieves and Murderers, doth grant at least that Hun died a true Man, altho no Martyr.

Now if the cause be it, and not the pain, that maketh a Martyr, in pondering the cause why Hun was slain, we shall find it not altogether like to the cause of them which perish by Thieves and Robbers. For such commonly, because of their goods, and for some worldly gain to be sought by their death, are made away, and being true Men, may peradventure have the reward, altho not the name of Martyrs: Whereas, this Man's death being wrought neither for money, nor any such temporal lure to redound to his Oppressors; as it hath another cause, so may it have another name, and deserve to be called by the name of Martyrdom.

Like as Abel being slain by wicked Cain, albeit he had no opinion of Religion articulate against him, but of spite only and of malice was made away, yet notwithstanding is justly numbred among the Martyrs; so what let to the contrary, but that Hun also with him may be reckoned in the same Society, seeing the cause wherefore they both did suffer, proceedeth together out of one Fountain? And what moreover if a Man should call Nabab (who for holding his right inheritance was slain) a Martyr, what great injury should he do either to the name, or cause, or the person, worthy to be carped at? Against Tho. Becket, you know Mr. Cope, no special Article of Faith was laid, wherefore he died: And why then do you bestow upon him so devoutly the title of a Martyr, for withholding that from the King, which by the Law of God, and of the Realm, did belong unto him; and cannot suffer Hun to be titled for a Martyr, dying in his own right, by the hands of spiritual Thieves and Homicides, as you your self do term them? But what do I strain my travel any further to prove Hun a Martyr, when as Cope's own confession doth import no less, tho I said nothing? For what if I should take no more but his own very words, and say, that he was known to be an Heretick, as Cope doth affirm? What could I say more, seeing he died for his Herefy, to prove him to die a Martyr? For to die an Heretick with the Papists, what is it else (to Cope told, say truth) but to die with God a Martyr?

But howsoever it please either Sir Thomas More to jett, or Allen Cope to scold out the matter, and to file

K. Hen. 8.

Answer to Allen Cope for R. Hun.

Hun murdered not by himself, but by others.

Not possible that Hun should hang himself.

Cope denieth Rich. Hun to die a Martyr.

The cause, not the pain, maketh a Martyr.

The cause of Abel's death and of Hun's compared.

Cope Dial 6. pag. 847.

K. Hen. 8. Richard Hun for a known and desperate Heretick: yet to all true godly disposed Men, Hun may well be known to be a godly and virtuous Person, no Heretick, but faithful and found, save that only he seemed rather half a Papist: at least no full Protestant, for that he resorted daily to Mass, and also had his Beads in Prison with him, after the Catholick manner; albeit he was somewhat inclined (as may appear) toward the Gospel. And if the name of a Martyr be thought too good for him; yet I trust Mr. Cope will stand so good Master to him, to let him at least be a Martyr's Fellow. But what now if I go further with Mr. Cope, and name Richard Hun, not only for a Martyr, but also commend him for a double Martyr? Certes, as I suppose, in so saying I should affirm no less than truth, nor any thing more than may truly be said, and justly proved. But to give and grant this contention unto the Adversary, which notwithstanding might be easily proved: Let us see now the proofs of Mr. Cope, how he argueth that Richard Hun is no Martyr: because (saith he) true Men being killed in high-ways by Thieves and Murderers, are not therefore to be counted Martyrs, &c. And was there nothing else in the cause of Hun, but as in true Men killed by Thieves and Murderers? They that are killed by Thieves and Murderers are killed for some prey, or money about them: And what prey or profit was in the death of Hun, let us see, to redound to them which oppressed him? If it were the Mortuary, or the bearing-Cloth, that was a small thing, and not worthy his death. If it were the Premunire, the danger thereof pertained to the Priest, and not to them. If they feared lest the example thereof once begun, should afterward redound to the prejudice of the whole Church, then was the cause of his death not private but publick, tending to the whole Church and Clergy of Rome: and so is his death not altogether like to the death of them which for private respects are killed of Thieves and Murderers.

But he was an Heretick, saith Cope. By the same reason that Cope taketh him for an Heretick, I take him the more to be accepted for a Martyr: for by that way which they call Heresy, the living God is served, and by no way better. And if he were an Heretick, why then did they not proceed against him as an Heretick while he was alive? When they had him at Fulham before them, if they had been sure to intrap him in that snare, why did they not take their advantage when they might with least jeopardy? why did they not proceed and condemn him for an Heretick? why made they such haste to prevent his death before? why did they not tarry the sentence of the Law, having the Law in their own hands? But belike they perceived that he could not be proved an Heretick while he lived, and therefore thought it best to make him away privily, and to stop the Premunire, and afterward to stop the pursuit of his death by making him an Heretick. And therefore were Articles devised by the Chancellor (as is proved before by the witness of Ch. Joseph and another) against him, and he condemned for an Heretic, and all his favourers also, whosoever durst stir to take his part, and thereupon was committed to the secular Power, and burned. Wherein they did him double wrong; first in that they burned him for an Heretick, having before submitted himself to their favourable correction, as it appeareth yet in the Bishop's Registers by his own hand, as it is there pretended; which was against their own Laws. Again, if he had not submitted himself at that time, yet did they him wrong to burn him before they knew him and heard him speak (as Tindal saith) whether he would recant or no. And yet admit that he was condemned and burned for an Heretick, yet to be killed and burned of them for an Heretick, that taketh not from him the name of a Martyr, but rather giveth him to be a double Martyr.

But Cope yet proceeding in his hot choler against Rieh. Hun, after he hath made him first no Martyr, and then an Heretick, thirdly he now maketh him also a murderer of himself, and saith, that no other Man was any part of his death but only his own hands, and that either for indignation and anger, or for desperation, or for some cause he knoweth not what. And in his Epilogue to make it probable, he allegeth the example of one, but nameless, who in Queen Mary's time in like sort went about to hang himself, had he not been taken in the manner and rescued.

Furthermore, as touching the Chancellor he argueth, that there was no cause why he should attempt any such violence against him, both for his Age, for his Dignity, for his Learning, and for the greatness of his own Peril which might ensue thereof. Who, if he had malign'd the Man, and had been so disposed to work his destruction, had means otherwise without danger to bring that about, having him within his danger convict and fast tied for Heresy. Whereunto I answer, that to all this matter sufficient hath been answered by the story it self of his death above specified. Whereby the manner of his death, by circumstances of his handling and hanging, by his Neck broke, by his Body loose, by his Skin fretted, by his Wrists wrung, by his Girdle in such thorniness double cast about the staple, by his Cap right upon his Head, by his Hair kemb'd, by his Shirt-closet, by the cake of Blood found in the floor, by his Shirt-collor, Doublet, Jacket, and other outward parts of his garments without drop of Blood supported, by the stool for standing upon the bolster, by the Chancellor's murrey Gown found the day after upon the Stocks, the wax Candle fair put out: Furthermore, by the Verdict of the Inquest, by the Attestation of the Witnesses sworn, by the Crowner's Judgment, by the Assent of the Parliament, by the King's Letters assign'd, and broad Seal for restitution of his goods, and finally by the confession of the Parties themselves which murdered him, &c. And yet thinketh Cope to make Men such fools, having yet their five wits, to ween yet that Hun did hang himself, after so many demonstrations and evidences to the contrary, as in every part of this story may appear? And tho it were, as it was, unlike, and hard for a Man to believe, that Dr. Horsley, a Man of such Age, Dignity, and Learning, would so much forget himself to attempt such a villany: yet so great is the Devil sometimes with Man, where God permitte, that he worketh greater things than this, and more incredible. For who would have thought it like that Cain would ever have killed Abel his own natural Brother? which was more than for a Bishop's Chancellor to kill a Citizen: yet so he did. And where Cope pretendeth the causes of anger and desperation whereby Hun did hang himself, show is it like, or who ever did hear, a Man being in such extremity of desperation, to stand first trimming himself, and kembing his head, before he go to hang himself? No more credit is also to be given to that which followeth in the same Cope, where he saith, that Rieh. Hun being in Prison, was convict of Heresy. By the which word Convict, if he mean that Hun was proved an Heretick, that is false; for that he being at Fulham examined upon certain Articles, both denied the Articles to be true as they were objected; and also if they were true, yet he submitted himself to their favourable correction; and therefore not standing obstinately in the same, could not be proved an Heretick. And if by this term Convict, he mean that he was by sentence cast, so was Hun never cast by any sentence for an Heretick, so long as he lived, but after his death, when he could nothing answer for himself. And because this untruth should not go without his fellow, see how he hudleth up one false narration in the neck of another; affirming moreover, that Hun was cast into Prison before he entered his Suit of Premunire against the Priest. Which is utterly false and untrue, both disagreeing to other stories, and also refuted by the words of Sir Tho. More his own Author: who reporteth, that Hun (in suing his Premunire against the Priest) being set upon a glory of Victory, made his boast among his friends, that he trusted to have the matter long spoken of, and to be called Hun's case. Hec Morus. Whereby it appeareth that Hun was not then in Prison clapt up for Heresy, but was abroad seeking counsel among the Lawyers, and boasting among his friends, as writeth More, Lib. 3. Dial.

After this heap of untruths above puffed, add yet further another Copy of Cope's false dealing: who seeking all corners and every-where how to pick matter against my former History, chargeth me with arrogancy, as tho I took so highly upon me to undo and derogate from the King's Acts and Judgments in the acquittal of Dr. Horsley. If it so pleased the King to acquit Dr. Horsley by his gracious Pardon, I am not against it, neither do I deny but the King so did: neither do I say, nor ever did, but the King of his supereminent Prerogative may so do: and wherein then do I unrip or loose the King's Acts here done and concluded? But if the question be this, Whether Dr. Horsley with his Conjurates, did kill Richard Hun or no: then do I say, that the Pardon of the King doth not take away the Verity of the Crime committed, but removeth away the Penalty of the Law deserved: and so if the life of them was saved by way of pardon (as Mr. More himself seemeth not to deny) then was it not through their innocency claiming Justice, that they escaped, but through petition standing in need of Mercy. For what needeth Pardon where Justice absolveth? Yea, who futh Pardon, but in so doing must yield himself guilty? for Pardon never cometh lightly, either with God or Man, except the Crime be first confessed. Wherefore if they escaped by Justice, as Cope pretendeth, how then doth Mr. More say, they were saved by Pardon? and if they escaped by Pardon, how then doth Cope say they were not guilty? And be it admitted, that the Sentence of the King's Attorney in the King's Name did absolve them as unguilty, according as the King was then informed by the Cardinal and fuit of Friends; yet afterward the King, being better informed by the Parliament, and the Truth better known, detested and abhorred their Fact, and yet continued his Pardon unto them, as by the King's own Acts and his Broad Seal appeareth, yet remaining in Records to be seen.

And as touching my former Histories set forth in Latine and in English, which spake first of the fore-man of the Quest, then of the King's Attorney, to be laboured with some gifts or money: as Cope hath yet proved no untruth in my saying, so less can he find any repugnance or disagreeing in the same. For he that speaketh of bribing, first of one person, and then afterwards of another, where both might be bribed together, is not contrary, I think, to himself, but rather doth comprehend that in the one Book, which he before leaveth out in the other; and yet no great repugnance either in the one or the other, seeing that which is said may be verified in both as it is no other like but in this matter it was: for how is it otherwise like or possible, but that there must needs be found some privy packing in this matter, seeing after such evidence found and brought in by the Crowner's Inquest and Jury of twenty four chosen Persons, after so many marks and tokens of the murder so clear and demountable, and laid forth so plain to the eyes of all the World, that no Man could deny, or not see the same; yet through the handling of the foresaid Attorney, and of the Foreman of the Quest, the Murderers were born out and confessed to be no Murderers. If such bolstering out of matters and partiality were then such a rare case in the Realm of England, in the time of Cardinal Wolsey, who then under the King and in the King's Name did what he list; then let it seem untrue in my former stories that I have written. And yet the words of my story, which Cope carpeth at so much, be not mine, but the words of Edward Hall his own Author. Wherefore if his disposition be so set, that he must needs be a censurer of other Mens writings, let him expostulate with Hall and not with me.

But I trouble the Reader too much in this matter of Richard Hun, being of it self so clear, that no indifferent Judge can doubt thereof. As for wranglers and quarrellers, they will never be fatished. Wherefore to return again to the purpose of our story intermitted; in the Table above, containing the Names of them which about this time of Richard Hun were forced to deny and abjure their professed Opinions, mention was made of Elizabeth Stamford, John Household, and other moe, abjuring about the year of Lord 1517. Whose vexation and weakness, altho it be pitifull to behold, yet to consider the confession of their Doctrine in those ancient days, it is not unprofitable. Wherin we have to see the same form and knowledge of Doctrine then taught and planted in the hearts of our fore-elders; which is now publickly received, as well touching the Lord's Sacrament of his Body, as also other specialities of sincerity. And altho they lacked then publick authority to maintain the open preaching and teaching of the Gospel, which the Lord's merciful Grace hath given us now; yet in secret knowledge and understanding they seemed then little or nothing inferior to these our times of publick Reformation: As may appear by this confession of Elizabeth Stamford here-under written; which only may suffice for example, to understand what ripe knowledge of God's Word was then abroad, altho not in Churches publickly preached, for danger of the Bishops, yet in secret wise taught and received of divers.

In number of whom was this Elizabeth Stamford, who being brought and examined before Finjames Bishop of London, Anno 1517, confessed, That she was taught by one Thomas Beale, (sometime dwelling at Henley) these words eleven years before: That Christ feedeth, and fast nourisheth his Church with his own precious Body, that is, the Bread of Life coming down from Heaven: this is the worthy Word that is worthily received, and joined unto Man to be in one Body with him. Sooth it is that they be both one, they may not be parted: this is the wisely deeming of the Holy Sacrament, Christ's own Body: this is not received by chewing of Teeth, but by hearing with Ears, and understanding with your Soul, and wisely working thereafter. Therefore saith St. Paul, I fear me amongst us, Brethren, that many of us be feeble and sick; therefore I counsel us Brethren to rise and watch, that the great day of Doom come not suddenly upon us, as the Thief doth upon the Merchant. Also the said Beale taught and shewed her, that the Sacrament of the Altar was not the very Body of Christ, but very Bread: And that the Sacrament was the very Body of Christ put upon the Crofs, after a divine and mystical manner. And moreover, that the said Thomas Beale did many times and oft teach her this foresaid lesson, that she should confess her sins to God, and that the Pope's Pardons and Indulgences were nought worth, and profited not, and that worshipping of Images and Pilgrimages are not to be done.

To this Elizabeth Stamford, may also be annexed the Doctrine and Confession of Joan Sampson, Wife of John Sampson Carpenter, of Aldermanbury in London: Against whom, being cited and examined before the Bishop of London, certain witnessses were produced: who upon their Oath, being sworn, did detect and denounce the said Joan Sampson in these Articles and Opinions following:

1. That the being in her labour, what time Joan Sampson her Predecessor, then being alive; was with her, and after the manner then of Women, called much upon the help of the Virgin Mary, she spitting thereat, was in such sort aggrieved, that the other party was compelled to forsake the house.

2. Also, that she spake against Pilgrimage, and the worshipping of the Blessed Virgin, and of all Saints, affirming that there is none Holy but One.

3. Item, another time, in the hearing of one Margaret Answorth, when she and other Women were invoking the blessed Virgin to help in Womens labour, she stood against them, and contumeliously spake against the Invocators.

4. Item, that the speaking against the Pilgrimage of our Lady of Wilsdon (as she was then called) and of Saint Saviour at Barmsey, called the said Saint Saviour, Syn Sawyer.

5. Item, for having two certain Books in English, one bigger, and another lesser, which she committed to one John Anthead a Cook; which Books in the Register be not named.

6. Item, that the said Joan Sampson, at a supper, in the hearing of certain Men, and of a certain Widow named Joan White, spake openly in contempt of the Sacrament of the Altar, saying, that the Priests were Idolaters which did lift up the Bread over their heads, making the people to worship it, and making the people to believe that it was the Lord's Body; and that it was better to eat the Altar-cloth, if it might be eaten and digested as easily as the other.

Here follow moreover the names of divers other which in the Registers be specified to abjure: As,

John Southwick.

Against this John Southwick last named it was laid and objected, that when one Rivelay, coming from the Church of the Gray-Fryars in London, had said to his Wife (asking where he had been) that he had heard Maſs, and had ſeen his Lord God in form of Bread and Wine over the Prieſt's head; the aforeſaid John Southwick there preſent answered again and ſaid: Nay, William, thou ſaweſt not thy Lord God, thou ſaweſt but Bread and Wine and the Chalice. And when the ſaid William answered again in the ſame words as before, ſaying, I truſt verily that I ſaw my Lord God in form of Bread and Wine, and this I doubt not: the other replying again, answered and ſaid as before; Nay, I tell thee thou ſaweſt but only a Figure or Sacrament of him, the which is in ſubſtance Bread and Wine, &c. This was in the Year of our Lord 1520. In which he was compelled to abjure.

Content of

All the above-named, in one Key of Doctrine and Religion, did hold and concord together: againſt whom were objected five or fix ſpecial matters: to wit, for ſpeaking againſt worſhipping of Saints, againſt Pilgrimage, againſt invocation of the bleſſed Virgin, againſt the Sacrament of the Lord's Body, and for having Scripture-Books in Engliſh: which Books eſpecially I find to be named, as theſe, the Book of the four Evangelists, a Book of the Epistles of Paul and Peter, the Epistle of St. James, a Book of the Apoſtles, and of Antichriſt, of the Ten Commandments, and Wickliffe's Wicket, with ſuch other like.

John Stilman Martyr.

1518.

IT would ask a long tractation, and tedious, to recite in order the great multitude and number of good Men and Women, beſides theſe above-rehearſed, which in thoſe days recanted and abjured about the beginning of King Henry's Reign and before: among whom yet notwithstanding ſome there were whom the Lord reduced again, and made ſtrong in the profeſſion of his Truth, and conſtant unto death: of which number one was John Stilman by name, who about September 24, in the Year of our Lord 1518, was apprehended and brought before Richard Fitzjames then Biſhop of London, at his Manor of Fulham, and by him was there examined and charged, that notwithstanding his former Recantation, Oath, and Abjuration, made about eleven years then paſt, before Edmund then Biſhop of Salisbury, as well for ſpeaking againſt the worſhipping, praying, and offering unto Images; as alſo for denying the carnal and corporal preſence in the Sacrament of Chriſt's Memorial: yet ſince that time he had fallen into the ſame Opinions again, and ſo into the danger of relapſe: and further had highly commended and praiſed John Wicliffe, affirming that he was a Saint in Heaven, and that his Book called the Wicket was good and holy. Soon after his examination he was ſent from thence unto the Lollards Tower at London, and October 22, then next enſuing, was brought openly into the Conſistory of Paul, and was there judicially examined by Thomas Hed the Biſhop's Vicar-general, upon the contents of theſe Articles following:

John Stilman Martyr.

Wicliffe's Wicket. For Regis. Fitzjames London.

Articles laid againſt John Stilman.

1. Firſt I object unto you, that you have confeſſed before my Lord of London and me D. Hed his Vicar-general, That about twenty years paſt, one Stephen Moore of the Dioceſs of Wincheſter, (with whom you abode fix or ſeven years after) did teach you to believe that the going on Pilgrimage and worſhipping of Images, as the Lady of Walſingham and others, were not to be uſed. And alſo that afterwards one Richard Smart, who was burned at Salisbury about fourteen or fifteen years paſt, did read unto you Wickliffe's Wicket, and likewiſe inſtructed you to believe that the Sacrament of the Altar was not the Body of Chriſt: all which things you have erroneouſly believed.

Years of Antiquity to be noted. A godly Martyr. Rich. Smart burned at Salisbury. Anno 1509.

Wickliffe's Wicket.

2. Item, You have divers times read the ſaid Book called Wickliffe's VVicket, and one other Book of the Ten Commandments which the ſaid Richard Smart did give you, and at the time of your firſt apprehenſion you did hide them in an old Oke, and did not reveal them unto the Biſhop of Salisbury, before whom you were abjured of Hereſy about eleven years ſince; where you promiſed by Oath upon the Evangelists, ever after to believe and hold as the Chriſtian Faith taught and preached, and never to offend again in the ſaid Hereſies, or any other, upon pain of relapſe. And further, you there promiſed to perform all ſuch penance as the ſaid Biſhop of Salisbury did enjoin you: who then enjoined you upon the like pain, not to depart his Dioceſs without his ſpecial licence.

3. Item, It is evident that you be relapſed, as well by your own confeſſion, as alſo by your deeds, in that about two years after your abjuration you went into the ſaid place where you had hidden your Books; and then taking them away with you, you departed the foreſaid Dioceſs, without the licence of the Biſhop, and brought them with you to London, where now being attached and taken with them upon great ſuſpicion of Hereſy, you are brought unto the Biſhop of London: by reaſon of which your demeanour, you have ſhewed both your impenitent and diſſembled converſation from your errors, and alſo your unfaithful abjuration and diſobedience unto the authority of our mother holy Church, in that you performed not the penance; in which behalf you be voluntarily perjured, and alſo relapſed, in that you departed the ſame Dioceſs without licence.

4. Item, You be not only (as afore ſaid) impenitent, diſobedient, voluntarily perjured and relapſed by this your foreſaid heretical demeanour, but alſo ſentence your laſt attachment upon ſuſpicion of Hereſy, you have maliciously ſpoken erroneous and damnable words, affirming before my Lord of London, your Ordinary and me, judicially ſitting at Fulham, that you were forry that ever you did abjure your ſaid Opinions, and had not ſuffered then manfully for them, for they were and be good and true; and therefore you will now abide by them to die for it. And furthermore, you have ſpoken againſt our holy Father the Pope, and his Authority, damnable ſaying that he is Antichriſt, and not the true ſucceſſor of Peter, or Chriſt's Vicar on earth: and that his Pardons and Indulgences, which he granteth in the Sacrament of Penance, are naught, and that you will none of them. And likewiſe that the College of Cardinals be Limbs of the ſaid Antichriſt: and that all other inferior Prelats and Prieſts are the Synagogue of Satan. And moreover you ſaid, that the Doctors of the Church have ſubverted the Truth of holy Scripture, expounding it after their own minds, and therefore their works be naught, and they in Hell: but that Wickliffe is a Saint in Heaven, and that the Book called his Wicket is good, for therein he ſheweth the Truth. Alſo you did with that there were twenty thouſand of your Opinion, againſt us Scribes and Phariſees, to ſee what you would do for the defence of your Faith. All which Hereſies you did afterwards erroneouſly affirm before the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and then ſaid that you would abide by them to die for it, notwithstanding his earneſt perſwaſions to the contrary: and therefore for theſe Premies you be evidently relapſed, and ought to be committed to the ſecular Power.

Wickliffe's Wicket.

After theſe Articles thus propounded, and his conſtant perſevering in the Truth perceived, Dr. Hed Vicar-general, October 25, by his Sentence definitive, did condemn him a relapſed Heretic, and ſo delivered him the ſame preſent day unto the Sheriffs of London, to be openly burned in Smithfield.

Thomas Man Martyr.

NExt to John Stilman above-mentioned, followeth in this order of bleſſed Martyrs, the perſecution and condemnation of Thomas Man: who March 29, in the year of our Lord 1518, was burned in Smithfield. This Thomas Man had likewiſe been apprehended for the profeſſion of Chriſt's Goſpel about fix years before, Auguſt 14, 1511, and being at that time brought before Dr. Smith Biſhop of Lincoln, was by him examined upon divers and ſundry Articles, the effect whereof are theſe:

Th. Man Martyr.

1. Firſt, That he had ſpoken againſt Auricular Confeſſion, and denied the corporal Preſence of Chriſt's Body in the Sacrament of the Altar.

The Articles of Th. Man.

2. Item, That he believed that all holy Men of his Sect were only Prieſts.

3. Item, That he had affirmed that the Father of Heaven was the Altar, and the ſecond Perſon the Sacrament; and that upon the Aſcenſion day the Sacrament aſcended unto the Altar, and there abideth ſtill.

4. Item, That he believed not aright in the Sacrament of Extreame Unction.

5. Item,

The burning of John Stillman

The burning of Thomas Man

5. Item, That he had called certain Priests, meanly arrayed, pild Knaves.

6. Item, That he had said that Pulpits were Priests lying Stools.

7. Item, That he had believed that Images ought not to be worshipped, and that he neither believed in the Crucifix, nor yet would worship it.

8. Item, That he had affirmed that he heard say, the Word of God and God to be all one, and that he that worthily receiveth the Word of God, receiveth God.

9. Item, That he had said that the Popish Church was not the Church of God, but a Synagogue: and that holy Men of his Sect were the true Church of God.

For these and such-like matters was he a long time imprisoned, and at last, through frailty and fear of death, was content to abjure and yield himself unto the judgment of the Romish Church, and thereupon was enjoined, not only to make his open recantation, but also from thenceforth to remain as Prisoner within the Monastery of Osney besides Oxford, and so to bear a Faggot before the first Cross, at the next general Procession within the University. Howbeit not long after, the Bishop having need of the poor Man's help in his household business, took him out of the said Monastery, and placed him within his own House until his business was ended; and then (his turn once served) he appointed Dr. Wilcock his Vicar-general, that in his judicial Session within the Priory of Fridefwide at Oxford, he should assign him to remain within the said Priory, and not to depart thence without license of the Prior for the time being, upon pain of relapse: and upon like pain he also enjoined him to wear the sign of a Faggot under his uppermost garment, until he were dispensed withal for the same. All which notwithstanding, he (being belike both sorry for his offence in denying the Truth, and also weary of his servile and prison-like bondage) bethought himself how he might best escape their cruel hands; and therefore after a while seeing good opportunity offered him, he fled the diocess and jurisdiction of Lincoln, and seeking abroad in other Countries for work, thereby to sustain his poor life, he most commonly abode, sometime in Essex, sometime in Suffolk; where also he associated and joined himself unto such godly professors of Christ's Gospel as he there could hear of. But within few years after (such is the cruel rage of Satan and his wicked Members, which never suffer the Godly long to continue untroubled)

he was again accused of relapse by the Inquest of the Inquisition of London, and thereupon was apprehended and brought before Richard Fitzjames then Bishop of London, and Feb. 9. 1518. he was examined by Dr. Hed the Bishop's Vicar-general, within his Palace at London: where the said Hed, judicially assisted with divers of his Complices, declared first unto Man, that forasmuch as he was since his first abjuring, again detected and accused, by certain credible and honest Persons, of the same Heresies which he had once before recanted: And further (contrary to the order of Penance enjoined him by the late Bishop of Lincoln) he had departed the Priory of St. Fridefwide and the Diocess of Lincoln, without leave either of the Bishop or Prior; and was now also found within the Diocess of London, and that without his badge assigned him by the said Bishop's Vicar-general: he therefore as Chancellor and Vicar-general unto the Bishop of London, deputed for that purpose, did then mean to proceed against him as a relapser, by order of the Ecclesiastical Laws in that behalf provided. Wherefore he appointed him to appear again in the Consistory of Pauls, Feb. 12. next after, there to answer unto such Articles as then should be propounded against him. At which day and place, the Chancellor (first reciting the causes above-mentioned, why he did then proceed against him) objected unto him these Articles following:

1. First, That he was of the Diocess of London.

2. Item, That he was a Christian Man, and professed Christ's Faith, and the determinations of holy Church concerning the seven Sacraments, and other Articles of the Catholick Faith.

3. Item, That it was not lawful for any Man (especially a lay-man) erroneously and obstinately to hold, teach, or defend any Opinion contrary unto the determinations of the said Church; and that the Person so doing is an Heretic.

4. Item, That within one of the twelve months of the year of our Lord 1511, he had been detected before the Bishop of Lincoln that then was, of divers points of Heresy; as that he had affirmed, that the very Body and Blood of Christ was not in the Sacrament of the Altar, but material Bread and Wine, and that he had received it at Easter as holy Bread: and likewise had affirmed, that the Crucifix and other Images in the Church, were not to be worshipped; and also, that confession made unto a Priest was of none effect; with divers other-like Opinions and Heresies.

5. Item,

Tho. Man's second time apprehended.

The cause of his Martyrdom.

Articles objected against Thomas Man.

Against the real presence in the Sacrament.

Th. Man sent to the Monastery of Osney.

Th. Man sent to the Monastery of Fridefwide.

Th. Man fled out of the Monastery.

K. Hen. 8.

5. Item, That for these and such-like points of Herefy he had been abjured in St. Mary's Church at Oxford, before Dr. VVilebeck Chancellor unto the said Bishop of Lincoln, in the month of October, in the year last above said, and there did renounce them and all other, promising to fall no more into the like.

6. Item, That there also he had taken a solemn Oath, to do such Penance as should be enjoined him by the Authority of the said Bishop.

7. Item, That then he was enjoined to abide within the Monastery of Osney by Oxford: and also there to bear a Fagot before the first Cross in the general Procession.

8. Item, That after a certain time that he had been in the Monastery of Osney, the Bishop of Lincoln (for certain causes) took him into his own house and service, respiteing his Penance for a time.

9. Item, That afterwards, which was Octob. 9. 1512. the said Bishop's Chancellor judicially sitting in the Chapter-house of the Priory of St. Frideswide in Oxford, did enjoin him that he should tarry within the said Priory, and not go out of the gates thereof, without license of the Prior for the time being, until he had other commandment from the Bishop, upon pain of relapse: And further, that he should from thenceforth, upon the like pain, wear a sign of a Fagot under his uppermost garment.

10. Item, That after his abjuration, and since the premises thus done, he was yet again detected to the Bishop of London by open fame, and denounced by worshipful and credible persons, that he had used like false Errors and Heresies, and had spoken and taught certain conclusions of Herefy against the Christian Faith, and determinations of holy Church: and that he had fallen into the like Heresies as before his abjuration, both against the Sacrament of the Altar, against Pilgrimages and worshipping of Images: and had blasphemed our blessed Lady, calling her Mably.

He meant some Image or Picture of the Virgin, set up in some blind place to be worshipped.

11. Item, That when he wrought with one John Bates, in Stratford Langthorne in Rogation-week then three years past, and being bidden by the said Bates's Wife to go and hear the Gospel, he answered and said unto her, I will not go there, go you if you list, ye shall have as much need for it, as to put your finger in the fire and to burn it.

12. Item, That in times past, for fear of abjuration, he had fled from Colebecher to Newbery, and after that unto Hamerham, and had there damnable accompanied with Hereticks, and had taught heresies among them: and also since the time of his abjuration he had said, that he and his Wife had turned fix or seven hundred people unto those Opinions which he was abjured of, and others also, contrary to Christ's Faith, and determinations of Holy Church.

His answer unto these Articles was, that as touching the first nine, he granted them in part to be true; confessing to the second, that he was a true Christian, and did profess the true Christian Faith; but the contents of the last three he utterly denied to be true; affirming for certain answer unto the Eleventh Article, that at the time mentioned in the same, he did not work in the Town of Stratford. Upon which answer, the Chancellor called forth two Witnesses to be sworn and examined against him, willing him that if he had any just matter against any of them, he should refuse them. But to what purpose this his fair offer and trust shew of upright Justice served, I cannot see: For notwithstanding that he charged one of the Witnesses with theft and adultery, (for that having a Wife of his own, he did yet run away with another Man's Wife and Goods) and also alleged that the other was too young, to be a sworn Witness in case of life and death: yet were they both fully retained and allowed by the Chancellor, and sworn not to depart away or hide themselves, but to be always ready to justify that which they had to say against the said Thomas Man: and so for that time as well they as also all the rest were commanded to depart, and the Prisoner sent again to his Prison.

And here in the order of the Oath ministred unto these Witnesses, I had one note (me thinketh) worthy present remembrance both for that it is mentioned in the Process, and also because it somewhat openeth the foolish, ridiculous, and feigned figurative ceremonies of the Papists, who do attribute a spiritual signification almost unto all their doings. The Register, discoursing at large the manner of their Oath, hath these words: Ad Sancta Dei Evangelia jurari fecit, tribus mediis digitis crectis, & super librum positum, in signum Trinitatis, & fidei Catholice: & duobus (videlicet pollice & auriculari) suppositis & suppressis, & sub libro positum, in signum damnationis corporis & anime, si non deposuerunt veritatem in hac parte. That is to say; He caused them to swear upon the Holy Evangelists, with their three middle fingers stretched out right, and laid upon the Book in sign of the Trinity, and Catholic Faith, and the other two (to wit, the thumb and the little finger) put downwards under the Book, in token of damnation of Body and Soul, if they did not depose the truth in the matter. This ceremonial order and exposition of theirs, as it is of their own fond invention, without any ground or example of the Scriptures of God, so mind I to leave it still unto themselves, with other their apish toys and ridicules, as things worthy to be laughed at; and will now further proceed with the rest of this Process which I have in hand.

The 15th of February, D. Had the Chancellor again judicially sitting in the Confraternity at Pauls, commanded Thomas Man to be brought before him, and there causing the Articles objected against him by the Bishop of Lincoln, with his order of Abjuration and Penance, and also his own Articles last propounded, to be first read; he called forth a third Witness to be sworn and examined upon the same. But because he would seem to do all things by order of Justice, and nothing against Law, he therefore appointed unto the said Thomas Man certain Doctors and Advocates of the Arches, as his Counsellors to plead in his behalf.

Which was even like as if the Lamb should be committed to the defence and protection of the Wolf, or the Hare to the Hound. For what good help could he look for at their hands, which were both most wicked haters and abhorers of his Christian Profession, and also stout upholders and maintainers of that Antichristian Law, by the which he was for the same condemned? And that full well appeared by the good advice and profitable counsel which they gave him against his next examinations. For as well upon the 20th, and also the 23d days of the same month of February, in their several Sessions, he seeing his own Negations to their Objections taking no place against their sworn Witnesses, had no other thing to alledge for himself, but that, through his twenty weeks of hard imprisonment under the Bishop of Lincoln, he was forced to recant and abjure; which was a poor shift of Counsel, God knoweth: and yet Dr. Rayner being one of his chief assigned Advocates, instead of advice, could by his subtil questioning then make him confess, that certain talk whereof one of the Witnesses had accused him, was spoken about five years before past: which, because it was since his recantation, was rather an accusation of himself, than an excusing: and therefore it is easy to judge with how favourable and upright hearts they took upon them to be his Advocates and Defenders. The Chancellor likewise charged him upon the same 23d day, that since his last imprisonment, he had said unto Robert Chany the Bishop's Sumner, and his Keeper, that as far forth as he could see or perceive for his part in this matter, the Laws of the Church were grounded upon Pilar and Caiphas. Which Objection he granting to be true, the Chancellor did for that time dismiss the Court, until the first day of March next following.

Upon which day (minding to make quick dispatch) he in few words asked Man, what matter he had to alledge for himself why he should not then (considering the Premises) be pronounced a relapsed Heretic, and receive such punishment by the secular Power, as to such was due by order of Law? But he having no other allegations than before, which might take place with them, was finally condemned as an Heretic. And notwithstanding that, as the Register noteth (but how truly God only knoweth) he did again forsake his former renewed profession of Christ's Gospel, and yielded himself unto the Bishop of Rome, requiring to be absolved from his curse of Excommunication, and contented to do such Penance as they should enjoin him, he was yet March 29, delivered by Dr. Had unto the Sheriff of London, to be then presently burned with this Protestation made before, that he might not consent to the death of any, and therefore he desired the Sheriff that he would receive this Person as relapsed and condemned, and yet to punish him otherwise than by rigorous rigor. The words to be marked in their Sentence be these: Rogamus attente in visceribus Jesu Christi, ut hujusmodi digne severitatis ultio & executio de te & contra te in hac parte fienda taliter moderetur, ut non sit rigor rigidus, neque mansuetudo dissoluta, sed ad salutem & sanitatem anime tue, &c. That is, we desire, in the Bowels of our Lord Jesus Christ, that the punishment and execution of due severity, of thee, and against thee in this part, may so be moderate, that there be no rigorous rigour, nor yet no desolute mansuetude, but to the health and wealth of thy Soul, &c. Wherein these Catholick Church-men do well declare, according to the words of Thomas Man before expressed, that the Laws of their Church be grounded upon Pilat and Caiaphas. For like as Caiaphas with his Court of Pharisees cried against Christ unto Pilat: It is not lawful for us to put any Man to death; but if thou let him go, thou art not Cæsar's Friend. Even so they, first condemning the Saints of God to death, and then delivering them unto the secular Magistrate to be thereupon executed, would yet cover their malignant hearts with the cloak of hypocritical holiness and unwillingness to shed blood. But God be thanked, which bringeth all things to light in his due time, and uncovereth hypocrisy at last, that the may be seen and known in her right colours.

Thus Thomas Man, the manly Martyr of Jesus Christ, being condemned by the unjust Sentence of Hed the Chancellor, was delivered to the Sheriff of London sitting on horseback in Pater-noster-row, before the Bishop's door, An. 1518. he protesting to the said Sheriff, that he had no power to put him to death, and therefore desired the Sheriff to take him as a Relapser and condemned, to see him punished; Et tamen citra mortem, that is, without death, as the words stand in the Register. The Sheriff receiving neither Articles to be read at his burning, nor any Indentures of that his delivery, immediately carried him to Smithfield, and there the same day in the forenoon caused him to be put into God's Angel; according to the words of the said Tho. Man before saying, that if he were taken again of the pild knave Priests, as he called them, he wist well he should go to the Holy Angel, and then be an Angel in Heaven.

In the Deposition of one Tho. Risby Weaver of Stratford-Langborn, against the forenamed Martyr Tho. Man it appeareth by the Registers, that he had been in divers Places and Countries in England, and had instructed very many, as at Amerham, at London, at Billerica, at Chelmsford, at Stratford-Langborn, at Uxbridge, at Burnham, at Henley upon Thames, in Suffolk and Norfolk, at Newbery, and divers places more: where he himself testifieth, that as he went Weltward, he found a great company of well-disposed Persons, being of the same judgement touching the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper that he was of, and especially at Newbery, where was (as he confessed) a glorious and sweet society of faithful Favourers, who had continued the space of fifteen years together, till at last by a certain Lewd Person, whom they trusted and made of their Council, they were bewrayed; and then many of them, to the number of six or seven-score, were abjured, and three or four of them burnt. From thence he came then (as he confessed) to the Forest of Windsor, where he, hearing of the Brethren which were at Amerham, removed thither, where he found a godly and a great company, which had continued in that doctrine and teaching 23 years, which was from this present time feventy years ago. And this Congregation of Backinghamshire Men, remained till the time of John Longland Bishop of Lincoln, whereof we shall (Christ willing) hear more anon. Against these faithful Christians of Amerham, was great trouble and persecution in the time of William Smith Bishop of Lincoln, about the Year of our Lord 1507, at which time divers and many were abjured, and it was called Abjuratio magna, the great Abjuration; and they which were noted of that Doctrine and Profession, were called by the name of known Men, or just fast Men, &c. In this Congregation of the faithful Brethren, were four principal Readers or Instructors. Whereof one was Tilleyworth, called then Dr. Tilleyworth, who was burnt at Amerham, mentioned in our History before, by the name of William Tilley, whom I suppose to be rather called Tilleyworth. Another was Thomas Chafe, called amongst them Dr. Chafe, whom we declared before to be murdered and hanged in the Bishop of Lincoln's Prison at Woborne, called Little-cage. The third was this Thomas Man, called also Dr. Man, burned as is here mentioned in Smithfield, Anno 1518, who, as by his own confession, and no less also by his travel appeareth, was God's Champion, and suffered much trouble by the Priests for the Cause and Law of God. He confessed himself in the same Register, that he had turned seven hundred People to his Religion and Doctrine, for the which he thanked God. He conveyed also five couples of Men and Women from Amerham, Uxbridge, Burnham, and Henley upon Thames, where they dwelt, unto Suffolk and Norfolk, that they might be brought (as he then termed it) out of the Devil's mouth. The fourth was Robert Cofin, named likewise among them Dr. Cofin.

Robert Cofin Martyr.

This Robert Cofin seemeth to be the same which in the former part of this History is forementioned, being called by the Name of Father Robert, and was burnt in Backingham. Of this Robert Cofin, I find in the Registers of Lincoln. That he, with Thomas Man, had instructed and persuaded one Joan Norman, about Amerham, not to go on Pilgrimage, nor to worship any Images of Saints. Also when she had bowed a piece of Silver to a Saint for the health of her Child, they dissuaded her from the same, and said, that she needed not to confesse her to a Priest, but that it was sufficient to lift up her hands to Heaven. Moreover, they were charged by the Bishop, for teaching the said Joan, that she might as well drink upon the Sunday before Mais, as any other day, &c. Ex Regist. Joan. Longland. And thus you see the Doctrine of these good Men, for the which they were in those days abjured and condemned to death.

William Sweeting, alias Clerke, Martyr.

William Sweeting, otherwise named Clerke, first dwelt with the Lady Percy at Darlington, in the County of Northampton, for a certain space, and from thence went to Boxted in the County of Essex, where he was the Holy-water Clerk the space of seven years: after that, he was Bailiff and Farmer to Mrs. Margery Wood, the term of thirteen years. From Boxted he departed and came to the Town of St. Osith, where he served the Prior of St. Osith, called George Laund, the space of sixteen years and more. Where he had so turned the Prior by his Persuasions, that the said Prior of St. Osith was afterward compelled to abjure. This William Sweeting, coming up to London with the fore said Prior, for suspicion of Heresy, was committed to the Lollard's Tower, under the custody of Charles Joseph, and there, being abjured in the Church of St. Paul, was constrained to bear a Fagot at Paul's Cross, and at Colchester; and afterward to wear a Fagot upon his Coat all his life. Which he did two years together upon his left sleeve, till at length the Parson of Colchester required him to help him in the Service of the Church, and so pluck'd the Badg from his sleeve, and there he remained two years, being the Holy-water Clerk. From thence afterward he departed, and travelling abroad, came to Roderith in the Diocess of Winchester, where he was Holy-water Clerk the space of a year. Then he went to Cheshil, where he was their Neat-herd, and kept the Town-beasts. In which Town, upon St. Ann's day in the morning, as he went forth with his Beasts to the field the good Man was apprehended and brought before the Bishop, and his Chamber searched for Books; this was Anno 1511.

The Crimes whereupon he was examined, were these:

First, For having much conference with one William Man of Boxted, in a Book which was called Matthew.

Item, That he had familiarity, and frequented much the company of James Brewster, who had been before abjured.

Item, That when his Wife would go on Pilgrimage, he asked of her, What good she should receive by her going on Pilgrimage? adding moreover, that, as he supposed, it was to no purpose nor profit, but rather it were better for her to keep at home, and to attend her business.

Item, That he had learned and received of William Man, that the Sacrament of the Altar was not the present very Body, but Bread in substance, received in memorial of Christ.

Item, That he had propounded and affirmed the same Doctrine to James Brewster.

Against Images.

And thus have you all the causes and crimes laid against this William Sweeting wherefore he was condemned: Who then being asked what cause he had why he should not be judged for relapse? said, he had nothing else, but only that he committed himself to the mercy of Almighty God.

James Brewster Martyr.

*W*ith William Sweeting also the same time was examined and condemned James Brewster, of the Parish of St. Nicholas in Colchester. This James Brewster was a Carpenter, dwelling ten years in the Town of Colchester; who, being unlettered, could neither read nor write, and was apprehended upon the day of St. James, in one Walker's house in St. Clement's Parish.

About six years before, which was Anno 1505, he had been abjured by William Warham Archbishop of Canterbury, the See of London being then vacant. And after other Penance done at Colchester, he was enjoined to wear a Fagot upon his upper garment during his life. Which badge he did bear upon his left shoulder near the space of two years, till the Controller of the Earl of Oxford plucked it away, because he was labouring in the works of the Earl.

The Crimes whereupon he was examined, and which he confessed, were these:

First, That he had been five times with William Sweeting in the fields keeping Beasts, hearing him read many good things out of a certain Book. At which reading also were present at one time Woodroof or Woodbinde a Netmaker, with his Wife; also a Brother-in-law of William Sweeting; and another time Thomas Goodred, who heard likewise the said William Sweeting read.

Item, Because he used the company and conference of Henry Hert Carpenter of Wiltshire, and wrought with him in his science at Wiltshire.

Item, For having a certain little Book of Scripture in English, of an old writing, almost worn for age, whose name is not there expressed.

Item, Because he hearing upon a time one Mr. Bardfield of Colchester thus say: That he that will not worship the Maosim in heart and thought, shall die in fight. He asked afterward of William Man, what that word Maosim should mean? who told him, that it signified as much as the making God, to wit, the Sacrament of the Altar.

Item, That he had much conference with Henry Hert, against Oblations and Images, and that it was better bestowed Money which was given to the Poor, than that which was offered in Pilgrimage.

Item, For that he had communication and conference with Roger Helsar, and one Walker a Thicker of St. Clements, concerning divers such matters of Pilgrimage, offering to Images, worshipping of Saints, and the Sacrament of the Altar.

Item, When Thomas Goodred, William Sweeting, and he, in the fields keeping Beasts, were talking together of the Sacrament of the Lord's Body, and like matters, this James Brewster should thus say: Now the Son of the living God help us. Unto whom William Sweeting again should answer, Now Almighty God so do.

And thus have you the Causes likewise and Crimes laid against James Brewster, upon which he with William Sweeting were together examined and condemned. Then being asked, as the Romish manner is, Whether he had any cause why he should not be adjudged for relapse; he trusting to find favour and grace in submitting himself, said, That he submitted him to the mercy of Almighty God, and to the favourable goodness of him his Judge. And likewise did William Sweeting submit himself, trusting belike that they should find some favour and relief in this humble subjecting themselves unto their goodness.

But note here the unmerciful and unchristian dealing of these Catholic Fathers, who upon their submission were contented to give out a solemn Communion, the tenor whereof was to release and pardon them from the sentence of Excommunication, wherein they had incurred: But immediately after upon the same, the Bishop, all this notwithstanding, pronounced upon them the Sentence of death and condemnation. Whereupon they were both delivered to the secular Power, and both together burnt in Smithfield at one Fire, the eighteenth day of October, Anno 1511.

Christopher Shoemaker Martyr.

TO these blessed Saints before-named, we will also ad-join Christopher Shoemaker; of whom this I find briefly in the Register of Sir John Longland; that the said Christopher Shoemaker, a Parishioner of great Missenden, came to the House of John Say, and after other matters of talk, read to him out of a little Book the words which Christ spake to his Disciples. And thus coming to his house about four times, at every time he read something out of the same Book unto him: teaching him not to be deceived in the Priests celebration of the Mass, and declaring that it was not the same very present Body of Christ, as the Priests did phantasie; but in substance Bread, bearing the remembrance of Christ: and taught him moreover, that Pilgrimage, worshipping and setting up Candles to Saints, were all unprofitable. And thus the said John Say being taught by this Christopher, and also confirmed by John Okenden and Robert Pope, was brought to the knowledge of the same Doctrine. Thus much briefly I find in that Register concerning Christopher Shoemaker: declaring further, that he was burned at Newbery about this time, which was Anno 1518. And thus much out of the Registers of London.

Christopher Shoemaker Martyr burnt in Newbery.

IN turning over the Registers and Records of Lincoln likewise, and coming to the year of our Lord 1420, and 1521, I find that as the light of the Gospel began more to appear, and the number of Professors to grow, so the vehemency of persecution, and stir of the Bishops began also to increase. Whereupon ensued great perturbation and grievous affliction in divers and sundry quarters of this Realm, especially about Buckinghamshire and Amsesham, Usbridge, Henly, Newbery, in the Dioceses of London, in Essex, Cokesfiter, Suffolk, and Norfolk, and other places more. And this was before the name of Luther was heard of in these Countries among the People. Wherefore they are much beguiled and misinformed, which condemn this kind of Doctrine now received, of Novelty; asking, Where was this Church and Religion forty years ago, before Luther's time? To whom it may be answered, that this Religion and form of Doctrine was planted by the Apostles, and taught by true Bishops; afterward decayed, and now reformed again: and altho it was not received nor admitted of the Pope's Clergy before Luther's time, neither yet is; yet it was received of other, in whose hearts it pleased the Lord secretly to work, and that of a great number, which both professed and suffered for the same, as in the former times of this History may appear. And if they think this Doctrine to be so new that it was not heard of before Luther's time, how then came such great persecution before Luther's time here in England? If these were of the same profession which they were of, then was their cruelty unreasonable, so to persecute their own Catholick Fraternity. And if they were otherwise, how then is this Doctrine of the Gospel so new, or the Professors thereof so late start up as they pretend them to be? But this cometh only of Ignorance, and for not knowing and considering well the Times and Antiquities of the Church which have been before us. Which if they did, they should see and say, that the Church of England hath not lacked great multitudes which tasted and followed the sweetness of God's holy Word almost in as ample manner, for the number of well-disposed hearts as now. Altho publick Authority then lacked to maintain the open preaching of the Gospel, yet the secret multitude of true Professors was not much unequal: certes the fervent Zeal of those Christian days seemed much superior to these our days and times; as manifestly may appear by their fitting up all night in reading and hearing; also by their expences and charges in buying of Books in English, of whom some gave five Marks, some more, some less, for a Book: some gave a load of Hay for a few Chapters of St. James, or of St. Paul in English. In which rarity of Books, and want of Teachers, this one thing I greatly marvel and muse at; to note in the Registers, and to consider how the Word of Truth notwithstanding did multiply so exceedingly as it did amongst them. Wherein is to be seen no doubt the marvellous working of God's mighty Power: for so I find and observe in considering the Registers, how one Neighbour resorting and conferring with another, effusions with a few words of their first or second talk, did win and turn their minds to that wherein they desired to perwade them, touching the truth of God's Word and his Sacraments. To see their travels, their earnest seeking, their burning zeals, their readings, their watchings, their sweet assemblies, their love and concord, their godly living, their faithful marrying with the Faithful, may make us now in these our days of free profession, to blush for shame.

Four principal Points they stood in against the Church of Rome; in Pilgrimage, in adoration of Saints, in reading Scripture-books in English, and in the carnal presence of Christ's Body in the Sacrament.

After the great Abjuration aforesaid, which was under William Smith Bishop of Lincoln, they were noted and termed among themselves by the name of known Men, or just fast Men: as now they are called by the name of Protestants.

As they were simple, and yet not uncircumspect in their doings, so the crafty Serpent, being more wily than they, by fraudulent subtilty did to circumvent them, that they caused the Wife to detect the Husband, the Husband the Wife, the Father the Daughter, the Daughter the Father, the Brother to disclose his Brother, and Neighbour the Neighbour. Neither were any Assemblies nor Readings kept, but both the Persons and also the Books were known, neither was any Word so closely spoken, nor Article mentioned, but it was discovered. So subtilty and slightly these Catholick Prelats did use their Inquisitions and Examinations, that nothing was done or said among these known Men, fifteen or twenty years before, so covertly, but it was brought at length to their intelligence. Such captious Interrogatories, so many Articles and suspicions they had, such Epicals and privy Scouts they sent abroad, such authority and credit they had with the King, and in the King's Name; such diligence they shewed in that behalf, so violently and impudently they abused the Book of the peaceable Evangelists, wresting Men's Consciences upon their Oath, swearing them up on the same to detect themselves, their Fathers and Mothers, and other of their Kindred, with their Friends and Neighbours, and that to death. All which things in the further process of the Table ensuing (Christ willing) which we have collected out of some part of the Registers of Lincoln, shall appear.

For the better declaration whereof, first here is to be noted by the way, touching the See of Lincoln, that after Will. Smith succeeded John Longland. This VVill. Smith, altho he was somewhat eager and sharp against the poor simple Flock of Christ's Servants, under whom some were burned, many abjured, a great number molested, as partly hath been afore declared; yet was he nothing so bloody and cruel as was the said Longland, which afterward succeeded in that Diocess. For so I find of him, that in the time of the great abjuration and troublesome affliction of Buckinghamshire Men, where many were abjured, and certain burned; yet divers he sent quietly home without punishment and penance, bidding them go home and live as good Christian Men should do. And many, which were enjoined penance before, he did release. This Smith died about the year of our Lord 1515, by whom was builded, as is aforesaid, the College of Brazen-nose in Oxford.

Not long after him followed John Longland, a fierce and cruel vexer of the faithful poor Servants of Christ: who to renew again the old sparkles of persecution, which were not yet utterly quenched, first began vvith one or two of them which had been abjured, whom he thought to be most notorious, caused them, by force of their Oath, to detect and bewray not only their own Opinions touching Points of Religion, but also to discover all other of their Affinity, which were either suspected or abjured before. And them likewise he put to their Oath, most violently constraining them to utter and confess both themselves, and whom else sooner they knew. By reason vvhereof an incredible multitude of Men, Women, and Maidens, were brought forth to examination, and straightly handled. And such as vvere found in relapse were burned.

The rest were so burdened with superstitious and idolatrous Penance and Injunction, that either through grief of Conscience they shortly after died, or else vvith shame they lived. All vvich tragical doings and proceedings of the Bishop against these known and just fast Men, in these Tables

But before we enter into the Table, it shall be requisite first to hear the order and copie of his captious and crafty Interrogatories, vvhether he constrained the simple poor Men to accuse and appeach one another: vvhich Interrogatories were theie in order as followeth.

Interrogatories ministred commonly by the Bishop of Lincoln, against these Examinates here following.

Captious Interrogatories ministred by the Bishop of Lincoln.

The Interrogatories or Articles which Longland Bishop of Lincoln used most commonly to minister to these Examinates or known Men, in number were nine, and are these as followeth:

1. First, Whether they or any of them did know, that certain of the Parish of Amerham, had been converted before the said Bishop, late Bishop of Lincoln, for Herefy?
2. Item, Whether they knew that they so converted before the said Bishop, did en in the Sacrament of the Altar, or in any other Sacrament of the Church: and if they did, in vvhich Sacrament, and in vvhich of them? Also vvhether they knew that the said Parties so converted did confesse their errors, and receive penance for the same?
3. Item, Whether they, or any of them, were of the Society of them so converted for Herefy: and if they were, vvhich fellowship they had vvvith them, and vvvith vvhom?
4. Item, Whether they, or any of them, were ever conversant vvvith such a one (naming the Person vvhom they knew suspected) as vvvith Thurstan Littlepage? And if they were, vvhich conversation they had vvvith him, how long, and vvhether: and whether they knew the said Person to have been suspect of Herefy?
5. Item, Whether they, or any of them, were ever conversant vvvith him; or him (naming some other Person vvhom they suspected) as Alexander Mattall: and if they were, how, and how long? And vvhether they knew the said Person to be suspected of Herefy?
6. Item, Whether they or any of them had been beforetime detected of Herefy, to the Office of the foresaid William Bishop of Lincoln: And if they were, by vvhich person or persons they were detected? Or else, whether they were only called by the foresaid William Bishop for Herefy?
7. Item, Whether he or they be noted and holden for Hereticks; or be reputed and defamed to be of the sect of them which were converted for Herefy? and whether he or they be named for a known Man amongst them?
8. Item, Whether he or they have bin ever at any Readings of such as have bin so converted for Herefy?

9. Item, Whether he or they were ever in any secret Communication or Conventicle vvvith them? vvhom or vvhich of them he knew to be named and reputed for a known Man; or holding against the Sacrament of the Altar, or other Sacraments and Articles of Faith? and if they knew any such, to declare vvhether, and vvhhen, and vvhich they were, and vvhom were present the same time?

These Articles and Interrogatories thus declared, now followeth to be shewed a certain brief sum compendiously collected out of the Registers of John Longland Bishop of Lincoln, declaring, in order of a Table, the names first of them which by Oath were constrained against their wills to detect and accuse other. Secondly, The Persons that were accused. Thirdly, The Crimes to them objected; as in the proces of this Table shall follow to be seen.

And first; Forasmuch as the Bishop perceived that Roger Bennet, William Chedwell, Edmund Dormer, Thomas Harding, Robert Andrew, with such other, were Men especially noted to be of that side; therefore to work his purpose the better, he began with them; producing the same as Witnesses, to detect first Robert Bartlet of Amerham, and Richard his Brother; understanding that these forenamed Witnesses, because they had been abjured before, durst now do no other, upon pain of relapse, but needs confesse whatsoever was put unto them. And therefore because Robert Bartlet and Richard his Brother, being called before the Bishop, and sworn upon their Oath, would confesse nothing against themselves; the Bishop, to convict them by Witnesses, went first to William Chedwell, lying sore sick in his Bed, causing him upon the Evangelists to swear, whether he knew the foresaid Robert and Richard Bartlet to be known Men. Which being done, the Bishop then called before him Robert Andrew, Roger Bennet, John Hill, Edmund Dormer, John Milfint, Thomas Bernard, Thomas Littlepage, John Duff, all Amerham Men: Who being abjured before, as is said, durst no otherwise do, but confesse upon their Oath, that Robert and Richard Bartlet were known Men. And yet the Bishop, not contented with this, caused also their two Wives, to wit, Margaret the Wife of Robert Bartlet, and Isabel the Wife of Richard Bartlet, to depose and give witness against their own natural Husbands. Albeit Isabel Bartlet, being somewhat more temperate of her tongue, refused utterly to confesse any thing of her Husband, and denied her Husbands words to be true; till at last, the being convict of Perjury, was constrained to utter the truth, as in the proces of this Table following more particularly followeth to be seen.

A Table, describing the grievous affliction of good Men and Women in the Diocese of Lincoln, under John Longland their Bishop; with the names both of the Accusers, and of them that were Accused: Also with the Crimes to them objected: Out of the Registers of the said Diocese, Anno 1521.

Will. Chedwell sick in his Bed. Robert Andrew. Rog. Bennet. John Hill. Edmund Dormer. Job. Milfint. Tho. Bernard. Thomas Littlepage.	His Robert Bartlet, and Richard his Brother, were detected by these foresaid Accusers, to be known Men , that is, to be of the same Company and Affinity with these Jurates, and others that had been abjured before in the time of William Smith Bishop of Lincoln, about the year of our Lord 1508, and that in the house of Thomas Harding they were so noted, by the words of Harding's Wife, who, speaking to Robert Bartlet , said, that she was glad that he was converted to Grace, and chosen to Almighty God; requiring him never to	John Doffet. Margaret Bartlet. Isabel Bartlet. These being before abjured, were now compelled by Oath to detect.	forfake that he was called to; for if he did, there was no Sacrifice left for him. Also the said Harding's Wife speaking to Richard Bartlet coming into her House, said, Here cometh a good Man, and I hope he will be a good Man: but he hath so much mind of buying and selling, and taking of Farms, that it putteth his mind from all goodness. By which words it appeared, said they, that he was a known Man . Item, That Robert Bartlet , speaking to Harding's Wife, said, He had thought to have called William Tisfworth false Heretick; but now he was better advised. Item, That they used the Lectures and Readings of that Company.

For reading Scripture in English.	This Robert Bartlet, and Richard his Brother first being sworn, and yet confessing nothing before the Bishop, at last were convicted by witnesses, as above appeareth, and noted therefore of Perjury. Wherefore incurring into greater danger, they were constrained at their next Examination to utter themselves, and confess what they had both done and said; that is, that the said Robert had read unto Richard his Brother a parcel of Scripture beginning thus: James the Servant of God, to the twelve kinds, &c. Item, that he heard William Tilsforth say, That Images of Saints were but Stocks and Stones, and dead things; and that he taught the same to his Brother Richard, and concealed the words of William Tilsforth. Item, That he partly believed Thomas Mastal, teaching him that the true presence of Christ was not in the Sacrament; and likewise of Images and Pilgrimages. Item, for receiving the Communion at Easter without thrift, &c.	Rich. Bartlet by his Oath was constrain- ed to detect	First, for learning the Epistle of St. James in English of Thurstan Littlepage. Secondly, for not believing the bodily presence in the Sacrament. Thirdly, for speaking against worship- ping of Images, and going on Pilgrimages Old Father Bartlet, his Father. This Richard Bartlet also in his Confession said of his Father, that he was a better Man than he was taken for: for the other day there came a Man to him as he was thrashing, and said, God speed Father Bartlet, ye work sore: Yea, said he, I thresh God Almighty out of the Straw.	The Poet God Almighty ry threshed out of the Straw.
The Brother detecteth the Brother.	Richard Bartlet his Brother. The Crime whereof Robert Bartlet accused his Brother Richard was this: Because, he said, his Brother Richard had been much conversant with Thurstan Littlepage, and had learned of him the counsels and secrets of those Men: Also that he had learned of him some of the Epistle of St. James, thus beginning: James the Servant of God, to the twelve kinds, &c.		Against this Agnes Wellis brought and examined before the Bishop, were ministred these Interrogatories, which for certain causes I thought here to insert, for our Posterity to note and consider; and they are these that follow: Articles ministred to Agnes Wellis: 1. Whether she knew that certain of the Parish of Amersham were converted before William Smith late Bishop of Lincoln for Heresy? 2. Item, Whether she knew that certain of them, so converted before the Bishop for Heresy, did err in the Sacrament of the Altar, or in other Sacraments, and what Errors they were, and wherein? 3. Item, Whether she knew any other to be suspect of the same Heresy or Sect, beside them of Amersham so converted, who they were, and how many? 4. Item, Whether she had been of the same company, or sect, or opinion with them, which were converted before the Bishop for Heresy? and if she were, what company she used, and whole? 5. Item, Whether she was at any time conversant with Thurstan Littlepage? and if she were, how oft she had been in his company, how, what time, in what place, who else were present, for what causes, and whether she knew him to be suspected for Heresy? 6. Item, Whether she knew and had been conversant with Alexander Mastal? and if she were, how, when, in what place, who were present, for what causes, and whether she knew him suspected for Heresy? 7. Item, Whether she was ever detected to the Office of W. Smith, late Bishop of Lincoln, at what time, or since the time that Littlepage and Mastal were converted before the Bishop for Heresy? and whether she was then called and converted before the Bishop for Heresy, or not? 8. Item, Whether she had been, or is now noted, had, holden, reputed, or defamed to be of the same Sect with Thurstan Littlepage, or other convicted of Heresy? and whether she be, or hath been nominated for a Known Woman among them? 9. Item, Whether she had been present at any time at the readings or conferings between Thurstan Littlepage and other Convicts? 10. Item, Whether Thurstan Littlepage did ever teach her the Epistle of St. James, or the Epistles of St. Peter or Paul in English? and whether she had repeated oft-times the Epistle of St. James unto the said Thurstan, in the presence of Richard Bartlet her Brother? 11. Item, Whether Richard Bartlet her Brother did teach her at any time the Epistle of St. James? and if he did, how oft, and in what place? 12. Item, Whether she had been instructed by Thurstan Littlepage, or by any other in the foresaid Sect, that in the Sacrament of the Altar was not the true Body of Christ, but only the substance of Bread? 13. Item, Whether she had been instructed by Thurstan Littlepage, or any other, that Pilgrimage was not to be used, nor the Images of Saints to be adored? 14. Item, Whether she did credit the said Thurstan Littlepage, or any other, teaching her in the Premises? and whether she did believe or expressly consent with them in the foresaid Articles?	Articles mini- stred a- gainst Agnes Wellis.
The Hof- band de- tecteth the Wife.	Isabel Bartlet, his Wife. The cause wherein Robert Bartlet did detect his Wife, was this: That when the Bishop's Servant was come for her Husband, she uttered these words, saying, Alas! he was now an undone Man, and she but a dead Woman. Furthermore, the said Robert being demanded of the Bishop, Whether he knew Isabel his Wife to be of the Sect of Heretics before he married her, said, Yea. Being asked again, If she had not been of that Sect, whether then he would have married her? he granted the same likewise.
Robert Bart- let was brought to examination, and caused by his Oath to de- tect,	Agnes Wellis, his Sister. Furthermore, the said Robert Bartlet detected his own Sister, in that he had twice instructed her not to worship Images, and also had taught her in the Epistle of St. James.
The Brother accuseth the Sister.	Elizabeth Dean, Wife of Richard Dean of West-Wicam. Emme Tilsforth, Wife of William Tilsforth. William Grinder and his Wife. John Scruener. Alexander Mastal. William Tilsforth. Thurstan Littlepage. John Bartlet, his Brother. The said Robert Bartlet detected also these to be of the number of Known Men, for that they reformed many times together, reading and confering among themselves, and talking against worshipping of Images, and Pilgrimages. And if any came in amongst them which was not of their side, then they would say no more, but keep all silence, &c.
	Agnes Wellis, Wife of John Wellis, his Sister. This Agnes was detected of her Brother in three points:			For reading the Scripture in English.

15. Item, Whether that Robert Bartlet her Brother did ever teach her the Epistle of St. James? and if he did, how often, and where?

16. Item, Whether the said Robert Bartlet had taught her, that Pilgrimage was not to be used, and that Images were not to be adored?

17. Item, Whether the knew such a Law and Custom among them, that such as were not of that sort did contract matrimony only with themselves, and not with other Christians?

18. Item, Whether she did ever hear Thurstan or any other say, that they only which were of their Doctrine were true Christians?

19. Item, When she came to receive, and was confessed, whether she did utter and confess her Heresies to the Priest?

Captivus Articles.

Unto these captivous and cruel interrogatory Articles mislaid against Agnes Welles, she answered negatively almost to all of them, refusing to utter any Person unto the Bishop. But soon after, being otherwise schooled, I cannot tell how, by the Catholics, she was compelled to detect both her self, her Brother Robert Bartlet, Thurstan Littlepage, and also Isabel Morwin, Wife of John Morwin, &c.

Isabel Bartlet was then brought and examined before the Bishop; where she

She excuseth her own words.

Being asked whether she spake these words following to her Husband, at the coming of the Bishop's Man; Alas! now are you an undone Man, and I but a dead Woman?

First, she stood in long denial of the same; and altho her Husband gave witness against her, yet stood she that her Husband said not truth. At last she was compelled to grant those words to be spoken; and then being asked what she meant by them? thus she excuseth her self, That her Husband had been unkind to her a long time, and therefore she desired to depart from him; whereupon now for sorrow she spake these words, &c.

The which words her Husband did excuse something otherwise, saying, That his Wife spake those words between the Threshold and the Hall-door, because of a vehement fear of the loss of her Goods.

The Crime laid to Alice Harding was this: because when the Priest was coming to Richard Bennet to give him counsel, she went before, and instructed him what he should do.

William Rogers, Tyler.

William Harding.

Roger Harding.

These were detected by Roger Bennet, for that they being admonished to appear before the Bishop's Chanceller at Amerisham, neglected so to do.

J. Jennings, Servant to James Morden.

George, Servant of T. Toche.

Thomas Gray, Servant of Roger Bennet.

These were detected for carrying about certain Books in English.

William Smith, Wheeler.

The Wife of Jo. Millett.

Roger Bennet by like compulsion of his Oath was caused to detect these Persons:

Accusers.

Parties accused, and Crimes objected.

These good Women here named were detected to the Bishop by Roger Bennet, for that upon the Holy-days, when they go and come from the Church, they use to resort unto one J. Collingworth's House, and there to keep their Conventicle.

The Wife of David Lewis, and her Father.

This Woman was charged for speaking these Words: That the Churchmen in old time did lead the People as the Hen doth lead her Chickens; but our Priests do now lead the People to the Devil.

Agnes Frank, Wife of William Frank.

J. George. J. Gardiner.

J. Samme. James Morden.

Because she turned away her face from the Cross, as it was carried about on Easter-day in the morning at the Resurrection. Fol. 10.

Tho. Rowland put likewise to his Oath, did detect,

John Scrivenor the elder.

For carrying about Books from one to another.

Thomas Rowland,

For these words following: If I lie, curse, storm, swear, chide, fight, or threat, then am I worthy to be beat: I pray you, good Master of mine, if I offend in any of these nine, amend me with a good scouring.

Thomas Chose.

In the like sort also was charged Thomas Chose, because he heard him twice recite the Epistle of St. James, beginning: James the Servant of God, and of our Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve kinds, &c.

Also for these words: It was by the days of Herod King of the Jews, that there was a Priest, Zachary by name, and he came of the sort of Abias, and his Wife the daughter of Aaron; both they were just before God, going in all the Commandments, &c.

James Morden compelled in like manner by his Oath, did detect,

William Noron.

Agnes Alsford of Christham.

The cause laid to this Agnes was for teaching this James the words following:

*We be the Salt of the Earth; if it be purvised and vanished away, it is nothing worth. A City set upon an Hill may not be hid. To send not a Candle, and put it under a Bushel, but set it on a Candlestick, that it may give a light to all in the House. So shine your Lights before Men, as they may see your Work, and glorify the Father which is in Heaven. No tittle nor letter of the Law shall pass over till all things be done. And five times went he to the foresaid Agnes to learn this Lesson. Item, That the said Agnes did teach him to say this Lesson: *Jesus seeing his People, as he went up to a Hill, was set, and his Disciple came to him; he opened his mouth, and taught them, saying, Blessed be the poor Men in Spirit, for the Kingdom of Heaven is theirs. Blessed be, mild Men, for they shall wield the Earth. And twice he came to her to learn this Lesson. Ex Regist. Longland, fol. 11.

And these Lessons the said Agnes was bid to recite before six Bishops, who straightway enjoined and commanded her, that she should teach those Lessons no more to any Man, and especially to her Children. Ex Regist. fol. 11.

Note, gentle Reader, what Heresy is here.

John Philp.	Bishop Longland seeking how to convict John Philp of Perjury, (who, being charged with an Oath, did not answer affirmatively unto such Suspitions as were laid unto him by Thomas Holmer, and other several Accusers) did examine Sybil Africk his own Sister, upon her Oath to detect John Philp her Brother of Relapse; but the so answered, that the Bishop could take by her no great hold of Relapse against him. Wherein is to be noted the singular Iniquity and Abuse in the Church of Rome, which by virtue of Oath setteth the Sister to procure the Brother's Blood. The like also was fought by Thomas Africk his Sister's Husband; but they had by him no vantage.		Also because Joan his Wife had lent to this John Scrivener the Gospel of St. Matthew and Mark, which Book he gave to Bishop Smith.
Jenkin Butler did appeach	John Butler his own Brother, For reading to him in a certain Book of the Scripture, and persuading him to hearken to the same. Robert Carder. Richard Butler his Brother. Tho. Rowland of Amergham. It was objected to Tho. Rowland for speaking these words: Ah good Lord! where is all our good communication which was wont to be amongst us when your Master was alive? Tho. Grove of London, Butcher. Wil. Glasbrooke of Harrow on the Hill. Christopher Glasbrooke of London. William Tilsforth of London, Goldsmith. Apprentice sometimes to John Barret. He was appeached, because he was present in the House of John Barret, at the reading of Scripture. John Wood of Henley. William Wood. Lewis of Henley, Serving-man. Willie and his Son. This Willie was appeached, because he taught the Gospel of Matthew to John Wood and William Wood, after the great Abjuration; and Father Robert did teach them St. Paul's Epistle, which old Father was after that burned at Buckingham.
W. Ameriden did detect	Isabel Tracer, Wife of John Tracer, Because she came not to the Church often on the Work-days, being admonished both by the Churchwardens, by the Graduates of the Church, and by Dr. Cooke Commissary, but followed her business at home. Anno 1521. Ex Regist. Joh. Long- land Lin- coln.		His Sister Agnes Vvard. Vvard's Wife of Marlow. Nicholas Stokeley.		John Phip. For saying that Images are not to be wor- shipped, because they are made and carved with Mans hand, and that such ought not to be worshipped.
	John Gardi- ner did ap- peach,	Because that when this Gardiner said, God help us, and our Lady, and all the Saints of Heaven; then she said, What need is it to go to the feet, when we may go to the head?		John Gardiner. For that to the said VWilliam this Gardiner said, that all which are burned for this Sect are true Martyrs.
		VWilliam Stokeley. The Wife of VWilliam Deane. VWilliam Ramsay of Newbery. John Simons and his Wife of Marlow. John Gray of Marlow. David Schywood. VWilliam Schywood. Raynold Schywood.		John Stilman. Thomas Geffrey , first of Uxbridge , then of Ipswich , Taylor. For reading and teaching him in the acts and preachings of the Apostles. Item, for having a Scripture-book in English; which Book the said Geffrey gave to the Bishop of London when he was accused.
	John Say did detect	Christopher Shoemaker. John Okenden. Robert Pope. This Christopher Shoemaker had been burned a little before at Newbery.	John Butler by his Oath was forced to detect,	Item, That the said Geffrey said, that that true Pilgrimage was, barefoot to go and vi- sit the Poor, Weak, and Sick; for they are the true Images of God.
Christopher Shoemaker Martyr.				Richard Vulford. This Vulford and Thomas Geffrey told the said John Butler , that the Host consecrated was not the very true Body of Christ.
	Elizabeth Copland wit- nesseth a- gainst	Bishop Longland seeking matter against Isabel Morwin , (of whom he could take no great advantage by examinati- on) called and caused Elizabeth Copland , her own Sister, to testify against her in manner as followeth: Isabel Morwin , her own Sister. First, because in talk together, coming from their Father being at the point of death, Isabel said to her Sister Elizabeth , that all which die either pass to Hell or Hea- ven: Nay, said the other, there is between them Purgatory.		In proof whereof they said, that let a Mouse be put in the Pix with the Host, and the Mouse would eat it up. And for more proof, they declared unto the said John Butler , That there were two Priests in Essex , which put a Mouse in the Pix to a consecrated Host, and the Mouse did eat it: Afterward, the fact of these Priests being known, and brought to the Bishop, one of the Priests was burned for the same.
		Again: When Elizabeth came from the Rood of Rest, Isabel said, that if she knew so much as she hath heard, she would go no more on pilgrimage while she lived; for all Saints, said she, be in Heaven. Then asked Elizabeth , wherefore Pilgrimage was ordained of Doctors and Priests? The other said, for gain and profit. Who hath taught you this, (quoth Elizabeth) Man or Woman? Your Curate, I dare say, never learned you so. My Curate, said she, will never know so much. And moreover, said to Elizabeth her Sister, that if she would keep counsel, and not tell her Husband, she would say more. And when Elizabeth an- swered that she would not tell: but, faith the other, I will have you to swear: and because she would not swear, the other would not proceed any further.		John Clerke of Denham . Also the same Vulford and Geffrey told him and John Clerke , That holy Bread and holy Water were but a vain-glory of the World; for God never made them, but they were Mens Inventions: and that God never made Priests, for in Christ's time there were no Priests. Moreover, that Thomas Geffrey caused this John Butler divers Sundays to go to London to hear Dr. Colet .
Alice Brown forced by her Oath to detect,		John Tracer of Chelham . The cause why this John Tracer was de- nounced was this: for that he taught her in the Gospel this Saying of Jesus, Blessed be they that bear the Word of God, and keep it. Also because he taught her the eight Beati- tudes in English.	The foresaid John Butler did detect,	Andrew Fuller of Uxbridge . Because this John Butler had an old Book of Richard Vulford . Also another great Book of Andrew Ful- ler , for which he paid six shillings and four pence; and another little Book of Thomas Man , which he brought to the Bishop.
		M. Tilfworth , because she refused to detect other by vir- tue of her Oath, and denied such matter as by Witness and by the Bishop's Acts were proved against her, in pain of re- lapse the Bishop enjoined her to make certain Faggots of Cloth, and to wear the same both before her upper garment and behind, so long as she lived. Ex Regist. Longland .		Thomas Man . Moreover, this Thomas Man was appeach- ed, because he read to this Deponent ten years ago, how Adam and Eve were expelled out of Paradise; and for speaking against Pil- grimage, and worshipping of Images, and against the Singing-Service used then in Churches. This Thomas Man was burnt and died a Martyr, of whom mention is made before.
VV. Phips forced by his Oath to de- tect,		Thomas Africke . For asking how his Cousin VVidmore Clerk the elder, and John Phip did at Hin- chenden ? whether they kept the Laws of God as they were wont? Roger Parker deceased.		William King . This VWilliam King was appeached be- cause he lodged Thomas Man in his House upon a certain Holy-day at Divine Service; unto whom resorted Richard Vulford , and John Clerke , and this John Butler : to whom the said Thomas Man declared that Pilgri- mage was naught, and that Images were not to be worshipped.

	many Gods: and in Heaven there is but one God. And if there were an hundred houlded in one Parish, and as many in another, then there must be more than one God. I will not deny but it is an holy thing, but it is not the Body of the Lord that suffered passion for us: for he was once in Man's hands here, and ill intreated, and therefore he will never come in sinful Mens hands again. Also for speaking these Words: The Pope hath no authority to give pardon, and to release any Man's Soul from Sin, and so from pain; it is nothing but blinding of the People to have their Money. Also for these words, or such like: If a Man do sow twenty quarters of Corn, as Wheat, or Barley, or other Corn, he ought to deduct his Seed, and of the residue to tithes, or else he hath wrong, &c.		Item , Another time he said, That Men of the Church should be put down, and the false Gods which they make; and after that he said they should know more, and then should be a merry World. Christopher Tinker of Wickam , The cause of this Tinker's Trouble was, for that he coming to this Man's Houfe, and complaining to him of the poverty of the World, had these words: That there was never so ungoverned a People, and that they bare themselves so bold upon their Pardons and Pilgrimages, that they cared not whatsoever they did. And so he departed. And seven days after that, this Tinker coming again, asked him, how his last communication with him did please him? and he said, Well. Then the Tinker said he knew more, and that he could tell him more, and bad him that he should believe in God in Heaven; for there be many Gods in Earth, and there is but one God; and that he was once here, and was ill dealt with, and would no more come here till the Day of Dooms. And that the Sacrament of the Altar was a holy thing, but not the Flesh and Blood of Christ that was born of the Virgin: and charged him not to tell this to his Wife, and especially to his Wife's Brother, a Priest. Afterward, as the Priest was drying singeing Bread being wet, which his Sister had bought, the foresaid Thomas Clerke said, That if every one of these were a God, then were there many Gods. To whom the Priest answered, that till the holy Words were spoken over it, it was of no power, and then it was very God, Flesh and Blood; saying moreover, that it was not meet for any Lay-man to speak of such things. These words of the Priest being after recited to the Tinker by the said Clerke , then said he, Let every Man say what they will, but you shall find it as I shew you, &c. and if you will take the labour to come to my Houfe, I will shew you further proof of it, if you will take heed, &c. Against the Sacrament of the Altar.	Alſo for teaching him, that the Sacrament of the Altar is not very God, but a certain figurative thing of Chriſt in Bread: and that the Prieſt hath no power to conſecrate the Body of Chriſt. Alſo, for that the ſaid Richard did teach him in Wickliffe's Wicket , how that a Man may not make the Body of our Lord which made us: and how can we then make him again? The Father is unbegotten, and unmade: the Son is only begotten, and not made; and how then can Man make that which is unmade, ſaid he? And in the ſame Book of Wickliffe's Wicket follow the words of Chriſt thus ſpeaking: If my words be Hereſy, then am I an Hereſick; and if my words be Leaſings, then am I a Liar, &c. Alſo another Crime againſt Richard Colins : For having certain Engliſh Books, as Wickliffe's Wicket , the Goſpel of St. John , the Epistles of St. Paul , James , and Peter , in Engliſh, an Expoſition of the Apocalypſe , a Book of our Lady's Mattens in Engliſh, a Book of Colomen in Engliſh, a Book called the Prieſt's Confefſion . The Crime againſt Thomas Colins ; for that eight years paſt this Thomas Colins his Father had taught this John his Son, in the preſence of his Mother, the Ten Commandments, and namely, that he ſhould have but one God, and ſhould worſhip nothing but God alone; and that to worſhip Saints, and go on Pilgrimage, was Idolatry. Alſo, that he ſhould not worſhip the Sacrament of the Altar as God, for that it was but a Token of the Lord's Body. Which thing ſo much diſcontented this John Colins , that he ſaid he would diſcloſe his Father's Errors, and make him to be burned; but his Mother entreated him not to do so.	Anno 1521. Anno 1521. Ex Regist. Joh. Long- land Libr. coln.		that he shewed him a certain Woman in his house, whom he said to be his Wife: counselling moreover the said Roger Dods , upon an Enbruing day, to sup with Bread and Cheese: saying, that which goeth into a Man's Body denleth not a Man's Soul; but that which goeth out of the Body, defileth both Body and Soul.		The Father of Roberts Colins .
		Also that the said Vicar taught him the A, B, C, to the intent he should have understanding in the Apocalyps : wherein he said, that he should perceive all the fallhood of the World, and all the truth. He said furthermore unto him, when he had been at the Lady of Worcester , at the Blood of Haile , which had cost him 18 pence, that he had done as an ill husband, that had ploughed his land, and sown it, but nothing to the purpose; for he had worshipped Man's handy-work, and cast away his moony, which had been better given to the poor: for he should worship but one God, and no handy-work of Man.		This Father Colins had been of this Doctrine from the year of our Lord 1430.
		Item, When the people would offer Candles, where he was Vicar, to Mary Magdalen , he would take them away, and say they were Fools that brought them thither.		Thomas Baker of Whateley ; Robert Liword ; John Symphon of Stewenton ; Thomas Reiley of Burford ; John Clemson Servant to the Prior of Burford ; James Edmunds of Burford ; William Gun of Winney .
		Elizabeth More of Eaſtbenred .		To these was laid, that they being in the house of John Harris of Upton , at the marriage of Joan the Wife of Robert Burger , did read in a Book called Nicodemus's Gospel , that made the Cloth which our Lord was buried in; (as the Register saith) and in that Book is the story of the destruction of Jerusalem .
		Henry Miller of Tuck by Ware .		John Baker Weaver of Winney . The Bailiff of Winney .
		This Henry did shew to Roger Dods a certain story of a Woman in the Apocalyps , riding upon a red Beast. The said Henry was twice abjured.		John Hakker ; John Brabant and his Wife; John Brabant his Son, with his Wife; John Brabant the younger Son, with his Wife; Reginald Brabant of Stanlake .
		John Phip of Hychenden .		For reading in a certain English Book of Scripture, they being together in John Brabant's House of Stanlake .
		For reading unto the said Roger Dods a certain Gospel in English.		Henry Phip.
		William Phip of Hychenden , and Henry his Son.		The Crime and Detection against this Henry , was, for that he being asked of this Dods , Anno 1515, whether he would go to Wimbor or not? answered again, that he was chosen Roodman, that is, Keeper of the Roodloft, saying, that he must go and tind a Candle before his Block-Almighty .
		This William had exhorted Roger Dods that he should worship no Images, nor commit Idolatry, but worship one God: and told the same Roger , that it was good for a Man to be merry and wife, meaning that he should keep close that was told him, for else frait punishment should follow.		Oliver Smith of Newline and his Wife.
		Roger Parker of Hychenden .		William Hobbis.
		This Parker said to John Phip for burning of his Books, that he was foul to blame, for they were worth a hundred Marks. To whom John answered, that he had rather burn his Books, than that his Books should burn him.		This William Hobbis was detected first by Radulph Hobbis his Brother to Bilhop Smith ; but was delivered through the fait of the Curate of West-Wickam .
		The Wife of Thomas Widemore , Daughter of Roger Houſe , of Hychenden . Old Widemore's Wife, Sister to John Phip of Hychenden .		Philip Brabant , Servant of Richard Colins .
		John Lediſdall of Hungerford .		For saying that the Sacrament of the Altar was made in the remembrance of Christ's own Body, but it was not the Body of Christ.
		For reading of the Bible in Robert Burger's house at Burford , upon Holy-rood day, with Colins , Lyword , Thomas Hall , and others.		The Shepherds Kalender was also accused and detected.
		Robert Colins and his Wife; John Colins and his Wife.		Because the same Edmunds said, That he was perſwaded by this Book, reading these words, that the Sacrament was made in the remembrance of Christ.
		For buying a Bible of Stacy for twenty shillings.		The Book of William Thorpe likewise was much complained of, both by this John Edmunds and divers other.
				Richard Colins of Ginger .
				This Richard Colins , as he was a great doer among these good Men, so was he much complained upon by divers, and also by this Edmunds , for bringing with him a Book called the King of Beeme into their company, and did read thereof a great part unto them, in this Edmunds house of Burford .

Item for saying, that when Women go to offer to Images or Saints, they did it to shew their new gay geare: and that Images were but Carpenter's Chips: and that folks go on Pilgrimage more for the green way, than for any devotion.

they could get in corners. 2ly, What were their Opinions we have also described. And thirdly, Herein is to be noted moreover the blind ignorance and uncourteous dealing of the Bishops against them, not only in that they, by their violent Oath and capricious Interrogatories, constrained the Children to accuse their Parents, and Parents the Children, the Husband the Wife, and the Wife the Husband, &c. But especially in that most wrongfully they so afflicted them, without all good reason or cause, only for the sincere verity of God's Word, and reading of Holy Scriptures.

Now it remaineth, that as you have heard their Opinions, (which principally in number were four) to also we declare their Reasons and Scriptures whereupon they grounded; and after that consequently the order and manner of Penance to them enjoined by the Bishop. And first against Pilgrimage, and against worshipping of Images, they used this Text of the Apocalypse, ch. 9. I saw Horses in a Vision, and the heads of them as the heads of Lions: smoke, fire, and brimstone came out of their mouths: with these three Plagues, the third part of Men were slain of the smoke, and of the fire, and of the brimstone that came out of the mouths of them. They that were not slain of these three Plagues, were such as worshipped not Devils, and Images of Gold and Silver, of Brass, of Iron, and of Stone, &c. Ex Regist. Longland. fol. 72. Also they used and alleged the first Commandment, that there is but one God, and that they ought not to worship more Gods than one.

And as touching the Sacrament, and the right Doctrine thereof, they had their instruction partly out of Wickliffe's Wicket, partly out of the Shepherds Kalender: where they read that the Sacrament was made in remembrance of Christ, and ought to be received in remembrance of his Body, &c. Moreover they alleged and followed the words of Christ spoken at the Supper, at what time he sitting with his Disciples, and making with them his Maundy; took Bread, and blessed, and brake, and gave to his Disciples, and said, Eat ye, this (reaching out his arm, and shewing the Bread in his hand, and then noting his own natural Body, and touching the same, and not the Bread consecrated) is my Body which shall be betrayed for you; do this in remembrance of me. And likewise took the Wine and bade them drink, saying, This is my Blood which is of the New Testament, &c.

Item, That Christ our Saviour sitteth on the right hand of the Father, and there shall be unto the day of Doom. Wherefore they believed that in the Sacrament of the Altar was not the very Body of Christ.

Item, (said one of them) Men speak much of the Sacrament of the Altar: but this will I bide by. That upon Chare-Thursday, Christ brake Bread unto his Disciples, and bade them eat it; saying, it was his Flesh and Blood. And then he went from them, and suffered passion; and then he rose from death to life, and ascended into Heaven, and there sitteth on the right hand of the Father; and there he is to remain unto the day of Doom, when he shall judge both quick and dead; and therefore how he should be here in the former Bread, he said, he could not see.

Such Reasons and Allegations as these and other-like, taken out of the Scripture, and out of the Shepherds Kalender, Wickliffe's Wicket, and out of other Books they had amongst them. And altho there was no learned Man with them to ground them in their Doctrine, yet they communing and conferring together among themselves, did convert one another, the Lord's hand working with them marvellously: so that in short space the number of these known or just fast Men (as they were then termed) did exceedingly encrease; in such sort that the Bishop, seeing the matter almost past his power, was driven to make his complaint to the King, and required his aid for suppression of these Men. Whereupon King Henry being then young, and unexpert in the bloody practices and blind leadings of these Apollitical Prelats, incensed with his suggestions and cruel complaints, directed down Letters to the Sheriffs, Bailiffs, Officers, and Subjects, for the aid of the Bishop in this behalf: The Tenor of which Letters here ensueth:

HENRY the Eighth, by the grace of God, King of England and of France, Lord of Ireland, Defender of the Faith: To all Mayors, Sheriffs, Bailiffs, and Conſtables, and to all other our Officers, Miniſters, and Subjects, theſe our Letters hearing or ſeing, and to every of them, greeting, Forasmuch as the right reverend Father in God, our truſty and right well-beloved Counſellor, the Biſhop of Lincoln hath now within his Dioceſſ no ſmall number of Hereticks, as it is thought, to his no little diſcomfort and heavineſſ: We therefore being in will and mind ſafely to provide for the ſaid right reverend Father in God and his Officers, that they, no none of them, ſhall bodily be hurt or damaged by any of the ſaid Hereticks or their Faſtors, in the executing and miniſtring of Juſtice unto the ſaid Hereticks, according to the Laws of Holy Church; do ſtraightly charge and command you, and every of you, as ye tender our high diſpleaſure, to be aiding, helping, and aſſiſting to the ſaid right reverend Father in God, and his ſaid Officers, in the executing of Juſtice in the Premiſſes, as they or any of them ſhall require you ſo to do; not failing to accompliſh our commandment and pleaſure in the Premiſſes, as ye intend to pleaſe us, and will answer to the contrary at your uttermoſt perils. Given under our Signet at our Caſtle at Windſor, the twentieth day of October, the thirteenth year of our Reign.

The Biſhop thus being armed, no leſs with the authority of the King's Letter, than incited with his own fierceneſſ, forelacked no time, but, effoon to accompliſh his moody violence upon the poor Flock of Chriſt, called before him, ſitting upon his Tribunal-seat, both theſe afore-named Perſons, and all other in his Dioceſſ, which were never ſo little noted or ſuſpected to incline toward thoſe Opinions: of whom to ſuch as had but newly been taken, and had not before abjured, he enjoined moſt ſtrait and rigorous Penance. The other in whom he could find any relapſe, yea, albeit they ſubmitted themſelves never ſo humbly to his favourable courteſy; and tho' alſo at his requell, and for hope of pardon, they had ſhewed themſelves great detectors of their Brethren, being moreover of him ſed and flattered thereunto; yet notwithstanding, contrary to his fair words, and their expectation, he ſpared not, but read Sentence of Relapſe againſt them, committing them to the ſecular Arm to be burnt.

And firſt as touching them, who being brought to Abjuration, were put to their Penance; long it were to recite the names of all. Certain I thought to recite here in a Catalogue; firſt reciting the Perſons, afterward the rigorous Penance to them enjoined.

The Names of them which were abjured in the Dioceſſ of Lincoln, in the Year of our Lord 1521.

The names of the towns where they lived.

The Books and Opinions which theſe were charged withal, and for the which they were abjured, partly are before expreſſed, partly here follow in a brief Summary to be ſeen.

Fellow, meaning, that he was a known Man.

For ſaying, that he would give forty pence on condition Fol. 33.

that ſuch a one knew ſo much as he did know.

Some for ſaying, that they of Amerſham, which had bin abjured before by Biſhop Smith, were good Men, and perfect Chriſtians, and ſimple Folk which could not answer for themſelves, and therefore were oppreſſed by power of the Biſhop. Fol. 34.

Some, for hiding other in their Barns. Ibid.

Some, for reading the Scriptures, or Treatiſes of Scripture, in Engliſh: ſome, for hearing the fame read.

Some, for defending, ſome for marrying with them which had been abjured.

Some, for ſaying that Matrimony was not a Sacrament. Fol. 36.

Some, for ſaying that worſhipping of Images was Mawmetry; ſome for calling Images Carpenters Chips; ſome for calling them ſtocks and ſtones; ſome for calling them dead things.

Some, for ſaying that money ſpent upon Pilgrimage, ſerved but to maintain Thieves and Harlots. Fol. 33.

Other for ſaying, that nothing graven with Man's hand was to be worſhipped. Fol. 37.

Some for calling them Fools which came from Mr. John Sharne in Pilgrimage. Fol. 40.

Another for ſaying, that he threſhed God Almighty out of the Straw. Fol. 4.

Another for ſaying, that Alms ſhould not be given before it did liveſt in a Man's hand. Fol. 34.

Some, for ſaying, that they which die, paſſ ſtraight either to Heaven or Hell. Fol. 35.

Iſabel Bartler was brought before the Biſhop and abjured, for lamenting her Husband when the Biſhop's Man came for him, and ſaying, that he was an undone Man, and ſhe a dead Woman.

For ſaying, that Chriſt, departing from his Diſciples into Heaven, ſaid, That once he was in ſinners hands, and would come there no more. Fol. 45.

Robert Rave, hearing a certain Bell in an uplandiſh Steeple, ſaid, Lo, yonder is a fair Bell, and it were to hang about any Cows neck in this Town; and therefore,

K. Hen. 8. as for other such-like matters more, he was brought coram nobis.

Item, For receiving the Sacrament at Easter, and doubting whether it was the very Body of Christ, and not confessing their doubt to their ghostly Father.

Some for saying, that the Pope had no authority to give Pardon, or to release Man's Soul from sin, and so from pain; and that it was nothing but blinding of the people, and to get their money.

The order of Penance.

The Penance to these parties enjoined by this John Longland Bishop of Lincoln, was almost uniform, and all after one condition; save only that they were severally committed and divided into several and divers Monasteries, there to be kept and found of Alms all their life, except they were otherwise dispensed with by the Bishop: as As for Example, I have here adjoined the Bishop's Letter for one of the said number, sent to the Abbey of Ensham, there to be kept in perpetual Penance. By which one, an estimation may be taken of the rest, which were bestowed likewise sundrily into sundry Abbies, as to Osney, to Frideswide, to Abingdon, to Tame, to Biffetor, to Dorchester, to Nostley, to Ashbridge, and divers more: The Copy of the Bishop's Letter sent to the Abbot of Ensham, here followeth under written.

The Bishop's Letter to the Abbot of Ensham.

The Copy of the Bishop's Letter to the Abbot of Ensham.

MI loving Brother, I recommend me heartily unto you: And whereas I have, according to the Law, put this bearer R. T. to perpetual Penance within your Monastery of Ensham, there to live as a Penitent, and not otherwise; I pray you, and nevertheless according unto the Law, command you to receive him, and see you order him there according to his Injunctions, which he will shew you if you require the same. As for his lodging, he will bring it with him: And his meat and drink he may have, such as you give of your Alms. And if he can so order himself by his labour within your house in your business, whereby he may deserve his meat and drink; so may you order him as ye see convenient to his desert, so that he pass not the precinct of your Monastery. And thus fare you heartily well: From my place, &c.

As touching the residue of the Penance and Punishment inflicted to these Men, they do little or nothing discharge, but had one order in them all. The manner and form whereof in the said Bishop's Register doth proceed in condition as followeth.

Penance enjoined under pain of relapse, by John Longland Bishop of Lincoln, the 19 day of December, Anno 1521.

Ex Restit. Fol. 50. Penance enjoined to these Abjurers under pain of relapse.

IN primis, That every one of them shall, upon a market-day, such as shall be limited unto them, in the market-time, go thence about the market at Burford, and then to stand up upon the highest grece of the Crosse there, a quarter of an hour with a Fagot of Wood every one of them upon his shoulder, and every one of them once to bear a fagot of Wood upon their shoulders before their Procession upon a Sunday which shall be limited unto them at Burford, from the Quire door going out, to the Quire door going in, and all the high Mass time to hold the same Fagot upon their shoulders, kneeling upon the grece before the high Altar there; and every of them to do likewise in their own parish Church, upon such a Sunday as shall be limited unto them: and once to bear a Fagot at a general Procession at Uxbridge, when they shall be assigned thereto: and once to bear a Fagot at the burning of an Heretick, when they shall be moulted thereto.

Also every one of them to fast, Bread and Ale only every Friday during their life; and every Even of Corpus Christi, every one of them to fast Bread and Water during their Life, unless sickness unfeigned let the same.

Also, to say every of them every Sunday, and every Friday, during their life, once our Lady Psalter, and if they forget it one day, to say as much another day for the same.

Also they, nor none of them, shall not hide their mark upon their Cheek, neither with Hat, Cap, Hood, Kerchief, Napkin, or otherwise; nor shall suffer their Beards to grow past fourteen days; nor ever haunt again together with any suspect person or persons, unless it be in the open Market, Fair, Church, or common Inn or Alehouse, where other people may see their Conversion.

And all these Injunctions they and every of them are to fulfil with their Penance, and every part of the same, under pain of relapse.

And thus have you the Names, with the Causes and the Penance of them which were at this present time abjured. By which word *abjured is meant, that they were contrained by their Oath, swearing upon the Evangelists, and subscribing with their hand, and a Crosse to the same, to say that they did utterly and voluntarily renounce, detest, and forsake, and never should hold hereafter these or any other-like Opinions, contrary to the determination of the Holy Mother Church of Rome: And further, that they should detect unto their Ordinary, whomsoever they should see or suspect hereafter to teach, hold, or maintain the same.

* Abjured, what it signifies.

Here follow the Names of them which were condemned for relapse, and committed unto the secular Power.

AMong these aforementioned Persons which thus submitted themselves, and were put to Penance, certain there were, which because they had been abjured before, as is above-mentioned, under Bishop Smith, were now condemned for relapse, and had Sentence read against them, and so were committed to the secular Arm to be burned: Whose Names here follow.

Martyrs.

Thomas Bernard,
James Morden.

Robert Rave,
John Scrivener.

1521.

Of these mention is made before, both touching their Abjuration, and also their Martyrdom. Unto whom we may adjoin, Joan Norman.

Thomas Holmes.

This Tho. Holmes, albeit he had disclosed and detected many of his Brethren, as in the Table above is expressed; thinking thereby to please the Bishop, and to save himself, and was thought to be a feed Man of the Bishop for the same: yet notwithstanding in the said Bishop's Register appeareth the sentence of Relapse and Condemnation, written and drawn out against him; and most like it is that he was also adjudged and executed with the other.

As touching the burning of John Scrivener, here is to be noted, that his Children were compelled to set fire unto their Father; in like manner as Joan Clerk also, Daughter of William Tilsteworth, was constrained to give fire to the burning of her own natural Father, as is above specified.

Children compelled to set fire to their own Father.

The Example of which cruelty, as it is contrary both to God and Nature, so it hath not been seen nor heard of in the memory of the Heathen.

Where moreover is to be noted, that at the burning of this John Scrivener, one Thomas Dorman, mentioned before, was present, and bare a Fagot at Amerham: whose Abjuration was afterward laid against him, at what time he should depose for recovery of certain Lands from the School of Barchamstead. This Thomas Dorman, (as I am credibly informed of certain about Amerham) was Uncle to this our Dorman, and found him at School at Barchamstead, under Master Reeve; which now so uncharitably abuseth his Pen in writing against the contrary Doctrine, and raleth so fiercely against the Blood of Christ's slain Servants, miscalling them to be a dughl of stinking Martyrs.

A note of T. Dorman. This Master Dorman, because he was put to School by his Uncle at Barchamstead to M. Reeve, being a Protestant; therefore he for the same cause, in the first sentence of his greivous faith, that he was brought up in Calvin's School.

Well, howsoever the favour of these good Martyrs do scent in the nose of Mr. Dorman, I doubt not but they give a better odour and sweeter smell in the presence of the Lord: Præstis enim in conspectu Domini mors sanctorum ejus; precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his Saints. And therefore howsoever it shall please Master Dorman with reproachful language to mis-term the good Martyrs of Christ, or rather Christ in his Martyrs; his unfermly usage, more Cart-like than Clerke-like, is not greatly to be weighed. For as the danger of his Blasphemy burtheth not them which are gone; so the contumely and reprobach thereof as well comprehendeth his own Kindred, Friends, and Countrey, as any other else; and especially redoundeth to himself, and woundeth his own Soul, and none else, unto the great provoking of God's wrath against him, unless he be blessed with better Grace by time to repent.

Doctor Colet.

Much about this time, or not past two years before, died Doctor John Colet, of whom mention was made in the Table above. To whose Sermons these known men, about Buckinghamshire, had a great mind to resort. After he came from Italy and Paris, he first began to read the Epistles of St. Paul openly in Oxford, instead of Scotus and Thomas. From whence he was called by the Kings, and made Dean of Pauls: where he accustomed much to preach, not without a great Auditory, as well of the King's Court, as of the Citizens and others. His Diet was frugal, his Life upright, in Discipline he was severe: inasmuch that his Canons, because of their straiter rule, complained that they were made like Monks. The honest and honourable State of Matrimony he ever preferred before the unchaste singleness of Priests. At his Dinner commonly was read either some Chapter of St. Paul, or of Solomon's Proverbs: He never used to sup. And although the blindness of that time carried him away after the common Error of Popery, yet in ripeness of judgment he seemed something to incline from the vulgar Trade of that Age. The religious order of Monks and Friars he fancied not; as neither he could greatly favour the barbarous Divinity of the School-Doctors, as of Scotus, but least of all of Thomas Aquinas: inasmuch that when Erasmus, speaking in the praise of Thomas Aquinas, did commend him, that he had read many old Authors, and had written many new Works, as Cassian Aurea, and such like, to prove and to know his judgment: Colet first supposing that Erasmus had spoken in jest, but after supposing that he meant good faith, burtheth out in great vehemency, saying, What tell you me (quoth he) of the commendation of that man, who except he had been of an arrogant and presumptuous Spirit, would not define and discuss all things so boldly and rashly: and also, except he had been rather worldly-minded than heavenly, would never have so polluted Christ's whole Doctrine with man's prophane Doctrine, in such sort as he hath done?

The Bishop of London at that time was Fitzjamer, of age no less than fourscore. Who (bearing long grudge and displeasure against Colet) with other two Bishops, taking his part, like to himself, entred Action of complaint against Colet to the Archbishop of Canterbury, being then, William Warham. The matter of his Complaint was divided into three Articles: The first was for speaking against worshipping of Images: The second was about Hospitality, for that the entreating upon the place of the Gospel, Pasce, pasce, pasce, Feed, Feed, feed: when he had expounded the two first, for feeding with example of Life, and with Doctrine: in the third, which the School-men do expound for feeding with Hospitality, he left out the outward feeding of the Belly, and applied it another way.

The third Crime wherewith they charged him, was for speaking against such as used to preach only by bofome Sermons, declaring nothing else to the people, but what they bring in their Papers with them. Which because the Bishop of London used then much to do for his age, he took it as spoken against him, and therefore bare him this out of displeasure. The Archbishop more wisely weighing the matter, and being well acquainted with Colet, so took his part against his Accusers, that he at that time was rid out of trouble.

William Tindal, in his Book answering Master Moor, addeth moreover, and testifieth, that the Bishop of London would have made the said Colet, Dean of Pauls, an Heretic, for translating the Pater-Noster into English, had not the Bishop of Canterbury holpen the Dean.

But yet the malice of Fitzjamer the Bishop so creased not: who being thus repulsed by the Archbishop, practised by another train how to accuse him unto the King. The occasion thus fell: It happened the same time, what the King was in preparation of War against France: whereupon the Bishop with his Co-adjutors, taking occasion upon certain Words of Colet, wherein he seemed to prefer Peace before any kind of War, were it never so just; accused him therefore in their Sermons, and also before the King.

Furthermore it so befel the same time, that upon Good-friday Doctor Colet, preaching before the King, entreated of the Victory of Christ; exhorting all Christians to fight under the Standard of Christ, against the Devil: adding moreover, what an hard thing it was to fight under Christ's Banner, and that all they which upon private hatred or ambition took Weapon against their Enemy (one Christian to slay another) did not fight under the Banner of Christ, but rather of Satan: and therefore concluding his matter, he exhorted that Christian men in their Wars would follow Christ their Prince and Captain, in fighting against their Enemies, rather than the examples of Julius, or Alexander, &c. The King hearing Colet thus speak, and staring left by his words the hearts of his Soldiers might be withdrawn from his Wars, which he had then in hand, took him aside and talked with him in secret Conference, walking in his Garden. Bishop Fitzjamer, Briot, and Standish, who were his Enemies, thought now none other, but that Colet must needs be committed to the Tower, and waited for his coming out. But the King with great gentleness entertaining Doctor Colet, and bidding him familiarly to put on his Cap, in long courteous talk had with him in the Garden, much commended him for his Learning and Integrity of life; agreeing with him in all points, but that only he required him (for that the rude Soldiers should not rashly mistake that which he had said) more plainly to explain his words and mind in that behalf; which after he did: and so after long communication and great promises, the King dismissed Colet with these words, saying, Let every man have his Doctor as him liketh, this shall be my Doctor; and so he departed. Whereby none of his Adversaries durst ever trouble him after that time.

Among many other memorable acts left behind him, he erected a worthy Foundation of the School of Pauls (I pray God the fruits of the School may answer the Foundation) for the cherishing up of youth in good letters, providing a sufficient Stipend as well for the Master, as for the Usher: whom he willed rather to be appointed out of the number of married men, than of single Priests with their suspected Chastity. The first Moderator of this School, was Gualt. Lilius, a man no less notable for his Learning, than was Colet for his Foundation. Ex Epist. Erasmi ad Jodoc. Jonam. This Colet died the year of our Lord 1519.

Not long before the death of this Colet and Lilius, lived Gualtelmus Grocine and Gualtelmus Latimerus, both English men also, and famously learned. This Grocine, as began to read in his open Lecture in the Church of St. Paul, the Book of Dionysius Areopagita, commonly called Hierarchia Ecclesiastica (for the reading of the holy Scriptures in Pauls was not in use) in the first entry of his Preface cried out with great vehemency against them; whosoever they were, which either denied or stood in doubt of the Authority of that Book: in the number of whom he noted Laurence Valla, and dives other of the like approved Judgment and Learning. But afterward the same Grocine, when he had continued a few weeks in his reading thereof, and did consider further in him, he utterly altered and recanted his former sentence, protesting openly, that the forenamed Book, in his judgment, was never written by that Author whom we read in the Acts of the Apostles to be called Dionysius Areopagita. Ex Erasmi ad Parisienses.

The translation of these two couples above rehearsed, doth occasion me to adjoin also the remembrance of another couple of like learned men: the names of whom, not unworthy to be remembered, were Thomas Linacre and Richard Pace: which two followed much upon the time of Colet, and of William Lily. But of Richard Pace, which was Dean next after the aforesaid Colet, more convenient place shall serve us hereafter to speak, coming to the story of Cardinal Vulsey.

Moreover, to these two I thought if not out of season, to couple also some mention of Jeffrey Chaucer and John Gower. Which although being much discrepant from these in course of years, yet may seem not unworthy Albeit concerning the full certainty of the time and death of these two, we cannot find; yet it appeareth in the Prologue of Gower's work, entituled Confessio Amantis, that he finished it in the sixteenth year of King Richard the second. And in the end of the eighth Book of his said Treatise he declareth that he was both sick and old when he wrote it: whereby it may appear that he lived not long after. Notwithstanding by certain Verses of the said Master Gower, placed in the later end of Chaucer's Works both in Latin and English, it may seem that he was alive at the beginning of the reign of King Henry the fourth, and also by a Book which he wrote to the same King Henry. By his Sepulture within the Chappel of the Church of St. Mary Overie, which was then a Monastery, where he and his Wife lie buried, it appeareth by his chain and his Garland of Laurel, that he was both a Knight, and flourishing then in Poetry. In the which place of his Sepulture were made in his Grave-stone three Books: the first bearing the Title, Speculum meditantis; the second, Vox clamantis; the third, Confessio amantis. Besides these, divers Chronicles and other Works moe he compiled.

For Books of John Gower.

Likewise as touching the time of Chaucer, by his own words in the end of his first Book of Troilus and Cresside, it is manifest that he and Gower were both of one time; although it seemeth that Gower was a great deal his ancient:

Chaucer and Gower commended for their studi-

both notably learned, as the barbarous rudeness of that time did give, both great Friends together, and both in like kind of study together occupied; so endeavouring themselves, and employing their time, that they, excelling many other in Study and Exercise of good Letters, did pass forth their lives here right worshipfully and godly, to the worthy Fame and Commendation of their name. Chaucer's Works be all printed in one Volume, and therefore known to all men.

This I marvel to see the idle life of the Priests and Clergy-men of that time, seeing these Lay-persons shewed themselves in these kinds of liberal Studies so industrious and fruitfully occupied: but much more I marvel to consider this, how that the Bishops, condemning and abolishing all manner of English Books and Treatises which might bring the people to any light of knowledge, did yet authorize the Works of Chaucer to remain full and to be occupied. Who (no doubt) saw in Religion as much almost as even we do now, and uttereth in his Works no less, and seemeth to be a right Wiclevian, or else there was never any; and that all his Works almost, if they be thoroughly advised, will testify (albeit it be done in mirth, and covertly) and especially the later end of his third Book of the Testament of Love: for there purely he toucheth the highest matter, that is, the Communion. Wherein, except a man be altogether blind, he may espie him at the full. Although in the same Book (as in all other he useth to do) under shadows covertly, as under a Vizard, he sheweth Truth in such sort, as both privily she may profit the godly-minded, and yet not be espied of the crafty Adversary. And therefore the Bishops, belike, taking his Works but for Jest and Toys, in condemning other Books, yet permitted his Books to be read.

The Pleas-
in Chaucer.

So it pleased God then to blind the Eyes of them, for the more commodious of his people, to the intent that through the reading of his Treatises, some fruit might redound thereof to his Church, as no doubt it did to many. As also I am partly informed, of certain which knew the Parties, which to them reported, that by reading of Chaucer's Works, they were brought to the true knowledge of Religion: And not unlike to be true. For to omit other parts of his Volume, whereof some are more fabulous than other, what Tale can be more plainly told than the Tale of the Ploughman? or what finger can point out more directly the Pope with his Prelates to be Antichrist, than doth the poor Pellican reasoning against the greedy Griffin? Under which Esopys fables, or Poetrie, who is so blind that seeth not by the Pellican the Doctrine of Christ, and of the Lollards to be defended against the Church of Rome? Or who is so impudent that can deny that to be true which the Pellican there affirmeth in describing the presumptuous pride of that pretended Church? Again, what Egg can be more like, or Fig, unto another, than the words, properties, and conditions of that ravenning Gryph resembleth the true Image, that is, the Nature and Qualities of that which we call the Church of Rome, in every point and degree? And therefore no great marvel if that narration were exempted out of the Copies of Chaucer's Works: which notwithstanding now is restored again, and is extant for every man to read that is disposed. This Geffrey Chaucer, being born (as is thought) in Oxfordshire, and dwelling in Woodstock, lieth buried in the Church of the Minister of St. Peter at Vintria in an Isle on the south side of the said Church, not far from the door leading to the Cloister, and upon his Grave-stone sith were written these two old Verses.

Galfridus Chaucer Vates, & fama Poësis
Materne, hac sacra sum tumulatus humo.

Afterward about the year of our Lord 1556, one Master Briekham, bestowing more cost upon his Tomb, did add therunto these Verses following.

Qui fuit Anglorum Vates ter maximus olim, Galfridus Chaucer conditur hoc tumulo.
Annum si quaras Domini, si tempora-moris,
Ecce nota subsunt, que tibi cuncta notent.
25 Octob. Anno 1400.

Here beginneth the Reformation of the Church of Christ in the time of Martin Luther.

Although it cannot be sufficiently expressed with The corruption of the Church described.
Tongue, or Pen of man, into what miserable ruine and desolation the Church of Christ was brought in those later days: yet partly, by the reading of these Stories afore said, some intelligence may be given to them which have judgment to mark, or Eyes to see in what blindness and darkness the world was drowned during the space of these four hundred years before and more. By the viewing and considering of which Times and Histories, thou mayst understand (gentle Reader) how the Religion of Christ, which only consisteth in Spirit and Verity, was wholly turned into outward Observations, Ceremonies, and Idolatry. So many Saints we had, so many Gods, so many Monasteries, so many Pilgrimages. As many Churches, as many Reliques forged and feigned we had. Again, so many Reliques, so many lying Miracles we believed. Instead of the only living Lord, we worshipped dead Stocks and Stones. In place of Christ immortal, we adored mortal Bread. In stead of his Blood, we worshipped the Blood of Ducks; how the people were led, so that the Priests were fed, no care was taken. In stead of God's Word, Man's Word was set up. In stead of Christ's Testament, the Pope's Testament, that is, the Canon-Law. In stead of Psalm, the Master of Sentences took place, and almost full possession. The Law of God was little read, the use and end thereof was less known; and as the end of the Law was unknown, so the difference between the Gospel and the Law was not understood, the benefit of Christ not considered, the effect of Faith not expended. Through the Ignorance whereof it cannot be told what infinite Errors, Sects, and Religions crept into the Church, overwhelming the world, as with a Flood of Ignorance and Seduction. And no marvel; for where the Foundation is not well laid, what Building can stand or prosper? The Foundation of all our Christianity is only this; The promise of God in the Blood of Christ his Son, giving and promising life to all that believe in him: Giving (saith the Scripture) unto Rom. 6.
us, and not bargaining or indenting with us. And that freely (saith the Scripture) for Christ's sake, and not conditionally for our Merits sake. Rom. 4.

Furthermore, Freely (saith the Scripture) by Grace, that the Promise might be firm and sure, and not by the works that we do, which always are doubtful. By Grace (saith the Scripture) through promise to all and upon all that believe, and not by the Law, upon them that do deserve. Rom. 3.
For if it come by deserving, then it is not of Grace: Rom. 11.
If it be not of Grace, then it is not of Promise; and contrariwise, if it be of Grace and Promise, then it is not of works, saith St. Paul. Upon the Foundation of God's free Promise and Grace first builded the Patriarchs, Kings, and Prophets. Upon this same Foundation also Christ the Lord builded his Church. Upon which Foundation the Apostles likewise builded the Church Apostolical or Catholic.

1 Cor. 5.

This Apostolical and Catholick Foundation so long as the Church did retain, so long it continued sincere and sound: which endured a long season after the Apostles time. But after, in process of years, through wealth and negligence crept into the Church, so soon as this Foundation began to be lost, came in new Builders, which would build upon a new Foundation a new Church more glorious, which we call now the Church of Rome. Who being not contented with the old Foundation, and the Head-cornet-stone, which the Lord by his Word had laid; in place whereof they laid the ground-work upon the Condition and Strength of the Law and Works. Although it is not to be denied, but that the Doctrine of God's holy Law, and of good Works according to the same, is a thing most necessary to be learned and followed of all men: yet it is not that Foundation whereupon our Salvation consisteth; neither is that Foundation able to bear up the weight of the Kingdom of Heaven, but is rather the thing which is builded upon the Foundation; which Foundation is Jesus Christ, according as we are taught of St. Paul, saying; No man can lay any other Foundation beside that which is laid, Christ Jesus, &c.

But this ancient Foundation, which the old ancient Church of Christ laid (as I said) hath been now of long time forsaken, and in head thereof, a new Church, with a new Foundation hath been erected and framed, not upon God's Promise, and his free Grace in Christ Jesus, nor upon free Justification by Faith, but upon merits and deserts of men's working. And hereon have they planted all these their new devices, to infinite, that they cannot well be numbered; as Masses-Trecenaries, Dirges, Obsequies, Mattens, and Hours-singing-Service, Vigils, Midnight-rising, Bare-foot going, Fift-tasting, Lent-fast, Ember-fast, Stations, Rogations, Jubilees, Advocation of Saints, Praying to Images, Pilgrimage-walking, Works of Supererogation, Application of Merits, Orders, Rules, Sects of Religion, Vowes of Chastity, wilful Poverty, Pardons, Relations, Indulgencies, Penance, and Satisfaction, with auricular Confession, founding of Abbies, building of Chappels, giving to Churches: And who is able to recite all their laborious Buildings, falsely framed upon a wrong ground, and all for ignorance of the true Foundation, which is the free justification by Faith in Christ Jesus the Son of God.

Moreover note, that as this new-found Church of Rome was thus deformed in Doctrine, so no less was it corrupted in order of Life and deep Hypocritie, doing all things only under pretences and dissembled Titles. So under the pretence of Peter's Chair, they exercised a Majesty above Emperors and Kings. Under the Vizour of their vowed Chastity reigned Adultery; under the cloke of professed Poverty, they possessed the goods of the Temporality; under the title of being dead unto the World, they not only reigned in the World, but also ruled the World; under the colour of the Keys of Heaven to hang under their girdle, they brought all the States of the World under their girdle, and crept not only into the Purles of men, but also into their Consciences: they heard their Confessions; they knew their Secrets; they dispensed as they were disposed, and looked what them lifted: And finally when they had brought the whole World under their Subjection; yet did their Pride neither cease to ascend, neither could their Avarice be ever satisfied. And if the example of Cardinal Wolsey and other Cardinals and Popes cannot satisfy thee, I beseech thee (gentle Reader) turn over the aforelaid Book of the Ploughmans Tale in Chaucer above-mentioned, where thou shalt understand much more of their Demeanour than I have here described.

In these fo blind and miserable corrupt dayes of darkness and ignorance, thou seest, good Reader (I doubt not) how necessary it was, and high time that Reformation of the Church should come, which now most happily and graciously began to work through the merciful and no less needful Providence of Almighty God; who although he suffered his Church to wander and start aside, through the seduction of Pride and Prosperity along time, yet at length it pleased his goodness to respect his people, and to reduce his Church into the pristine Foundation and frame again, from whence it was pitiously decayed. Whereof I have now consequently to entreat; intending by the Grace of Christ to declare how, and by what means first this Reformation of the Church began, and how it proceeded, encreasing by little and little unto this perfection which now we see, and more I trust shall see.

And herein we have first to behold the admirable Work of God's Wisdom. For as the first decay and ruine of the Church before began of rude ignorance, and lack of knowledg in Teachers: so, to reforme the Church again by Doctrine and Learning, it pleased God to open to man the Art of Printing, the time whereof was shortly after the burning of John Hus and Hierome. Printing being opened, incontinently ministred unto the Church the Instruments and Tools of Learning and Knowledge, which were good Books and Authors which before lay hid and unknown. The Science of Printing being found, immediately followed the Grace of God: which flired up good Wits aptly to conceive the light of knowledge and of Judgment: by which Light darkness began to be espied, and ignorance to be detected; Truth from Error, Religion from Superstition, to be discerned, as is above more largely discoursed, where was touched the inventing of Printing.

Furthermore; after these Wits flired up of God, followed other more, encreasing daily more and more in Science, in Tongues, and Perfection of Knowledge: who now were able not only to discern in matters of judgment, but also were so armed and furnished with the help of good Letters, that they did encounter also with the Adversary, sustaining the cause and defence of Learning against Barbarity; of Verity against Error; of true Religion against Superstition. In number of whom, amongst many other here unnamed, were Piclus, and Franciscus Mirandula, Laur. Valla, Franc. Petrarca, Doc. Wesalius, Revelinus, Grocinius, Coletar, Rhenanus, Erasmus, &c. And here began the first pulch and assault to be given against the ignorant and barbarous Faction of the Pope's pretended Church. Who after that by their learned Writings and laborious Travel, they had opened a Window of light unto the World, and had made (as it were) a way more ready for others to come after: Immediately, according to God's gracious appointment, followed Martin Luther, with others after him; by whose ministry it pleased the Lord to work a more full Reformation of his Church, as by their Acts and Proceedings hereafter shall follow (Christ willing) more amply to be declared.

And now coming to the time and story of Martin Luther, whom the Lord did ordain and appoint to be the principal Organ and Minister under him, to reform Religion, and to subvert the See of the Pope: first, before we enter into the tractation hereof, it shall not be impertinent to the purpose, to inter such Prophecies and Forewarnings as were sent before of God, by divers and sundry good men, long before the time of Luther, which foretold and prophesied of this Reformation of the Church to come.

And first to begin with the Prophecies of John Hus, and Hierome, it is both notable, and also before-mentioned, what the said John Hus at the time of his burning prophesied unto his Enemies, saying; That after an hundred years come and gone, they should give account to God and to him.

Where is to be noted, that counting from the year 1415, (which year John Hus was burned) or from the year 1416, (when Hierome did suffer) unto the year 1516, (when Martin Luther began first to write) we shall find the Number of an Hundred Years expired.

Likewise to this may be adjoynd the propheticall Vision or Dream, which chanced to the said John Hus lying in the Dungeon of the Friars in Constance, a little before he was burned: His Dream, as he himself reporteth in his Epistles writing to Master John Gism, and as I have also before recorded the same, so will I now repeat the same again in like effect of words, as he wrote it himself in Latin; the effect of which Latin is this:

I pray you expound to me the Dream which I had this Night. I saw that in my Church at Bethlehem (whereof I was Ezra) they desired and laboured so a-K. Hen. 8. bolto all the Images of Chriſt, and did aboliſh them. I the next day following roſe up, and ſaw many other Painters, which painted both the ſame, and many more Images, and more faire, which I was glad to behold: whereupon the Painters, with the great multitude of people, ſaid: Now let the Biſhops and Priſts come, and put out theſe Images if they can. Which thing done, much people rejoiced in Bethlehem, and I with them: and riſing up, I felt my ſelf to laugh.

Ex Reſt. 45.
John Huſ.

This Dream Maſter John of Chivm firſt expounded. Then he in the next Epistle after expounded it himſelf to this effect: Stante mandato Dei, &c. That is, the Commandment of God ſtanding, that we muſt obſerve no Dreams, yet notwithstanding, I truſt that the Life of Chriſt was painted in Bethlehem by me, through his Word, in the Hearts of Men; the which Preaching they went about in Bethlehem to deſtroy, firſt in commanding that no Preaching ſhould be, neither in the Church of Bethlehem, nor in the Chappels thereby: Secondly, that the Church of Bethlehem ſhould be thrown down to the ground. the ſame Life of Chriſt ſhall be painted up again by moe Preachers much better than I, and after a much more better ſort, ſo that a great number of people ſhall rejoice thereat: all ſuch as love the Life of Chriſt, and alſo I ſhall rejoice my ſelf, at what time I ſhall awake, that is, when I ſhall riſe again from the dead.

Another
Propheſie by John Huſ.

And becauſe we are here in hand with the Prophecies of John Huſ, it is not to be omitted what he writeth in a certain Treatiſe, De Sacerdotum & Monachorum carnalium abominations, thus prophelying of the Reformation of the Church, The Church, he ſaith, cannot be reduced to its former dignity, and reformed, before all things firſt be made new, (the truth whereof appeareth by the Temple of Solomon) as well the Clergy and Priſts, as alſo the People and Laity. Or elſe, except all ſuch as now be addicted to avarice, from the laſt to the moſt, be firſt converted and renewed, as well the people as the Clergy and Priſts, things cannot be reformed. Albeit, at my mind now giveth me, I believe rather the firſt, that is, that then ſhall riſe a new people, formed after the new Man, which is created after God. Of the which people, new Clergy and Priſts ſhall come forth and be taken, which all ſhall hate Covetouſneſs and Glory of this Life, labouring to an heavenly Converſation. Notwithstanding, all theſe things ſhall be done and wrought in continuance and order of time, diſpenſed of God for the ſame purpoſe. And this God doth, and will do of his own Goodneſs and Mercy, and for the riches of his Patience and Sufferance, giving time and ſpace of Repentance to them that have long lain in their ſins, to amend and ſlie from the face of the Lord's Fury, until at length all ſhall ſuffer together, and until both the carnal people, and Priſts, and Clergy, in proceſs and order of time, ſhall fall away and be conſumed, as is the Cloath conſumed and eaten of the Moth, &c.

With this Propheſie of John Huſ above mentioned, ſpeaking of the hundredth Years, accordeth alſo the Teſtimony of Hierome his fellow Martyr, in theſe Words; And I cite you all (ſaid he) to answer before the moſt high and juſt Judge, after an hundred years.

This Hierome was burnt Anno 1416; and Luther began to write, Anno 1516, which was juſt a hundred Year, according to the right account of Hierome's Propheſie.

Monk of

Philip Melancthon in his Apology, Cap. de Vitis Monſtri, teſtiſieth of one John Huſton a Monk in Thuringe, who, for ſpeaking againſt certain Abules of the Place and Order where he lived, was caſt into Priſon. At length being weak and feeble through Imprifonment, he ſent for the Warden of the Covert, deſiring and beſeeching him to have ſome reſpect of his wofull ſtate and pitifull caſe. The Warden rebuking and accuſing him for that he had done and ſpoken; he answered again and ſaid, That he had ſpoken nothing which might be prejudicial or hurtful to their Montery, or againſt their Religion: but there

phelieth of
tion.

Long it were to induce here all Prophecies that be read in Hiſtories. Certain I mind briefly to touch and paſs over. And firſt to omit the Revelations of Briget (whereunto I do not much attribute) who prophelying of the Deſtruction of Rome in her fourth Book, Cap. 17. ſaith; That Rome ſhall be ſcoured and purged with three things, with Sword, Fire, and the Plough: reſembling moreover the ſaid Church of Rome to a Plant removed out of the old place into a new; alſo to a Body condemned by a Judge to have the ſkin flayn off; the Blood to be drawn from the Fleſh; the Fleſh to be cut in pieces; and the Bones thereof to be broken; and all the Marrow to be ſqueezed out from the ſame; ſo that no part thereof remain whole and perfect, &c. But to theſe Speculations of Briget I give no great Reſpect, as neither I do to the Predictions of Katherine de Senis.

And yet notwithstanding, Antonius writing of the ſame Katherine in his third part, Tit. 23. cap. 14. reciteth her Words thus, prophelying of the Reformation of the Church to Frier Reynold her ghofly Father: 'By theſe Tribulations (ſaith ſhe) God after a ſecret manner unknown to man, ſhall purge his holy Church, and after thoſe things ſhall follow ſuch a Reformation of the holy Church of God, and ſuch a Renovation of the holy Paſtors, that the only Cogitation and Remembrance thereof, maketh my Spirit to rejoice in the Lord: And as I have oftentimes told you heretofore, the Spoule, which is now all deformed and ragged, ſhall be adorned and decked with moſt rich and precious Outheſ and Brouches: And all the Faithfull ſhall be glad and rejoice to ſee themſelves beautified with ſo holy Paſtors. Yea, and alſo the Infidels, then allured by the ſweet favour of Chriſt, ſhall return to the Catholick Fold, and be converted to the true Biſhop and Shepherd of their Souls. Give thanks therefore to God; for after this ſtorm he will give a great calm, &c.

tion.

Of the Authority of this Propheſie I have not to affirm or judge, but rather to hear what the Catholick Judges will ſay of this their own Saint and Prophet. For if they do not credit her Spirit of Propheſie, why then do they authorize her for a pure Saint among the Sisters of dear St. Dominick? If they warrant her Propheſie, let them ſay then, when was this glorious Reformation of the Church ever true or like to be true, if it be not true now in this marvellous alteration of the Church in theſe our latter days? Or when was there any ſuch Conversion of Chriſtian People in all Countries ever heard of, ſince the Apoſtles time, as hath been ſince the preaching of Martin Luther?

The Prophe-
ſie of Hieronimo Savonola.

Of Hieronimus Savonarola I wrote before, ſhewing that he prophelieth; That one ſhould paſs over the Alps like to Cyrus, who ſhould ſubvert and deſtroy all Italy. Which may well be applied to God's Word, and the Goſpel of Chriſt, ſpreading now abroad ſince Luther's time.

Theodoricus, Biſhop of Croatia, lived near about the time when Huſ and Hierome were martyred. Who in the end of his propheticall Vettes, which are extant in print, declareth; That the See of Rome, which is ſo horribly polluted with Simony and Avarice, ſhall fall, and no more oppreſs men with Tyranny, as it hath done, and that it ſhall be ſubverted by her own Subject, and that the Church and true Piety ſhall flouriſh more again than ever it did before.

The Prophe-
ſie of Theo-doricus.

Noviomagus teſtiſieth, that he, in the Year of our Lord 1520. heard Oſtendorpius, a Canon of Deventry ſay, that when he was a young man, Doctor Weſtilius a Friſian, which was then an old Man, told him, 'That he ſhould live to ſee this new School-Divinity of Scots, Aquinas, and Bonaventura, to be utterly forſaken and exploded of all true Chriſtians.

The Prophe-
ſie of Dr.
Weſtilius.

In a Book of Carolus Bouillius, mention is made of a certain Viſion which one Nicolas, an Hermite of Helvetia, had; In which Viſion he ſaw the Pope's Head crowned with three Swords proceeding from his face, and three Swords coming coming toward it. This Vision is also imprinted in the Books of Martin Luther, with his Preface before it.

Nicholas Medlerus, being of late Superintendent of Brunswick, affirmed and testified, 'That he heard and knew a certain Priest in his Country, that told the Priests there, that they laid aside Paul under their Desks and Pews: but the time would come, when as Paul should come abroad, and drive them under the Desks and dark Stalls, where they should not appear, &c.

Matthius Flaccius, in the end of his Book entitled, de Testibus Veritatis, 'Speaketh of one Michael Stifelius; which Michael, being an old Man, told him, that he heard the Priests and Monks say, many times by old Prophecies, that a violent Reformation must needs come amongst them: and also that the said Michael heard Conradus Stifelius his Father many times declare the same: who also, for the great hatred he bare against this filthy sect of Monks and Priests, told to one Peter Pires, a Friend and Neighbour of his, that he should live and see the day; and therefore desired him, that when the day came, besides those Priests which he should kill for himself, he would kill one Priest for his sake. Hec eu Flaccio.

This Stifelius thought belike, that this Reformation should be wrought by outward violence, and force of Sword; but he was therein deceived: altho the Adversary useth all forcible means, and violent tyranny, yet the proceeding of the Gospel always beginneth with peace and quietness.

In the Table of Amergham-Men I signified a little before, how one Haggard of London, speaking of this Reformation to come, declared, That the Priests should make battel, and have the upper hand a while, but shortly they should be vanquished and overthrown for ever.

In the time of Pope Alexander the sixth, and about the year of our Lord 1500, as is before specified, The high Angel which stood in the top of the Pope's Church and Castle of St. Angel, was thrown down with a terrible Thunder into the River of Tiberis: Whereby might seem to be declared the ruin and fall of the Popedom.

To this may be adjoined that which in certain Chronicles, and in John Bale, is recorded; which saith, That in the year of our Lord, 1516, (which was the same year when Martin Luther began) Pope Leo the tenth did create one and thirty Cardinals: In the which year and day of their Creation, there fell a tempest of Thunder and Lightning in Rome, which so strook the Church where the Cardinals were made, that it removed the little Child Jesus out of the lap of his Mother, and the Keys out of St. Peter's band. Which thing many then did interpret to signify and foretell the subversion and alteration of the See of Rome.

Hitherto pertaineth also a strange portent and a prodigious token from Heaven, in the Year of our Lord 1505, in the which year, under the Reign of Maximilian the Emperor, There appeared in Germany, upon the Vestures of Men, as well of Priests as Laymen, upon Womens Garments also, and upon their Rocks as they were spinning, divers Prints and Tokens of the Nails, of the Spunge, of the Spear, of the Lord's Coat, and of bloody Crosses, &c. All which were seen upon their Caps and Gowns, as is most certainly testified and recorded by divers, which both did see, and also did write upon the same. Of whom first was Maximilian the Emperor, who both had and shewed the same to Franciscus Mirandula, which wrote thereupon a Book in Latin Meetre called Stansficon; wherein, for the more credit, these Verses be contained.

Of this also writeth Jo. Carion, Functius, P. Melancthon, Flaccius, with divers other moe. These Marks and Tokens, as they were very strange, so were they diversly expounded of many, some thinking that they portended Affliction and Persecution of the Church to draw near: some, that God by that Token did admonish them, or forewarned unto them the true Doctrine of their Justification, which only is to be fought in the Cross and Passion of Christ and no other thing. This I marvel, that Christianus Massius, and other of that Profession, do leave it out. Belike they saw something in it that made not for their liking. For whether it signifieth Persecution to come upon the Germans, they cannot be evil that suffer and bear the Cross of Christ: or whether it signifieth the true Doctrine of Christ coming to the Germans; it cannot otherwise be, but that the Doctrine of the Bishop of Rome must needs be wrong, which is contrary to this which God hath stirred up in Germany.

By these and such-like Prophecies, it is evident to understand, the time not to be far off, when God of his determinate Providence was disposed to reform and to restore his Church. And not only by these Prophecies the same might well appear, but also and much rather, by the hearts of the people at that time; whose minds were so incensed and inflamed with hatred against the pomp and pride of Rome, both thorow all Nations, and especially the people of Germany, that it was easy to perceive the time was near at hand, when the pride of Popish Prelacy would have a fall. Such disdain there was, such contempt and derision began to rise on every side then, against the Pope and the Court of Rome, that it might soon appear by the hearts of the people, that God was not disposed to have it long to stand. For neither were their detestable doings so secret, that Men did not see them, neither did any Man behold them, having any sparkle of godliness, that could abide them. And thereupon grew these Proverbs to their derision, in every Country: As in Germany it hath been a Proverb amongst them.

*Was ist nu inder werlt fur ein wesen,
Wir moegen fur den paffen nicht genen.*

What is this, to see the World now round about,
That for these traveling Priests no Man that once may roust?

Quam primum clericus suscipit rasuram, statim intrat in eum Diabolus.

That is;

As soon as a Clerk is shorn into his Order, by and by the Alluding to the Pope's Bulls, which commonly so begin.

Item, When Bulls come from Rome, bind well your Purfes.
The nearer Rome, the further from Christ.

Item, He that goeth once to Rome, seeth a wicked Man.

He that goeth twice, learneth to know him.

He that goeth thrice, bringeth him home with him.

Item, The Court of Rome never regardeth the Sheep without the Wool.

Once were wooden Chalices, and golden Priests:

Now we have golden Chalices, and wooden Priests.

Once Christian Men had blind Churches and light Hearts;

Now they have blind Hearts, and light Churches.

Item, Many are worshipped for Saints in Heaven, whose Souls be burning in Hell.

What should I speak of our English Proverb, which so vilely esteemeth the filthy Friars, that it compareth them (saying thy reverence, good Reader) to a Fart?

In France, Gallus-Sennensis writeth four hundred years ago, that amongst them it was an old saying; Rome solui Satanam in perniciem totius Ecclesie: that is, That Satan was let loose at Rome to destroy the whole Church.

Thomas Becket himself in his time, writing to the College of Cardinals, denieth it not, but to be a common word both through Town and City, Quod non sit iustitia Rome: that is, That there is no Right at Rome.

To these may be adjoined also the A, B, C, which we find in the Margent of a certain old Register, to be attributed to William Thorpe, whose Story we have comprehended in the Book before.

*A wake ye ghostly Persons, awake, awake,

How long have ye the World captiv'd,
In sore bondage of Men's Traditions?
Kings and Emperors ye have depriv'd,
Loudly usurping their chief Possessions:
Much misery ye make in all Religions:
Now your Friends be almost at their last cast,
O God! sure to be revenged at the last.
Poor People to oppress ye have no shame,
Making for fear of your bloody tyranny,
Rightful Justice ye have put out of frame,
Seeking the lust of your God the belly.
Therefore I dare you boldly certify
Very little, tho you be thereof agast,
That God will be revenged at the last.

By these and such-like sayings, which may be collected innumerable, it may soon be seen what Hearts and Judgments the People had in those days of the Romish Clergy. Which thing, no doubt, was of God as a secret Prophecy, that shortly Religion should be reitored: according as it came to pass about this present time, when Dr. Martin Luther first began to write, after that Picus Mirandula, and Laurentia Valla, and last of all Erasmus Roterdamus, had somewhat broken the way before, and had shaken the Monks houses. But Luther gave the stroke, and plucked down the Foundation, and all by opening one Vein, long hid before, wherein lieth the Touchstone of all Truth and Doctrine, as the only principal Origin of our Salvation, which is our free justifying by Faith only in Christ the Son of God. The laborious travels, and the whole process, and the constant preachings of this worthy Man, because they are lucidly declared in the History of Joannes Sleidanus, I shall the less need to stay long thereupon, but only to run over some principal matters of his Life and Acts, as they are briefly collected by Philip Melancthon.

Martin Luther, after he was grown in years, being born at Isleben in Saxony, Anno 1483, was set to the University, first of Magdeburg, then of Erford. In this University of Erford, there was a certain aged Man in the Convent of the Augustines, (whose thought to be Weselus above mentioned) with whom Luther being then of the same Order, a Friar Augustine, had conference upon divers things, especially touching the Article of Remission of Sins; the which Article the said aged Father opened unto Luther after this sort; declaring, that we must not generally believe only forgiveness of sins to be, or to belong, to Peter, to Paul, to David, or such good Men alone; but that God's express Commandment is, that every Man should believe his sins particularly to be forgiven him in Christ; and further said, that this interpretation was confirmed by the testimony of St. Bernard, and shewed him the place, in the Sermon of the Annunciation, where it is thus set forth: But add thou that thou believest this, that by him thy sins are forgiven thee. This is the Testimony that the Holy Ghost giveth thee in thy Heart, saying, Thy sins are forgiven thee. For this is the Opinion of the Apostle, that Man is freely justified by Faith.

An excellent declaration of St. Bernard touching Faith.

By these words Luther was not only strengthened, but was also instructed of the full meaning of St. Paul, who repeateth so many times this sentence, We are justified by Faith. And having read the Expositions of many upon this place, he then perceived, as well by the purpose of the old Man, as by the comfort he received in his Spirit, the vanity of those Interpretations, which he had read before of the Schoolmen. And so reading by little and little, with conferring the sayings and examples of the Prophets and Apostles, and continual invocation of God, and excitation of Faith by force of Prayer, he perceived that Doctrine most evidently. Then began he to read St. Augustine's Books, where he found many comfortable sentences: among other, in the Exposition of the Psalms, and especially in the Book of the Spirit and Letter, which confirmed this Doctrine of Faith and Consolation in his heart not a little. And yet he laid not aside the Sententiares, as Gabriel Cameracensis. Also he read the Books of Oecum, whose subtilty he preferred above Thomas Aquinas and Scotus. He read also and revolved Gerson; but above all the rest, he perused all over St. Augustine's Works with attentive cogitation. And thus continued he his study at Erford the space of four years in the Convent of the Augustines.

About this time one Staupitius, a famous Man, ministering his help to further the erection of an University in Wittenberg, and endeavouring to have Schools of Divinity founded in this new University: when he had considered the spirit and towardsness of Luther, he called him from Erford, to place him in Wittenberg, in the year 1508, and of his age 26. There his towardsness appeared in the ordinary exercise, both of his disputations in the Schools, and preaching in Churches: where many wife and learned Men attentively heard Luther, namely Dr. Melancthus.

The Institution of the University at Wittenberg. Staupitius.

This Melancthus would oftentimes say, that Luther was of such a marvellous spirit, and so ingenious, that he gave apparent signification, that he would introduce a more compendious, easie, and familiar manner of teaching, and alter and abolish the order that then was used.

The Judgment of Dr. Melancthus upon Martin Luther.

There first he expounded the Logic and Philosophy of Aristotle, and in the mean while intermitted no whit his study in Theology. Three years after he went to Rome, about certain Contentions of the Monks; and returning the same year, he was graded Doctor, at the expences of Elector Fredrick Duke of Saxony, according to the solemn manner of Schools; for he had heard him preach; well understood the quietness of his Spirit; diligently considered the vehemency of his words; and had in singular admiration those profound matters which in his Sermons he ripely and exactly explained. This degree Staupitius, against his will, enforced upon him; saying merrily unto him, that God had many things to bring to pass in his Church by him. And tho these words were spoken merrily, yet it came so to pass anon after; as many Predictions or Presages prove true before a change.

Luther sent to Rome. Frederick Duke of Saxony. Luther commenced Doctor.

After this, he began to expound the Epistle to the Romans, and consequently the Psalms: where he shewed the difference betwixt the Law and the Gospel. He also confounded the Error that reigned then in Schools and Sermons, teaching that Men may merit remission of sins by their proper works, and that they be just before God by outward Discipline, as the Pharisees taught. Luther diligently reduced the minds of Men to the Son of God. And as John Baptist demonstrated the Lamb of God which took away the sins of the World; Even so Luther (shining in the Church as a bright Star after a long cloudy and obscure Sky, expressly shewed, that sins are freely remitted for the love of the Son of God, and that we ought faithfully to embrace this bountiful Gift.

Dr. Martin Luther becometh to read the Epistle to the Romans.

Luther taught Jesus Christ.

These happy beginnings of so good matters, got him great authority, especially seeing his life also was correspondent to his profession. The consideration whereof, shewed to him marvellously the hearts of his Auditors, and also many notable Personages.

All this while Luther yet altered nothing in the Ceremonies, but precisely observed his rule among his Fellows; he medled in no doubtful Opinions, but taught this only Doctrine, as most principal of all others to all Men, opening and declaring the Doctrine of Repentance, of remission of Sins, of Faith, of true comfort in times of Adversity. Every Man received good taste of this sweet Doctrine, and the Learned conceived high pleasure to behold Jesus Christ, the Prophets, and Apostles to come forth into light, out of darkness, whereby they began to understand the difference betwixt the Law and the Gospel; betwixt the promises of the Law, and the promise of the Gospel; betwixt Spiritual Justice, and Civil Things: which certainly could not have been found in Thomas Aquinas, Scotus, and such-like School-Clerks.

It hapned moreover about this time, that many were provoked by Erasmus's learned Works, to study the Greek and Latin Tongues: who perceiving a more gentle and ready order of teaching than before, began to have in contempt the Monks barbarous and sophistical Doctrine; and especially such as were of a liberal nature and good disposition. Luther began to study the Greek and Hebrew Tongue, to this end, that after he had learned the phrase and property of the Tongues and drawn the Doctrine of the very Fountains, he might give more found judgment.

Erasmus opened the way before Luther.

As Luther was thus occupied in Germany, which was the year of our Lord 1516, Leo the tenth of that name succeeding after Julius the second, was Pope of Rome. Who under under pretence of War against the Turk, sent a Jubilee with his Pardons abroad through all Christian Realms and Dominions, whereby he gathered together innumerable Riches and Treasure. The Gatherers and Collectors whereby of perwaded the people, that whosoever would give ten shillings, should at his pleasure deliver one Soul from the pains of Purgatory. For this they held as a general rule, that God would do whatsoever they would have him, according to the saying, Quicquid solveritis super terram, erit solutum in Cælis, &c. Whatsoever you shall loose upon Earth, the same shall be loosed in Heaven. But if it were but one jot less than ten shillings, they preached that it would profit them nothing, *Ex Christi. Ten Shilling Pardons.

Tecellius preacher of the Pope's Pardons.

Luther's Propositions of Pardons.

The first occasion why Luther writ against Pardons.

The slander of Tecellius the Frier.

The praise of Frederick Duke of Saxony.

This filthy kind of the Pope's Merchandise, as it spread through all quarters of Christian Regions, so it came also to Germany, through the means of a certain Dominick Frier named Tecellius, who most impudently caused the Pope's Indulgences, or Pardons to be carried and sold about the Country. Whereupon Luther, much moved with the blasphemous Sermons of this shameless Frier, and having his heart earnestly bent with ardent desire to maintain true Religion, published certain Propositions concerning Indulgences, which are to be read in the first Tome of his Works, and set them openly on the Temple that joineth to the Castle of Wittenberg, the morrow after the Feast of all Saints, the year 1517.

This begerly Frier, hoping to obtain the Pope's blessing, assembled certain Monks, and sophistical Divines of his Convent, and forthwith commanded them to write something against Luther. And whilst he began not only to inveig in his Sermons, but to thunder against Luther; crying, Luther is an Heretic, and worthy to be persecuted with Fire. And besides this, he burned openly Luther's Propositions, and the Sermon which he wrote of Indulgences. This rage and furnish fury of this Frier, enforced Luther to treat more amply of the cause, and to maintain his matter.

And thus rose the beginnings of this Controversy; where-in Luther, neither suspecting, nor dreaming of any change that might happen in the Ceremonies, did not utterly reject the Indulgences, but required a moderation in them: and therefore they fallily accuse him, which blaze, that he began with plausible matter, whereby he might get praise, to the end that in process of time he might change the state of the Common-weal, and purchase authority either for himself or other.

And certes, he was not suborned or stirred up by them of the Court, (as the Duke of Brunswick wrote) inasmuch that the Duke Frederick was sore offended that such contention and controversy should arise, having regard to the sequel thereof.

And as this good Duke Frederick was one, of all the Princes of our time, that loved best quietness and common tranquillity; neither was avaricious, but willingly bent to refer all his Counsels to the common utility of all the World, (as it is easy to be conjectured divers ways) so he neither encouraged nor supported Luther, but often represented semblance of heaviness and sorrow which he bare in his heart, fearing greater dissensions. But being a wife Prince, and following the counsel of God's rule, and well deliberating thereupon, he thought with himself, that the Glory of God was to be preferred above all things. Neither was he ignorant what blasphemy it was, horribly condemned of God, oblatinately to repugn the Truth. Wherefore he did as a godly Prince should do; he obeyed God, committing himself to his holy grace, and omnipotent protection. And altho Maximilianus the Emperor, Carolus King of Spain, and Pope Julius, had given commandment to the said Duke Frederick, that he should inhibit Luther from all place and liberty of preaching; yet the Duke, considering with himself the preaching and writing of Luther, and weighing diligently the testimonies and places of the Scripture which he alleged, would not withstand the thing which he judged sincere. And yet neither did he this, trusting to his own judgment, but was very anxious and inquisitive to hear the judgment of others, which were both aged & learned. In the number of whom was Erasmus, whom the Duke desired to declare to him his opinion touching the matter of Martin Luther; saying and protesting, that he would rather the ground should open and swallow him, than he would bear with any opinions which he knew to be contrary to manifest truth; and therefore he desired him to declare his judgment in the matter to him, freely and friendly.

Erasmus, thus being entreated of the Duke, began thus jestingly and merrily to answer the Duke's Request, saying, That in Luther were two great faults; first, that he would touch the Bellies of Monks: the second, that he would touch the Pope's Crown; which two matters in no case are to be dealt withal. Then, opening his mind plainly to the Duke, thus he said, That Luther did dwell in detecting Errors, and that Reformation was to be wished, and very necessary in the Church: and added moreover, that the effect of his Doctrine was true: but only that he withheld in him a more temperate moderation and manner of writing and handling. Whereupon Duke Frederick shortly after wrote to Luther seriously, exhorting him to temper the vehemency of his stile. This was at the City of Colen, shortly after the coronation of the new Emperor, where also Hunsenus, Aloisius, Martianus, Ludovicus Vivæ, Halenius, with other learned Men, were assembled together, waiting upon the Emperor.

The judgment of Erasmus touching Luther. Monks bellies, and the Pope's Crown not to be touched.

Ex Epist. de c. 15.

Furthermore, the same Erasmus, the year next following that, wrote up to the Archbishop of Monte a certain Epistle touching the cause of Luther. In which Epistle thus he signifieth to the Bishop; That many things were in the Books of Luther condemned of Monks and Divines, for heretical, which in the Books of Bernard and Austin are read for sound and godly.

Also, That the World is burthened with Monks Institutions, with School-Doctrines and Opinions, and with the tyranny of begging Friars: which Friars, when they are but the Pious Servants and Underlings, yet they have grown in power and multitude, that they are now terrible, both to the Pope himself, and to all Princes. Who so long as the Pope maketh with them, so long they make him more than a God: but if he make any thing against their purpose or commodity, then they weigh his authority no more than a dream or phantom.

The Complaint of Erasmus.

Once (saith he) it was counted an Heresy when a Man repugned against the Gospel, or Articles of the Faith: Now he that dissenteth from Thomas Aquinas, is an Heretic; whatsoever doth not like them, whatsoever they understand not, that is Heresy. To speak Greek is Heresy, or to speak more finely than they do, that is with them Heresy. And thus much by the way concerning the Judgment of Erasmus.

Now to return, and to entreat something orderly of the Acts and Conflicts of Luther with his Adversaries. After that Tecellius the foresaid Frier, with his fellow Monks and fiery Fellows, had cried out with open mouth against Luther, in maintaining the Pope's Indulgences; and that Luther again, in defence of his cause, had set up Propositions against the open abuses of the same, marvel it was to see how soon these Propositions were sparkled abroad in sundry and far places, and how greedily they were caught up in the hands of divers both far and near. And thus the contention of this matter encreasing between them, Luther was compelled to write thereof more largely and fully than otherwise he thought, which was in the Year of our Lord 1517.

Ex Parallel. Annot. the first.

Yet all this while Luther never thought of any alteration to come of any Ceremony, much less such a reformation of Doctrine and Ceremonies as afterward did follow. But only hearing that he was accused to the Bishop of Rome, he did write humbly unto him: in the beginning of which Writing he declareth the inordinate outrage of those his Pardon-mongers, which so excessively did pill and poll the simple people, to the great slander of the Church, and shame to his Holiness: and to proceeding, in the end of his writing thus he submitteth himself.

Wherefore (saith he) most holy Father, I offer my self prostrate under the feet of your Holiness, with all that I am, and that I have. Save me, kill me, call me, recall me, approve me, reprove me, as you shall please. Your voice, the voice of Christ in your speaking, I will acknowledge. If I have deserved death, I shall be contented to die: For the Earth is the Lord's, and all the fulness thereof, who is to be blessed for ever. Amen. This was in the year of our Lord 1518.

The submission of Luther to the Pope.

Phil. 2. 10.

After that Martin Luther, provoked by Tecellius, had declared his mind in writing, lowly and humbly, and had set up certain Propositions to be disputed; not long after, among other Monks and Friars, steppeth up one Silvester de Priore, a Dominick Frier, who first began to

K. Hen. 8. to publish abroad a certain impudent and railing Dialogue against him. Unto whom Luther answered again, first alleging the place of the Apostle; 1 Theff. 5. That we must prove all things. Also the place, Gal. 2. That if an Angel from Heaven do bring any other Gospel than that we have received, be ought to be accursed.

Item, He alleged the place of Augustin unto Hierome, where he said Augustin saith, That he was wont to give this honour only to the Book of Canonical Scripture, that whosoever were the Writers thereof, he believeth them utterly not to have erred. But as touching all other Mens Writings, were they never so holy Men, or learned, he doth not believe them therefore, because they so say, but in that respect as they do agree with the Canonical Scripture, which cannot err.

Item, He alleged the place of the Canon Law, Clem. de Pœnit. & remis. C. Abusonibus. Wherein he proved, That these Pardon-fillers, in their sitting forth of the Pope's Indulgences, ought to go no further by the Law, than is enjoined them within the Letters of their Commission.

And in the latter part of his Answer, thus Luther writeth to the Reader, Let Opinions (saith he) remain Opinions, so they be not Tokes to the Christians. Let us not make Mens Opinions equal with the Articles of Faith, and to the doctrine of Christ and Paul. Moreover, I am ashamed (quoth he) to hear the common saying of these Divine School-Doctors, who holding one thing in the Schools, and thinking otherwise in their own Judgment, thus are wont severely among themselves, and with their privy Friends talking together, to say, Thus do we hold, and thus would we say being in the Schools: but yet (be it spoken here amongst us) it cannot be so proved by the Holy Scriptures, &c. Ex Paralip. Abb. Ulparg.

Next after this Silvester, slept forth Eckius, and impugned the conclusions of Luther. Against whom encountered D. Andreas Bodenstein, Archdeacon of Wittenberg, making his Apology in defence of Luther.

Then was Martin Luther cited the 7th of August, by one Hieronymus Bishop of Ascalon, to appear at Rome. About which time Thomas Cajetan, Cardinal, the Pope's Legat, was then Lierat in the City of Augusta, who before had been sent down in Commission, with certain Mandates of Pope Leo, unto that City. The University of Wittenberg understanding of Luther's Citation, effusions directed up their Letters, with their publick Seal, to the Pope in Luther's behalf. Also another Letter they sent to Carolus Militum the Pop's Chamberlain, being a German born. Furthermore, good Frederick ceased not for his part to sollicite the matter with his Letters and earnest Suit with Cardinal Cajetan, that the Cause of Luther might be freed from Rome, and removed to Augusta, in the hearing of the Cardinal. Cajetan, at the suit of the Duke, wrote unto the Pope: from whom he received this answer again the three and twentieth of the foresaid month of August, That he had cited Luther to appear personally before him at Rome, by Hieronymus Bishop of Ascalon Auditor of the Chamber: which Bishop diligently had done that was commanded him: but Luther, abusing and contemning the gentleness offered, did not only refuse to come, but also became more bold and stubborn continuing, or rather increasing in his former Herefy, as by his Writings did appear. Wherefore he would, that the Cardinal should cite and call up the said Luther to appear at the City of Augusta before him; adjoining withal, the aid of the Princes of Germany, and of the Emperor, if need required: so that when the said Luther should appear, he should lay hand upon him, and commit him to safe custody, and after he should be brought up to Rome: and if he perceived him to come to any knowledge or amendment of his fault, he should release him and restore him to the Church again, or else he should be interdicted, with all other his Adherents, Abettors, and Maintainers, of whatsoever state or condition they were, whether they were Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, Barons, &c. Against all which Perious and Degrees, he willed him to extend the same Curse and Malediction (only the Person of the Emperor excepted) interdicting, by the Censure of the Church, all such Lands, Lordships, Towns, Tenements, and Villages, as should minister any harbour to the said Luther, and were not obedient unto the

'See of Rome. Contrariwise, to all such as shewed themselves obedient, he should promise full remission of all their Sins.

Likewise the Pope directeth other Letters also the same time to Duke Frederick, complaining with many grievous words against Luther.

The Cardinal thus being charged with Injunctions from Rome, according to his Commission, fenceth with all speed for Luther to appear at Augusta before him.

About the beginning of October, Martin Luther yielding his obedience to the Church of Rome, came to Augusta at the Cardinal's sending, (at the charges of the noble Prince Elector, and also with his Letters of Commendation) where he remained three days before he came to his speech; for so it was provided by his Friends, that he should not enter talk with the Cardinal, before a sufficient Warrant or safe Conduct was obtained of the Emperor Maximilian. Which being obtained, effoons he entred, offering himself to the speech of the Cardinal, and was there received of the Cardinal very gently: who, according to the Pope's commandment, propounded unto Martin Luther three things; or as Sliden saith, but two; to wit;

1. That he should repent and revoke his Errors.
2. That he should promise, from that time forward, to refrain from the same.
3. That he should refrain from all things that might by any means trouble the Church.

When Martin Luther required to be informed wherein he had erred, the Legat brought forth the Extravagants of Clement, which beginneth, Unigenitus, &c. because that he, contrary to that Canon, had held and taught in his fifty eight Propositions, That the Merits of Christ, are not the treasure of Indulgences or Pardons. Secondly, The Cardinal, contrary to the seventh Proposition of Luther, affirmed, that Faith is not necessary to him that receiveth the Sacrament.

Furthermore, another day, in the presence of four of the Emperors Council, having there a Notary, and Witneses present, Luther protested for himself, and personally, in this manner following.

Imprimis, I Martin Luther, a Frier Augustine, protest, That I do reverence and follow the Church of Rome in all my sayings and doings, present, past, and to come; and if any thing hath been, or shall be said by me to the contrary, I count it, and will that it be counted and taken as as tho it had never been spoken. But because the Cardinal hath acquired at the commandment of the Pope, three things of me to be observed:

1. That I should return again to the knowledg of my self.
2. That I should beware of falling into the same again hereafter.
3. That I should promise to abstain from all things which might disquiet the Church of God.

I protest here this day, That whatsoever I have said, seemeth unto me to be found, true, and Catholick; yet for the further proof thereof, I do offer my self personally, either here or elsewhere, publicly to give a reason of my sayings. And if this please not the Legat, I am ready also in writing to answer his Objections, if he have any against me: and touching these things, to hear the sentence and judgment of the Universities of the Empire, Basil, Friburg, and Louvaine. Hereof when they had received an answer in writing, they departed.

After this, Luther by and by prepareth an answer to the Legat, teaching, that the Merits of Christ are not committed unto Men: that the Pope's Voice is to be heard when he speaketh agreeable to the Scriptures: that the Pope may err, that he ought to be reprehended, Act. 15. Moreover he shewed, that in the matter of Faith, not only the General Council, but also every faithful Christian is above the Pope, if he leane to better Authority and Reason: that the Extravagant containeth untruths: that it is an infallible verity, that none is just: that it is necessary, for him that cometh to the receiving of the Sacrament, to believe: that Faith in the abolition and remission of sins, is necessary: that he ought not, nor might not decline from the verity of the Scripture: that he sought nothing but the light of the Truth, &c.

swer to the Cardinal.

But the Cardinal would hear no Scriptures, he disputed without Scriptures; he deviled Glosses and Expositions of his own head; and by Distinctions (wherewith the Divinity of the Thomists is full) like a very Proteus he avoided all things. After this, Luther being commanded to come no more in the presence of the Legate, except he would recant, notwithstanding abode there still, and would not depart. Then the Cardinal sent for Joannes Stuppius, Vicar of the Angustines, and moved him earnestly to bring Luther to recant of his own accord. Luther tarried the next day also, and nothing was said unto him. The third day moreover he tarried, and delivered up his mind in Writing: in which, first, 'he thanked him for his courtesie and great kindness, which he perceived by the words of Stuppius, toward him; and therefore was the more ready to gratifie him in whatsoever kind of Office he could do him service: confest moreover, that where he had been somewhat sharp and eager against the Pope's Dignity, that was not so much of his own mind, as it was to be ascribed to the importunity of certain which gave him occasion. Notwithstanding, as he acknowledged his excess therein, so he was ready to shew more moderation in that behalf hereafter, and also promised to make amends for the same unto the Bishop, and that in the Pulpit, if he pleased. And as touching the matter of Pardons, he promised also to proceed no further in any mention thereof, so that his Adversaries likewise were bound to keep silence. But whereas he was prest to retract his sentence before defended; so far as he had said nothing but with a good Conscience, and which was agreeable to the firm Testimonies of the Scripture: therefore he humbly desired the determination thereof to be referred to the Bishop of Rome: for nothing could be more grateful to him, than to hear the voice of the Church speaking, &c.

Pride will

Who doth not see by this so humble and honest submission of Luther, but that if the Bishop of Rome would have been answered with any Reason, or contented with sufficient mean, he had never been touched any further of Luther? but the secret purpose of God had a further work herein to do: for the time now was come, when God thought good that pride should have a fall. Thus while the unmeasurable desire of that Bishop sought more than enough (like to Elipse Dog, coveting to have both flesh and shadow) not only he missed that he gaped for, but also lost that which he had.

But to the purpose of our matter again: this Writing Luther delivered to the Cardinal, the third day after he was commanded out of his sight. Which Letter or Writing the Cardinal did little regard. When Luther saw that he would give no answer nor countenance to the Letter; yet notwithstanding he remained after that the fourth day, and nothing was answered: the fifth day likewise was passed with silence, and nothing done. At the length, by the counsel of his Friends, and especially because the Cardinal had said before, that he had a Commandment to imprison Luther and John Stuppius the Vicar; after that he had made and set up his Appeal, where it might be seen and read, he departed, thinking that he had shewed such dangerous obedience long enough. Luther, a beholder and a doer of these things, recordeth the same, and sheweth the cause why he submitted himself to the Church of Rome: declaring also, that even those things which are most truly spoken, yet ought to be maintained and defended with humility and fear. Some things he suppresseth and concealeth, which he supposed the Reader to understand, not without grief and sorrow. At length he protesteth, that he reverently and followeth the Church of Rome in all things, and that he setteth himself only against those, which, under the name of the Church of Rome, go about to set forth and commend Babylon unto us.

ent to the Sec of Rome.

Another letter to the Legat.

Thus have you heard, how that Luther, being rejected from the speech and sight of Cajetan the Cardinal, after six days waiting, departed by the advice of his Friends, and returned into Wittenberg: leaving a Letter in writing to be given to the Cardinal: wherein he declared sufficiently, first his Obedience in his coming, the Reasons of his Doctrine, his submission reasonable to the Sec of Rome, his long waiting after he was repelled from the Cardinal's speech, the Charges of the Duke, and finally, the cause of his departing. Besides this Letter to the Cardinal, he left also an Appellation to the Bishop of Rome, from the Cardinal; which he caused to be affixed before his Departure.

After that Luther was thus departed and returned again into his Country, Cajetan writeth to Duke Fredrick a sharp and a biting Letter: in which first he signifieth unto him his gentle entertainment and good-will shewed to reduce Luther from his Error. Secondly he complaineth of the sudden departing of him, and of Stuppius. Thirdly, he declareth the pernicious danger of Luther's Doctrine against the Church of Rome. Fourthly, he exhorteth the Duke, that as he tendereth his own Honour and Safety, and regardeth the Favour of the high Bishop, he will fend him up to Rome, or expel him out of his Dominions, so far as such a Penitence breeding, as that was, could not, neither ought by any means long to be furthered.

To this Letter of the Cardinal the Duke answereth again at large, purging both Luther and himself's Luther, in that he following his Conscience, grounded upon the Word of God, would not revoke that for an Error, which could be proved no Error: and himself he excuseth thus; that where it is required of him to banish him his Country, or to fend him up to Rome, it would be little honestly for him so to do, and less Conscience, unless he knew just cause why he should so do: Which if the Cardinal would or could declare unto him, there should lack nothing in him which were the part of a Christian Prince to do. And therefore he desired him to be a means unto the Bishop of Rome, that Innocency and Truth be not oppressed before the crime, or error be lawfully convicted.

This done, the Duke sendeth the Letter of the Cardinal unto Martin Luther. Who answered again to the Prince; shewing first how he came obediently unto Cajetan with the Emperor's Warrant; and what talk there was between them: how Cajetan pressed him, against his Conscience and manifest Truth, to revoke their Errors. First, that the Merits of Christ's passion were not the Treasure of the Pope's Pardons. Secondly, that Faith was necessary in receiving the Sacraments. Albeit in the first he was content to yield to the Cardinal; in the second, because it touched a great part of our Salvation, he could not with a safe Conscience relent; but desired to be taught by the Scripture: or at least, that the matter might be brought into open Disputation in some free place of Germany, where the Truth might be discussed and judged of learned Men. The Cardinal not pleased with this, in great Anger cast out many menacing words, neither would admit him any more to his presence or speech: whereas he yet notwithstanding persisting in his Obedience to the Church of Rome, gave attendance, waiting upon the Cardinal's pleasure a sufficient time.

At last, when no Answer would come; after he had waited the space of five or six days, to his great detriment, and greater danger, by the perswasion of his Friends he departed. Whereat if the Cardinal were displeased, he had most cause to blame himself. And now whereas the Cardinal threatmeth me (saith he) not to let the Action fall, but that the process thereof shall be pursued at Rome, unless I either come and present my self, or else be banished your Dominions; I am not so much grieved for mine own cause, as that you should sustain for my matter any danger or peril. And therefore seeing there is no place nor Country which can keep me from the Malice of my Adversaries, I am willing to depart hence, and to forsake my Country, whithersoever it shall please the Lord to lead me: thanking God, which hath counted me worthy to suffer thus much for the Glory of Christ's Name.

Here (no doubt) was the cause of Luther in great danger, being now brought to this strait, that both Luther was ready to fly the Country, and the Duke again was as much afraid to keep him; had not the marvellous Providence of God (who had this matter in guiding) here provided a Remedy where the power of man did fail, by stirring up the whole University of Wittenberg: who seeing the cause of Truth thus to decline, with a full and general consent addressed their Letters unto the Prince, in defence of Luther and of his Cause; making their humble suite unto him, that he of his Princely Honour would not suffer Innocency, and the simplicity of Truth, so clear as is the Scripture, to be foiled and oppressed by meer Violence of certain malignant Flatterers about the Pope: but

By the occasion of these Letters, the Duke began more seriously in his mind to consider the cause of Luther, and to read his Works, and also to hearken to his Sermons. Whereby (through God's holy working) he grew to knowledge and strength, perceiving in Luther's quarrel more than he did before. This was about the beginning of December, Anno 1518.

As this past on, Pope Leo playing the Lyon at Rome, in the mean time, in the Month of November, to stablish his seat against this defection which he feared to come, had sent forth new Indulgences into Germany, and all quarters abroad, with a new Edict, wherein he declared this to be the Catholick Doctrine of the holy Mother-Church of Rome, Prince of all other Churches, that Bishops of Rome, which are Successors of Peter, and Vicars of Christ, have this Power and Authority given to release and dispense, also to grant Indulgences available both for the living and for the dead, lying in the pains of Purgatory: and this Doctrine he charged to be received of all faithful Christian Men, under pain of the great Curse, and utter separation from all holy Church.

This Popish Decree and Indulgence, as a new Merchandise or Ale-take to get Money, being set up in all quarters of Christendom for the holy Fathers Advantage, came also to be received in Germany about the Month of December. Luther in the mean time, hearing how they were about in Rome to proceed and pronounce against him, provided a certain Appellation conceived in due form of Law, wherein he appealeth from the Pope to the general Council.

When Pope Leo perceived, that neither his Pardons would prosper to his mind, nor that Luther could be brought to Rome; to assay how to come to his purpose by crafty Allurements, he sent his Chamberlain Carolus Militius above-mentioned, (which was a German) into Saxony to Duke Frederick, with a golden Rofe, after the usual Ceremony accustomed every year to be presented to him, with secret Letters also to certain Noble Men of the Duke's Council, to solicit the Pope's cause, and to remove the Duke's mind, if it might be, from Luther.

But before Militius approached into Germany, Maximilian the Emperor deceased in the Month of January, Anno 1519. At what time two there were which stood for the Election: to wit, Francis the French King, and Charles King of Spain, which was also Duke of Austria, and Duke of Burgundy. To make this matter short, through the means of Frederick Prince Elector (who having the offer of the preferment, refused the same) the Election fell to Carolus, called Carolus the fifth, surnamed Prudence: which was about the end of August.

In the Month of June before there was a publick Disputation ordained at Lyppia, which is a City in Misnia, under the Dominion of George Duke of Saxony, Uncle to Duke Frederick. This Disputation first began through the occasion of Joannes Eckius a Friar, and Andreas Carolostadius, Doctor of Wittenberg. This Eckius had impugned certain Propositions or Conclusions of Martin Luther, which he had written the year before touching the Pope's Pardons. Against him Carolostadius wrote in defence of Luther. Eckius again to answer Carolostadius, set forth an Apology. Upon this began the Disputation, with safe conduct granted by Duke George, to all and singular persons that would refer to the same. To this Disputation came also Martin Luther, with Philip Melancthon, who not past a year before was newly come to Wittenberg; Luther not thinking then to dispute any matter, because of his Appellation above-mentioned, but only to hear what there was said and done.

First, before the entry into the Disputation it was agreed, that the Acts should be penned by Notaries, and after divulged abroad. But Eckius afterward went back from that, pretending, that the penning of the Notaries should be an hindrance and a stay unto them, whereby the heat of them in their Reasoning should the more languish, and their Vehemency abate. But Carolostadius without Notaries would not dispute. The sum of their Disputations was reduced to certain Conclusions. Amongst which, first came in question to dispute of Free-Will, which the Greeks call αιδωτερον:

That is, Whether a man have of himself any Election or purpose to do that which is good: or (to use the terms of the School) Whether a Man of congruence may deserve Grace, doing that which in him doth lie? Herein when the Question was to be discussed, what the Will of man may do of it self, without Grace: they through heat of contention (as the manner is) fell into other By-matters and Ambages little or nothing appertaining to that which Carolostadius proposed. Eckius affirmed, that the pure strength to do good is not in man's Will, but is given of God to man, to take Interest and Increase of man again, which but he seemed do deny. Then being asked of Carolostadius, whether the whole and full good work that is in man proceedeth of God? To this he answered, the whole good work, but not wholly: granting, that the Will is moved of God; but to content, to be in man's power. Against this Reasoned Carolostadius, alledging certain places of Austin, and namely of St. Paul, which faith, That God worketh in us both to will, and to perform. And this sentence of Carolostadius seemed to overcome. Eckius for his assertion inferred certain Scriptures out of Bernard, which seemed little to the purpose. And thus was a whole Week lost about this contentious and sophistical Altercation between Eckius and Carolostadius.

Luther (as was said) came, not thinking at all to dispute; but having true liberty granted by the Duke, and under the Pope's Authority, was provoked, and forced against his Will, to dispute with Eckius. The matter of their Controversie was about the Authority of the Bishop of Rome. Here is first to be admonished, that Luther before had set forth in Writing this Doctrine: That they which do attribute the Preheminency to the Church of Rome, have no Foundation for them, but out of the Pope's Decrees, set forth not much past four hundred years heretofore: which Decrees he affirmed to be quite contrary to all ancient Histories, above a thousand years past, contrary also to the holy Scriptures, and unto the Nine Council.

Against this Assertion Eckius set up a contrary Conclusion; saying, That they which hold that the Supremacy and Preheminency of the Church of Rome above all other Churches was not before the time of Pope Silvester the first, do err, forasmuch as they, which succeeded in the See and Faith of Peter, were always received for the Successors of Peter, and Vicars of Christ in Earth.

This being the last of all the other Themes of Eckius, yet thought he chiefly to begin with this against Luther, to bring him into more disquietude with the Bishop of Rome: wherein Luther himself much refused to dispute, alledging that matter to be more odious than necessary for that present time, and that also for the Bishop of Rome's sake, he had much rather keep silence in the same. Whereunto if he must needs be urged, he would the Fault should be understood of all men to be where it was, namely in his Adversaries which provoked him thereunto, and not in himself. Eckius again clearing himself, translateth all the Fault unto Luther, which first in his Treatise of Indulgentius Pope defended, that before Pope Silvester's time the Church of Rome had no place of Majority or Preheminence above other Churches: and also before the Cardinal Cajetan affirmed, That Pope Pelagius wrested many places of the Scripture out of their proper sense, unto his own affection and purpose. Wherefore the Faults herof (said he) to him rather is to be imputed, which ministred the first Occasion.

Thus Luther being egged and constrained to dispute, whether he would or no, the Question began to be propounded touching the Supremacy of the Bishop of Rome; which Supremacy Eckius did contend to be founded and grounded upon God's Law. Master Luther on the other side denied not the Supremacy of the Bishop of Rome above other Churches, neither denied the same moreover to be Universal over all Churches; but only he affirmed it not to be instituted by God's Law. Upon this Question the Disputation did continue the space of five days. During all which season, Eckius very unbonestly and uncountercourteously demeaned himself, studying by all means how to bring his Adversary into the hatred of the Auditors, and into danger of the Pope. The reasons of Eckius were these: Forasmuch as the Church, being a civil Body, cannot be without an head, therefore as it standeth with God's Law, that other civil Regiments should not be definite of their head: so is it by God's Law requisite, that the Pope should be the Head of the Universal Church of Christ. To this Martin Luther answered, That he confesseth and granteth the Church not to be headless so long as Christ is alive, who is the only Head of the Church; neither doth the Church require any other Head beside him, forasmuch as it is a spiritual Kingdom, and not earthly: And he alledged for him the place of Coloss. 1. Eckius again produceth certain places out of Hierome and Cyprian, which made very little to prove the Primacy of the Pope to hold by God's Law. As touching the Testimony of Bernard, neither was the Authority of that Author of any great force in this case, neither was the place alledged so greatly to the purpose.

Then came he to the place of St. Matthew, Tu es Petrus, &c. Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock will I build my Church, &c. To this was answered, That this was a Confession of Faith; and that Peter there representeth the person of the whole Universal Church, as Austin doth expound it. Also that Christ in that place meant himself to be the Rock, as is manifest to collect both by his Words, and order of the Sentence, and many other conjectures. Likewise to the place of St. John, Pasce oves meas, Feed my Sheep. (Which words Eckius alledged to be spoken properly and peculiarly to Peter alone.) Martin answered, That after these Words spoken, equal Authority was given to all the Apostles, where Christ faith unto them; Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whose sins sever ye remit, they are remitted, &c. By these Words (faith he) Christ, assigning to them their Office, doth teach what is to feed, and what he ought to be that feedeth.

After this, Eckius came to the Authority of the Council of Constance; alledging this amongst other Articles: De necessitate salutaris esse credere Romanum Pontificem Oecumenicum esse: That is, that it standeth upon necessity of our Salvation, to believe the Bishop of Rome to be Supreme Head of the Church: Alledging moreover, that in the same Council it was debated and discussed, that the general Council could not err. Whereunto Martin Luther again did answer discreetly, saying, That all the Articles which John Huic did hold in that Council, were not condemned for heretical, with much other matter more. Again, of what Authority that Council of Constance is to be esteemed, that he left to other men's judgments. This is most certain (said he) that no Council hath such Authority to make new Articles of Faith. Here Martin Luther began to be cried out of by Eckius and his Complices, for diminishing the Authority of general Councils: although indeed he meant nothing less, but ever laboured to confirm the authority of the same. Yet was he called Heretic and Schismatic, and one of the Bohemian Faction, with many other terms more of reproachful contumely. Eckius then granted the authority of the Apostles to be equal: and yet not to follow thereby, the authority of all Bishops therefore to be equal: For between Apostleship and Ministry (faith he) there is great difference. To conclude, Eckius in no case could abide that any creature should decline from any word or sentence of the Pope's Decrees, or the Constitutions of the Forefathers. To this again Luther answered, grounding himself upon the place ad Gal. 2. where St. Paul speaking of the principal Apostles, faith; And of them which seemed to be great, what they were before it maketh no matter to me, for God accepteth no Man's person: Nevertheless, that they were of some Reputation did avail nothing at all.

Eckius to this said, That as touching the Authority of the Apostles, they were all chosen of Christ, but were ordained Bishops of St. Peter. And whereas Luther brought in the Constitution of the Decree, which faith; Ne Romanus Pontifex Universalis Episcopus nominetur, &c. Tea, let not the Bishop of Rome be called Universal Bishop, &c. To this Eckius answered on this sort: That the Bishop of Rome ought not to be called Universal Bishop; yet he may be called (faith he) Bishop of the Universal Church. And thus much touching the Question of the Pope's Supremacy.

From this matter they came next to Purgatory, wherein Eckius kept no order; for when they should have disputed what power the Pope hath in Purgatory; Eckius turneth the scope of the Question, and proveth that there is Purgatory; and alledgeth for him the place of Macabees. Luther, leaning upon the Judgment of Hierome, affirmeth the Book of Macabees not to be Canonical. Eckius again replieth, the Book of Macabees to be of no less authority than the Gospels. Also he alledgeth the place, 1 Cor. 3. He shall be saved, yet so as it were by fire. Moreover, he inferred the place of Matthew 5. Agree thou with thine Adversary while thou art in the way with him, lest he commit thee to Prison, from whence thou shalt not escape till thou hast paid the uttermost Farthing, &c. To this he added also the place of the Psalms, We have passed through the Fire and Water, &c. How these places be wrested to Purgatory, let the Reader discern and judge. Then was inferred the Question of Indulgences, whereof Eckius seemed to make but a toy, and a matter of nothing, and so passed it over.

At last they came to the Question of Penance: touching which matter, the Reasons of Eckius digressed much from the purpose, which went about to prove, that there be some manner of Pains of satisfaction: which thing Luther did never deny: but that for every particular Offence such particular Penance is exacted of God's Justice upon the repentant Sinner, as is in man's power to remit or release as pleaseth him; such Penance neither Luther, nor any true Christian did admit.

And thus have we the chief Effect of this Disputation between Luther and Eckius at Lyppsia, which was in the Month of July, Anno 1519.

About the beginning of the same year 1519, Ulrick Zuinglius came first to Zurich, and there began to teach. Who in the sixteenth Article in his Book of Articles, recordeth, that Luther and he both at one time, one not knowing nor hearing of another, began to write against the Pope's Pardons and Indulgences. Albeit, if the time be rightly counted, I suppose we shall find that Luther began a year or two before Zuinglius. Notwithstanding, this doth Sleidan testify, that in this present year, when Samson a Franciscan came with the Pope's Pardons to Zurich, Ulrick Zuinglius did withstand him, and declared his Chaffer and Pardons to be but a vain seducing of the people, to inveigle away their Money. Ex Sleid. lib. 1.

The next year ensuing, which was 1520, the Friars and Doctors of Louvain, and also of Colon, condemned the Books of Luther as heretical. Against whom Luther again effectually defended himself, and charged them with obstinate Violence and malicious Impiety. After this, within few days flashed out from Rome the Thunderbolt of Pope Leo against the said Luther, notwithstanding, he so humbly and obediently before had revered both the person of the Pope, and assigned the authority of his See, and had also dedicated unto him the Book intitled, De Christiana libertate: that is, Of Christian Liberty. In which Book these two points principally he discussed and proveth;

1. That a Christian man is free, and Lord over all things, and subject to none.
2. That a Christian man is a diligent Underling and Servant of all men, and to every man subject.

Moreover, in the same year he set out a Defence of all his Articles, which the Pope's Bull had before condemned.

Another Book also he wrote to the Nobility of Germany, in the which Book he impugneth and shaketh the three principal Walls of the Papists: the first whereof is this:

1. Whereas the Papists say, that no temporal or prophane Magistrate hath any power upon the Spirituality, but these have power over the other.
2. Where any place of Scripture, being in controversy, is to be decided, they say, No man may expound the Scripture, or be Judge thereof, but only the Pope.
3. When any Council is brought against them, they say, That no man hath authority to call a Council, but only the Pope.

Moreover, in the fore said Book divers other matters he handleth and discourseth: That the Pope can trop no free Council; also what things ought to be handled in Councils: That the pride of the Pope is not to be suffered. What money goeth out of Germany yearly to the Pope, amounting to the Sum of three Millions of Florences. The true meaning of this Verse he expoundeth: Tu supplex ora: tu propterea, tuque labora. Here is good Doctrine of Eckius.

The question of Purgatory.

The fourth day after his repair, a Gentleman named Ulrich of Pappenheim, Lieutenant-General of the Men at Arms of the Empire, was commanded by the Emperor before dinner to repair to Luther, and to enjoin him at four of the Clock in the afternoon to appear before the Imperial Majesty, the Princes Electors, Dukes, and other Estates of the Empire, to understand the cause of his sending for: Whereunto he willingly agreed, as his duty was.

And after four a clock, Ulrich of Pappenheim, and Caspar Sturm the Emperor's Herald (who conducted Master Luther from Wittenberg to Worms) came for Luther, and accompanied him through the Garden of the Knights of the Rhodes place, to the Earl Palatine's Palace: and left the People that thronged in should molest him, he was led by secret stairs to the place where he was appointed to have audience. Yet many, who perceived the pretence, violently rushed in, and were resisted, albeit in vain: many ascended the Galleries, because they desired to behold Luther.

Thus standing before the Emperor, the Electors, Dukes, Earls, and all the Estates of the Empire assembled there, he was first advertised by Ulrich of Pappenheim to keep silence, until such time as he was required to speak. Then John Eckius above mentioned, who then was the Bishop of Trier's general Official, with a loud and intelligible voice, first in Latin, then in Dutch, according to the Emperor's Commandment, said and proposed this sentence in manner as ensueth, or like in effect:

Martin Luther, the sacred and inviolable Imperial Majesty hath enjoined, by the consent of all the Estates of the Holy Empire, that thou shouldst be appeared before the Throne of his Majesty, to the end I might demand of thee these two Points.

First, Whether thou confessest these Books here (for he shewed a heap of Luther's Books written in the Latin and Dutch tongues) and which are in all places dispersed, entitled with thy name, be thine, and thou dost affirm them to be thine, or not?

Secondly, Whether thou wilt recant and revoke them, and all that is contained in them, or rather meanest to stand to that thou hast written?

Then, before Luther repaired to answer, Mr. Jerome Scorfus, a Lawyer of Wittenberg, required that the Titles of the Books should be read. Forwith the foresaid Eckius named certain of the Books, and those principally which were imprinted at Basil: among the which he nominated his Commentaries upon the Psalter, his Book of Good Works, his Commentary upon the Lord's Prayer, and divers other which were not contentious.

After this, Luther answered thus in Latin and in Dutch.

'Two things are proposed unto me by the Imperial Majesty: First, Whether I will avouch for mine all those Books that bear my name. Secondly, Whether I will maintain or revoke any thing that hitherto I have devised and published. Whereunto I will answer as briefly as I can.

'In the first, I can do none other than recognize those Books to be mine which lastly were named, and certainly I will never recant any clause thereof. In the second, to declare whether I will wholly defend, or call back any thing comprised in them: so far as there be questions of Faith, and the Salvation of the Soul, (and this concerneth the Word of God, which is the greatest and most excellent matter that can be in Heaven or Earth, and the which we ought duly evermore to reverence) this might be accounted in me a rashness of Judgment, and even a most dangerous attempt, if I should pronounce any thing before I were better advised: considering I might recite something less than the matter importeth, and more than the truth requireth, if I did not premeditate that which I would speak. The which two things well considered, doth first before mine eyes this sentence of our Lord Jesus Christ: wherein it is said, Whosoever shall deny me before Men, I will deny him before my Father. I require then for this cause, and humbly beseech the Imperial Majesty to grant me liberty and leisure to deliberate: so that I may satisfy the Interrogation made unto me, without prejudice of the Word of God, and peril of mine own Soul, Whereupon the Princes began to deliberate. This done, Eckius the Prolocutor pronounced what was their resolution, saying, 'Albeit, Mr. Luther, thou hast sufficiently understood by the Emperor's Commandment, the cause of thy appearance here, and therefore dost not deserve to have any further respite given thee to determine; yet the Emperor's Majesty, of his meek clemency, granteth thee one day to meditate for thy answer, so that to-morrow at this instant hour thou shalt repair to exhibit thine Opinion, not in writing, but to pronounce the same with a lively voice.

This done, Luther was led to his lodging by the Herald. But herein I may not be oblivious, that in the way going to the Emperor, and when he was in the Assembly of Princes, he was exhorted of other to be courageous, and manly to demean himself, and not to fear them that can kill the Body, but not the Soul; but rather to dread him that is able to send both Body and Soul to everlasting Fire.

Furthermore, he was encouraged with this sentence; When thou art before Kings, think not what thou shalt speak, for it shall be given to thee in that hour.

The next day, after four a clock, the Herald came and brought Luther from his lodging, to the Emperor's Court, where he abode till six a clock, for that the Princes were occupied in grave Consultations; abiding there, and being environed with a great number of People, and almost smothered for the press that was there. Then after, when the Princes were set, and Luther entered, Eckius the Official began to speak in this manner:

'Yesterday at this hour the Emperor's Majesty assigned thee to be here, Mr. Luther, for that thou didst affirm those Books that we named yesterday to be thine. Further, to the Interrogation by us made, whether thou wouldst approve all that is contained in them, or abolish and make void any part thereof, thou didst require time of deliberation, which was granted, and is now expired; albeit thou oughtest not to have opportunity granted to deliberate, considering it was not unknown to thee wherefore we cited thee. And as concerning the matter of Faith, every Man ought to be so prepared, that at all times, whensoever he shall be required, he may give certain and constant reason thereof; and thou especially, being counted a Man of such learning, and so long time exercised in Theology. Then go to, answer even now to the Emperor's demand, whose bounty thou hast proved in giving thee leisure to deliberate: Wilt thou now maintain all thy Books which thou hast acknowledged, or revoke any part of them, and submit thyself?

The Official made this Interrogation in Latin and in Dutch. Martin Luther answered in Latin and in Dutch in this wise, modestly and lowly, and yet not without some stoutness of stomach, and Christian constancy; so as his Adversaries would gladly have had his courage more humbled and abated, but yet more earnestly desired his recantation; whereof they were in some good hope, when they heard him desire respite of time to make his answer.

His Answer was this.

Most magnificent Emperor, and you most noble Princes, and my most gentle Lords, I appear before you here at the hour prescribed unto me yesterday, yielding the obedience which I owe; humbly beseeching, for God's Mercy, your most renowned Majesty, and your Graces and Honours, that ye will minister to me this courtesy, to attend this cause benignly, which is the cause (as I trust) of Justice and Verity. And if by ignorance I have not given unto every one of you your just Titles, or if I have not observed the ceremonies and countenance of the Court, offending against them; it may please you to pardon me of your benignities, as one that only hath frequented Cloisters, and not courtly Civilities. And first, as touching my self, I can affirm or promise no other thing, but only this; that I have taught hitherto, in simplicity of mind, that which I have thought to tend to God's Glory, and to the Salvation of Mens Souls.

Now as concerning the two Articles objected by your most excellent Majesty, Whether I would acknowledge those Books which were named, and be published in my name, and whether I would maintain and not revoke them: I have given a resolute answer to the first, in the which I persist,

For I will acknowledge nothing but that I have written, and that which I have written I will not deny.

He divideth into 3 parts.

Now to answer to the second Article; I beseech your most excellent Majesty, and your Graces, to vouchsafe to give ear. All my Books are not of one sort; there be some in which I have so simply and soundly declared and opened the Religion of Christian Faith, and of good Works, that my very Enemies are compelled to confess them to be profitable and worthy to be read of all Christians. And truly the Pope's Bull (how cruel and tyrannous soever it be) judgeth certain of my Books inculpable: albeit the same, with severe sentence, thundereth against me, and with monstrous cruelty condemneth my Books: which Books if I should revoke, I might worthily be thought to neglect and transgress the office of a true Christian, and to be one alone that repugneth the publick confession of all people. There is another sort of my Books which containeth Invektives against the Papacy, and others of the Pope's Retime, which have with their pestiferous Doctrine, and pernicious Examples, corrupted the whole state of our Christianity. Neither can any deny or dissemble this, (whereunto universal experience and common complaint of all bear witness) that the Consciences of all faithful Men be most miserably intrapped, vexed, and cruelly tormented by the Pope's Laws and Doctrines of Men. Also that the Goods and Substance of Christian People are devoured, especially in this noble and famous Country of Germany, and yet without order, and in most detestable manner are suffered still to be devoured, without all measure, by incredible tyranny: notwithstanding that they themselves have ordained to the contrary in their own proper Laws, as in the Distin. 9. & 25. Augst. 1. & 2. where they themselves have decreed, That all such Laws of Popes which be repugnant to the Doctrine of the Gospel, and the Opinions of the Ancient Fathers, are to be judged erroneous, and reprov'd.

The Pope
contrary to his own Doctrine.

If then I should revoke these, I can do no other but add more force to their tyranny, and open not only Windows but wide Gates to their Impiety, which is like to extend more wide, and more licentious than ever it durst heretofore. And by the testimony of this my retraction, their insolent Kingdom shall be made more licentious, and less subject to punishment, intolerable to the common people, and also more confirmed and established, especially if this be bruited, that I Luther have done this by the Authority of your most excellent Majesty, and the sacred Roman Empire. O Lord, what a cover or shadow shall I be then to cloak their naughtiness and tyranny!

The rest, or third sort of my Books, are such as I have written against certain and private singular persons, to wit, against such as with tooth and nail labour to maintain the Romish Tyranny, and to deface the true Doctrine and Religion which I have taught and professed. As touching these, I plainly confess, I have been more vehement than my Religion and Profession required. For I make my self no Saint, and I dispute not of my Life, but of the Doctrine of Christ.

And these I cannot without prejudice call back. For by this Recantation it will come to pass, that tyranny and impiety shall reign, supported by my means, and so shall they exercise cruelty against God's people more violently and ragingly than before.

He requireth

structed, if

John 18.

Nevertheless, for that I am a Man, and not God, I can none otherwise enterprise to defend my Books, than did my very Lord Jesus Christ defend his Doctrine. Who being examined of his Learning before Annas, and having received a buffet of the Minister, said, If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the Evil.

If the Lord (who was perfect and could not err) refused not to have testimony given against his Doctrine, yea of a most vile Servant; how much the more than I, that am but vile corruption, and can of my self do nothing but err, ought earnestly to see and require if any will bear witness against my Doctrine.

Therefore I require, for God's Mercy, your most excellent Majesty, your Graces and right honourable Lordships, or whatsoever he be of high or low degree, here to lay in his Testimony, to convict my Errors, and confute me by the Scriptures, either out of the Prophets, or the Apostles, and I will be most ready, if I be so instructed, to revoke any manner of Error: yea, and will be the first that shall consume mine own Books and burn them.

I suppose hereby it may appear, that I have perpended and well weighed before the perils and dangers, the divisions and dissensions which have risen throughout the whole World by reason of my Doctrine, whereof I was vehemently and sharply yesterday admonished. Concerning which divisions of Men's Minds what other Men do judge I know not; as touching my self, I conceive no greater delectation in any thing, than when I behold discords and dissensions stirred up for the Word of God: For such is the course and proceeding of the Gospel: Jesus Christ faith, I came not to send Peace but a Sword; I came to set Math. 10. a Man at variance with his Father.

And further, we must think, that our God is marvelous and terrible in his Counsels; lest perhaps that which we endeavour with earnest study to achieve and bring to pass (if we begin first with condemning of his Word) the same redound again to an huge Sea of Evil: and left the new reign of this young and bounteous Prince Charles (in whom, next after God, we all conceive singular hope) be lamentable, unfortunate, and miserably begun.

I could exemplify this with authorities of the Scriptures more effectually, as by Pharaoh, the King of Babylon, and the Kings of Israel, who then most obscured the bright Sun of their Glory, and procured their own ruin, when by sage Counsels they attempted to pacify and establish their Governments and Realms, and not by God's Counsels: for it is he that intrappeth the wily in their Wilefulness, and subverteth Mountains before they be aware. Wherefore it is good, and God's Work, to dread the Lord.

I speak not this, supposing that to polittick and prudent heads have need of my Doctrine and Admonition, but because I would not omit to profit my Country, and offer my Duty or Service, that may tend to the advancement of the same. And thus I humbly commend me to your most excellent Majesty, and your honourable Lordships; beseeching you that I may not incur your displeasures, neither be condemned of you through the pursuit of my Adversaries. I have spoken.

These words pronounced, then Eckius, the Emperor's Prolocutor, with a stern countenance began, and said, That Luther had not answered to any purpose: neither behoved it him to call in question things in time past, concluded and defined by General Councils: and therefore they required of him a plain and direct answer, whether he would revoke or no?

Then Luther: Considering (said he) your Sovereign Majesty, and your Honours, require a plain answer; this I say and profess as resolutely as I may, without doubting or sophistication, that if I be not convinced by testimonies of the Scriptures, and by probable reasons (for I believe not the Pope, neither his General Councils, which have erred many times, and have been contrary to themselves) my Conscience is so bound and captivated in these Scriptures and Word of God which I have alledged, that I will not, nor may may not revoke any manner of thing; considering it is not godly or lawful to do any thing against Conscience. Hereupon I stand and rest: I have not what else to say. God have mercy upon me.

The Princes consulted together upon this answer given by Luther: And when they had diligently examined the same, the Prolocutor began to reuel him thus:

Martin (said he) thou hast more immediately answered than befemed thy Person, and also little to the purpose. Thou dividest thy Books in three sorts, in such order as all that thou hast said maketh nothing to the Interrogation proposed: and therefore if thou hadst revoked those wherein the greatest part of thine Errors is contained, the Emperor's Majesty, and the noble clemency of others would have suffered the rest that be found to sustain no injury. But thou dost revive, and bringest to light again all that the General Council of Constance hath condemned, which was assembled of all the Nation of Germany, and now dost require to be convinced with Scriptures; wherein thou errest greatly. For what availeth it to renew disputation of things so long time past condemned by the Church and Councils, unless it should be necessary to give a reason to every Man of every thing that is concluded? Now where it is so, that this should be permitted to every one that gainstendeth the determination of the Church and Councils, and that he may once get this advantage, to be convinced by the Scriptures, we shall have nothing certain and established in Christendom.

And this is the cause wherefore the Emperor's Majesty requeth of thee a simple answer, either negative or affirmative, whether thou mindest to defend all thy Works as Christian, or no?

Then Luther, turning to the Emperor and the Nobles, besought them not to force or compel him to yield against his Conscience, confirmed with the Holy Scriptures, without manifest Arguments alleged to the contrary by his Adversaries.

I have declared and rendered (said he) mine answer simply and directly, neither have I any more to say, unless mine Adversaries, with true and sufficient probations grounded upon the Scripture, can reduce and resolve my mind, and reveal mine errors which they lay to my charge. I am tied (as I said) by the Scriptures; neither may I, or can with a safe Conscience assent unto them. For as touching General Councils, with whose authority only they press me, I am able to prove, that they have both erred, and have desired many things contrary to themselves; and therefore the authority of them, he said, not to be sufficient, for the which he should call back those things, the verity whereof standeth so firm and manifest in the Holy Scripture, that neither of him it ought to be required, neither could he so do without impiety.

Whereunto the Official again answered, denying that any Man could prove the Councils to have erred. But Luther alleged that he could, and promised to prove it; and now night approaching, the Lords rose and departed. And after Luther had taken his leave of the Emperor, divers Spaniards comed and scoffed the good Man in the way going toward his lodging, hollowing and whooping after him a long while.

Upon the Friday following, when the Princes Electors, Dukes, and other Estates were assembled, the Emperor sent to the whole Body of the Council a certain Letter, containing in effect as followeth.

The Emperor's Letter.

Our Predecessors, who truly were Christian Princes, were obedient to the Romish Church, which Martin Luther presently impugneth. And therefore in as much as he is not determined to call back his Errors in any one Point, we cannot, without great infamy and stain of honour, degenerate from the example of our Elders, but will maintain the ancient Faith, and give aid to the See of Rome. And further, we be resolved to pursue Martin Luther and his Adherents, by Excommunication, and by other means that may be devised, to extinguish his Doctrines. Nevertheless we will not violate our Faith, which we have promised him, but mean to give order for his safe return to the place whence he came.

The Princes Electors, Dukes, and other Estates of the Empire, sat and consulted about this sentence, on Friday all the afternoon, and Saturday the whole day, so that Luther had yet no answer of the Emperor.

During this time, divers Princes, Earls, Barons, Knights of the Order, Gentlemen, Priests, Monks, with other the Laity and common sort visited him. All these were present at all hours in the Emperor's Court, and could not be satisfied with the sight of him. Also there were Bills set up, some against Luther, and some, as it seemed, with him. Notwithstanding many supposed, and especially such as well conceived the matter, that this was subtilly done by his Enemies, that thereby occasion might be offered to infiging the safe conduct given him. The which the Roman Embassadors with all diligence endeavoured to bring to pass.

The Monday following, before supper, the Archbishop of Triers advertised Luther, that on Wednesday next he should appear before him, at nine of the clock before dinner, and assigned him the place. On St. George's day, a certain Chaplain of the Archbishop of Triers, about supper-time, came to Luther, by the commandment of the Bishop, signifying, that at that hour and place prescribed, he must the morrow after have access to his Master.

The morrow after St. George's day, Luther obeying the Archbishop's Commandment, entred his Palace, being accompanied thither with his said Chaplain, and one of the Emperor's Heralds, and such as came in his company out of Saxony to Worms, with other his chief Friends: whereas Dr. Veus, the Marquis of Bader Chaplain, began to declare and protest in the presence of the Archbishop of Triers, Joschin Marquis of Brandenburg, George Duke of Saxony, the Bishops of Auburg and Brandenburg, the Earl George, John Bock of Strauburg, Verdehomer and Pentiger, Doctors, that Luther was not called to be conferred with, or to disputation, but only that the Princes had procured licence of the Emperor's Majesty, through Christian charity, to have liberty granted unto them to exhort Luther benignly and brotherly.

He said further, That albeit the Councils had ordained divers things, yet they had not determined contrary matters. And albeit they had greatly erred, yet their Authority was not therefore abated, or at the least not so erred, that it was lawful for every Man to impugn their Opinions: inferring moreover many things of Zachens and the Centurion: Also of the Traditions, and of Constitutions, and of Ceremonies ordained of Men, affirming that all these were established to repress Vices, according to the quality of times; and that the Church could not be destitute of humane Constitutions. It is true (said he) that by the Fruits the Tree may be known; yet of these Laws and Decrees of Men, many good Fruits have proceeded: and St. Martin, St. Nicholas, and many other Saints have been present at the Councils.

Moreover, that Luther's Book would breed great tumult, and incredible troubles; and that he abused the common sort with his Book of Christian liberty, encouraging them to shake off their Yoke, and to confirm in them a disobedience; and that the World now was at another stay, than when the Believers were all of one Heart and Soul, and therefore it was requisite and behoveful to have Laws. It was to be considered, (said he) albeit he had written many good things, and (no doubt) of a good mind, as de triplice Justitia, and other matters, yet how the Devil now by crafty means goeth about to bring to pass, that all his Works for ever should be condemned. For by these Books which he wrote last, Men (said he) would judge and esteem him, as the Tree is known, not by the Blossom, but by the Fruit.

Here he added something of the noon Devil, and of the Spirit coming in the dark, and of the flying Arrow. All his Oration was exhortatory, full of rhetorical places of honesty, of utility of Laws, of the dangers of Conscience, and of the common and particular wealth; repeating oft this sentence in the Proem, Middle, and Epilogue of his Oration: that this admonition was given him of a singular good will, and great clemency. In the shutting up of his Oration he added menaces, saying, That if he would abide in his purposed intent, the Emperor would proceed further, and banish him from the Empire; perswading him deliberately to ponder, and to advise these and other things.

Martin Luther answered: Most noble Princes, and my most gracious Lords, I render most humble thanks for your benignities and singular good Wills, whence proceeded this admonition: For I know my self to be safe, as by no means I can deserve to be admonished of so mighty Estates.

Then he frankly pronounced, that he had not reproved all Councils, but only the Council of Constance; and for this principal cause, for that the same had condemned the Word of God, which appeared in the condemnation of this Article proposed by John Hus: The Church of Christ is the communion of the Predestinate. It is evident (said he) that the Council of Constance abolished this Article, and consequently the Article of our Faith; I believe the Holy Church Universal: and said, that he was ready to spend Life and Blood, so he were not compelled to revoke the manifest Word of God; for in defence thereof we ought rather to obey God than Men: And that in this he could not avoid the scandal or offence of Faith; for there be two manner of Offences, to wit, of Charity, and of Faith. The slander of Charity consisteth in manners and in life: the offences of Faith

K. Hen. 8. and Doctrine consist in the Word of God; and as touching this last, he could escape it no manner of ways; for it lay not in his power to make Christ not to be a stone of offence. If Christ's Sheep were fed with pure Pasture of the Gospel; if the Faith of Christ were sincerely preached, and if there were good Ecclesiastical Magistrates who duly would execute their office; we should not need (saith he) to charge the Church with Mens traditions. Further, he knew well we ought to obey the Magistrates and higher Powers, how unjustly and perversely soever they lived: We ought also to be obedient to their Laws and Judgment: all which he had taught (saith he) in all his Works: adding further, that he was ready to obey them in all Points, so that they enforced him not to deny the Word of God.

These words finished, Luther was bid stand aside, and the Princes consulted what answer they might give him. This done, they called him into a Parlour, whereas the fore-said Doctor Pane repeated his former matters, admonishing Luther to submit his Writings to the Emperor, and to the Princes Judgment.

Luther answered humbly and modestly, that he could not, neither should permit that Men should say he would stand to their trial, that he was contented to suffer his Writings to be discussed, considered, and judged of the simplest, so that it were done with the authority of the Word of God, and the holy Scripture: and that the Word of God made so much for him, and was so manifest unto him, that he could not give place, unless they could confound his Doctrine by the Word of God. This lesson (saith he) he learned of S. Augustine, who writeth, That he gave this honour only to those Books which are called Canonical, that he believed the same only to be true. As touching other Doctors, albeit in holiness and excellency of Learning they passed, yet he would not credit them further than they agreed with the Touchstone of God's Word. Further (saith he) S. Paul giveth us a lesson, writing to the Thessalonians, Prove all things, follow that is good. And to the Galathians, Thou an Angel should descend from Heaven, if he preach any other Doctrine, let him be accursed, and therefore not to be believed.

Finally, he meekly besought them not to urge his Conscience, captivated in the bands of the Word of God and holy Scripture, to deny the fame excellent Word. And thus he commended his cause and himself to them, and specially to the Emperor's Majesty, requiring their favour, that he might not be compelled to do any thing, in this matter, against his Conscience: in all other causes he would submit himself with all kind of obedience and due subjection.

As Luther had thus ended his talk, Joschimus Elector, Marquis of Brandenburg, demanded if his meaning was thus, that he would not yield, unless he were convinced by the Scripture? Yea truly, right noble Lord (quoth Luther) or else by ancient and evident reasons. And so the Assembly brake, and the Princes repaired to the Emperor's Court.

After their departure the Archbishop of Triers, accompanied with a few of his Familiars, namely John Eckius his Official, and Cochlem, commanded Luther to repair into his Parlour. With Luther was Hieronymus Scarffius, and Nicholas Ambrosius, for his assistants. Then the Official began to frame an Argument, like a Sophist and Canonist, defending the Pope's cause: that for the most part at all times Holy Scriptures have engendred Errors, as the Error of Helvidius the Heretic, out of that place in the Gospel, where it is expressed; Joseph knew not his Wife till she was delivered of her first Child. Further, he went about to overthrow this Proposition, that the Catholick Church is the Communion of Saints.

Martin Luther and Hierom Scarffius, reproved (but modestly) these Follies, and other vain and ridiculous matters, which Eckius brought forth as things not serving to the purpose. Sometime Cochlem would come in with his five Eggs, and laboured to persuade Luther to desist from his purpose, and utterly to refrain thenceforth to write or teach, and so they departed.

About evening the Archbishop of Triers advertised Luther by Ambrosius, that the Emperor's Promise made unto him was prolonged two days, and in the mean season he would confer with him the next day, and for that cause he would send Pentinger, and the Doctor of Bade, which was Vane, the morrow after to him, and he himself would also talk with him.

The Friday after, which was St. Mark's day, Pentinger, and the Doctor of Bade, travelled in the forenoon to persuade Luther, simply and absolutely to submit the judgment of his Writings to the Emperor and Empire. He answered, he would do it, and submit any thing they would have him, so they grounded upon authority of holy Scripture; otherwise he would not consent to do any thing; for God said by his Prophet, (saith he) Trust ye not in Princes, nor in the Children of Men, in whom there is no health. Alas, Cursed be he that trusteth in Man. And seeing that they did urge him more vehemently, he answered; We ought to yield no more to the judgment of Men, than the Word of God doth suffer. So they departed, and prayed him to advise for better answer; and said, they would return after dinner.

And after dinner they returned, exhorting him as before, but in vain. They prayed him, that at the least he would submit his writing to the judgment of the next General Council. Luther agreed thereto, but with this condition, that they themselves should present the Articles collected out of his Books to be submitted to the Council in such sort as notwithstanding the sentence awarded by the Council, should be authorized by the Scripture, and confirmed with the testimonies of the same.

They then leaving Luther, departed, and reported to the Archbishop of Triers, that he had promised to submit his Writings in certain Articles to the next Council, and in the mean space he would keep silence; which Luther never thought: who neither with admonitions, nor yet menaces, could be induced to deny or submit his Books to the judgments of Men (he had so fortified his cause with clear and manifest authorities of the Scripture) unless they could prove by sacred Scripture, and apparent reasons to the contrary.

It chanced then by the special Grace of God, that the Archbishop of Triers sent for Luther, thinking presently to hear him. And when he perceived otherwise then Pentinger, and the Doctor of Bade had told him, he said that he would for no good, but that he had heard himself speak: for else he was even now going to the Emperor, to declare what the Doctors had reported.

Then the Archbishop entreated Luther, and conferred with him very gently, first removing such as were present, as well of the one side as of the other. In this Conference Luther concealed nothing from the Archbishop; affirming, that it was dangerous to submit a matter of so great importance to them, who, after they had called him under safe conduct, attempting him with new Commandments, had condemned his Opinion, and approved the Pope's Bull.

Moreover the Archbishop, bidding a Friend of his draw nigh, required Luther to declare what Remedy might be ministered to help this. Luther answered; That there was no better Remedy than such as Garnaliet alledged in the fifth Chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, as witnesseth St. Luke, saying; If this counsel, or this work, proceed of Men, it shall come to nought: but if it be of God, ye cannot destroy it. And so he desired that the Emperor might be advertised to write the same to the Pope, that he knew certainly if this his enterprise proceeded not of God, it would be abolished within three, yea within two years.

The Archbishop enquired of him what he would do, if certain Articles were taken out of his Books, to be submitted to the General Council. Luther answered, so that they be not those which the Council of Constance condemned. The Archbishop said, I fear they will be the very same: but what then? Luther replied, I will not, nor I cannot hold my peace of such, for I am sure by their Decrees the Word of God was condemned: therefore I will rather lose head and life, than abandon the manifest Word of my Lord God.

Then the Archbishop, seeing Luther would in no wise give over the Word of God to the judgment of Men, gently bad Luther farewell; who at that instant prayed the Archbishop to intreat the Emperor's Majesty to grant him gracious leave to depart. He answered he would take order for him, and speedily advertise him of the Emperor's pleasure.

Within a small while after, John Eckius the Archbishops Official, in the presence of the Emperor's Secretary, who had been Maximilian's Chancellor, said unto Luther in his lodging, by the commandment of the Emperor: that since he had been admonished diversely of the Imperial Majesty, the Electors, Princes, and Estates of the Empire, and that notwithstanding he would not return to unity and concord, concord, it remained that the Emperor, as Advocate of the Catholick Faith, should proceed further: and it was the Emperor's Ordinance, that he should within 21 days return boldly under safe conduct, and be safely guarded to the place whence he came; so that in the mean while he stirred no Commotion among the people in his journey, either in conference, or by preaching.

Luther hearing this, answered very modestly, and christi- anly; Even as it hath pleased God, so is it come to pass, the name of the Lord be blessed. He said further, he thanked most humbly the Emperor's Majesty, and all the Princes and Estates of the Empire, that they had given to him benign and gracious audience, and granted him safe conduct to come and return. Finally he said, he desired none other of them, than a reformation according to the sacred Word of God, and confonancy of holy Scriptures, which effectually in his heart he desired: otherwise he was wretched to suffer all chances for the Imperial Majesty, as life, and death, goods, fame, and reproach; referring nothing to himself, but the only Word of God, which he would constantly confess to the latter end: humbly recommending him to the Emperor's Majesty, and to all the Princes and other Estates of the sacred Empire.

The morrow after, which was April 26, after he had taken his leave of such as supported him, and other his bene- volent Friends that oftentimes visited him, and had broken his fast, at ten of the clock he departed from Worms, accompanied with such as repaired thither with him; ha- ving space of time limited unto him (as is said) for 21 days and no more. Martin Luther thus being dismissed of the Emperor, according to the promise of his safe conduct made (as you have heard) departed from Worms towards his Country, April 26, accompanied with the Emperor's Herald, and the rest of his company, having only one and twenty days to him granted for his return, and no more. In the which mean space of his return he writeth to the Emperor, and to other Nobles of the Empire, re- peating briefly to them the whole action and order of things there done, desiring of them their lawful good will and favour, which as he hath always stood in need of, so now he most earnestly craveth, especially in this, that his cause, which is not his, but the cause of the whole Church Universal, may be heard with indifference and equity, and may be decided by the rule and authority of holy Scrip- ture: signifying moreover, that whensoever they shall please to lend for him, he shall be ready at their command- ment, at any time or place, upon their promise of safety, to appear, &c.

During the time of these doings, the Doctors and School- men of Paris were not behind with their parts, but to shew their cunning, condemned the Books of Luther, extract- ing out of the same, especially out of his Book De Capti- vitate Babylonica, certain Articles as touching the Sacra- ments, Laws, and Decrees of the Church, equality of Works, Vows, Contrition, Absolution, Satisfaction, Purgato- ry, Free-will, Privileges of the Holy Church, Councils, Pun- ishment of Hereticks, Philosophy, School-divinity, and other more. It was not long after this but Charles the new Emperor, to purchase favour with the Pope (because he was not yet confirmed in his Empire) provideth and directeth out a so- lemn Writ of Outlawry against Luther, and all them that take his part; commanding the said Luther, wheresoever he might be gotten, to be apprehended, and his Books burn- ed. By which Decree, proclaimed against Luther, the Em- peror procured no small thanks with the Pope: inasmuch that the Pope, ceasing to take part with the French Kings, joined himself wholly to the Emperor. In the mean time Duke Frederick, to give some place for the time to the Emperor's Proclamation, conveyed Luther a little out of sight secretly, by the help of certain Noblemen who he well knew to be faithful and trusty unto him at that oc- casion. There Luther being close and out of company, wrote divers Epistles, and certain Books also unto his Friends; among which he dedicated one to his company of Augustine Friars, entitled, De abroganda Missa: Which Friars the same time being encouraged by him, began to lay down their private Masses. Duke Frederick fearing lest that would breed some great stir or tumult, caused the censure and judgment of the whole University of Wittenberg to be asked in the matter; committing the doing thereof to four; Justus Jonas, Philip Melanctib. Nic. Ambsdorffius, Job. Dulsius.

The minds of the whole University being searched, it was shewed to the Duke, that he should do well and easily, by the whole advice of the Learned there, to command the use of the Mass to be abrogate, though his Dominion: and though it could not be done without tumult, yet that was no let why the course of true Doctrine should be stayed for the multitude, which commonly overcometh the bet- ter part. Neither ought such disturbance to be imputed to the Doctrine taught, but to the Adversaries, which wil- lingly and wickedly kick against the Truth, whereof Christ also giveth us forewarning before. For fear of such tumults, therefore, we ought not to succumb from that which we know is to be done, but constantly meet the Word of God in defence of God's Truth, howsoever the Word of God esteem us, or rage against it. Thus shewed they their Judgment to Duke Frederick.

1. He reproveh Luther's Opinion about the Pope's Pardons.

And yet like a right Pope, nothing degenerating from his See, he was a mortal enemy against Martin Luther, and his Par- takers. 1 Cor. II.

Right honourable Brethren, and dear Children, greeting and Apollitical benediction. After that we were first promoted (through God's Divine Providence) to the Office of the Sea Apollitick, he which hath so advanced us is our Witness, how we, both day and night revolving in our minds, did cogitate nothing more than how to satisfy the parts of a good Pastor, in attending the health and cure of the Flock, both universally and singularly committed unto us: so that there is no one particular Sheep through the whole universal Flock, so infected, so sick, or so far gone astray, whom our desire is not to recover, to seek out, and to reduce into the Lord's Fold again. And chiefly, from the first beginning of our pastoral function, our care hath always been, as well by our Messengers, as by our daily Letters, how to reclaim the minds of Christian Princes from these intestine Wars and Dissensions among themselves to Peace and Concord; or at least, if they would needs fight, that they would convert their Strength and Armor against the common Enemies of our Faith. And to declare this not only in word, but rather in deed, God doth know with what charges and expences we have burdened our selves, to extend our subsidy and relief to the Soldiers of Rhodes for defence of themselves, and of the Christian Faith, against the Turkish Tyranny, by whom they were besieged.

And now to bend our care from these foreign matters, and to consider our inward troubles at home, we bear, to the great grief of our heart, that Martin Luther, a new railer up of old and damnable Heresies, first after the fatherly Advertisements of the Sea Apollitick, a new railer up of old and damnable Heresies, first after the fatherly Advertisements of the Sea Apollitick, then after the Sentence also of Condemnation awarded against him, and that by the assent and consent of the best Learned, and of sundry Universities also, and lastly, after the Imperial Decree of our well-beloved Son Charles, Elect Emperor of the Romans, and Catholic King of Spain, being denounced through the whole Nation of Germany, yet hath neither been by Order restrained, nor of himself hath refrained from his maddest begun, but daily more and more, forgetting and condemning all Christian Charity and Godliness, ceaseth not to disturb and replenish the World with new Books, fraught full of Errors, Heresies, Contumelies and Sedition, (whether upon his own head, or by the help of other) and to infect the Country of Germany, and other Regions about, with this Pestilence, and endeavours still to corrupt simple Souls and manners of Men, with the Poison of his pestiferous Tongue. And (which is worst of all) hath for his Fanciers and Supporters, not of the Vulgar sort only, but also divers Personages of the Nobility; inasmuch that they have begun also to invade the Goods of Priests, (which perhaps is the chief ground of this Star begun) contrary to their Obedience which they owe to Ecclesiastical and Temporal Persons, and now also at last have grown unto Civil War and Dissension among themselves. Which thing how unfortunately it falleth out now, at this present season, especially amongst us Christians, you may soon perceive with your selves, and consider. For altho the Apostle hath told us before, That Heresies must needs be, that they which be tried may be made manifest, &c. yet was there never time so inconvenient to raise up Heresies, or so necessary for the repressing thereof when any such are raised, as now: For whereas the Devil, the perpetual Enemy of Mankind, roaring in the shape of a Lion, by the power of the Turks doth continually invade the Flock of Christ; how can we then resist the violent Invasions of him oppressing us without, so long as we nourish at home the same Devil, under the colour of a wily Dragon, sowing such Heresies, Discords, and Seditions among our selves? And albeit it were in our power easily to vanquish these foreign Adversaries, yet were that but labour lost, serving to no profit, to subdue our Enemies without, and at home with Heresies and Schisms to be divided.

We remember, before the time of our Papacy, when we were in Spain, many things we heard then of Luther, and of his perverse Doctrine. Which Rumors and Tidings, altho of themselves they were grievous to be heard, yet more grievous they were for this, because they proceeded out of that Country, where we our self, after the Flesh, took our first beginning: But yet this comfort we had, supposing that either for the iniquity, or else for the foolishness thereof being so manifest, this Doctrine would not long hold; replying thus with our self, that such pestiferous (a) Plants, translated from other Countries to Germany, would never grow up to any proof in that ground, which was wont to be a weeder out of all Heresies and Infidelity. But now since this evil Tree (whether by God's judgment correcting the Sins of the People, or by the negligence of such as first should have resisted such beginnings) hath so enlarged and spread his branches so far; you therefore, both Princes and People of Germany, must this consider and provide, lest you, which at the first springing up of this Evil might peradventure be excused, as no doers thereof, now, through this your overmuch sufferance, might be found inexcusable, and seem to consent to that which you do not resist.

Here we omit and pass over, what Enormity, and more than Enormity that is, that such a great and so devout a Nation should by one Friar, (who railing against the Catholic Faith and Christian Religion, which he before professed, playeth the Apostata, and hath lied to God) be now seduced from that way, which first (b) Christ our Redeemer and his blessed Apostles have opened unto us; which so many Martyrs, so many holy Fathers, so many great Learned Men, and also your own Fore-fathers, and old Ancestors have always hitherto walked in; as the only Luther had all wit and cunning; as he the only now first hath received the Holy-Ghost, (as the Hereick Montanus used to boast of himself) or as the Church (from which Christ our Saviour promised himself never to depart) hath erred hitherto, always in dark shadows of Ignorance and Perdition, till now it should be illuminate with new resplendent beams of Luther. All which things there is no doubt, but to such as have judgment will seem ridiculous, but yet may be pernicious to simple and ignorant minds; and to other, which being weary of all good Order, do gaze fill for new Changes, may breed matter and occasion of such Mischief, as partly your selves have experienced already. And therefore do you not consider (O Princes and People of Germany) that these be but Prefaces and Prelambles to these Evils and Mischief which Luther, with the Self of his Lutherans, do intend and purpose hereafter? (c) Do you not see plainly, and perceive with your eyes, that this defending of the verity of the Gospel, first begun by the Lutherans to be pretended, is now manifest to be but an Invention to spoil your Goods, which they have long intended? Or do you think that these Sons of Iniquity do tend to any other thing, than under the name of Liberty to supplant Obedience, and so to open a general (d) License to every Man to do what him listeth? And suppose you that they will any thing regard your Commandments, or esteem (e) your Laws, which that they never had any Advocates and Mediators but Christ alone, and that they never sold the merits of Christ's passion for money: In the same way doth Luther now walk, whereas the Pope now hath devised a new way to walk in for Money, with an hundred other new Devices, new Sects, and new Ordinances, which the old Fathers never knew.

(f) The Doctrine of Luther hath been preached in Germany above these forty years, and yet is there never a Prince, nor Magistrate, nor Citizen in Germany, God be praised, which by the Doctrine of Luther it work by one half-penny; whereas by the Pope, good reckoning hath been made, that Germany hath been won by three millions of Florins by the year. Out of the Territory of the Bishop of Mentz, amounteth to the Pope, for the Archbishop's pale, twenty six thousand Florins. In the Council of Basil it was openly declared, that nine millions of Gold were gathered in the time of Pope Martin, and translated to Rome. Now let the Princes of Germany consider this.

(g) The preaching of Christian liberty of the Soul breaketh no Civil Order touching the outward obedience of the Body. But the Pope would have the Souls of Men in his bondage, and therefore he cannot abide this inward liberty of the Spirit to be touched, for that were against the Pope's Power and Profit, which were in himself intolerable. (h) This is no good consequence; Luther burned the Pope's thinking Decretals, ergo he will not stick also to burn the Books of the Civil Law.

Who soweth evil heresies, but he which will not let the Scripture take place

(a) He meaneth the Doctrine of John Hus translated into Germany.

(b) Christ and his Apostles taught us, that we are saved by faith only in the Son of God; is the same doth Luther preach, and the Pope denieth. Holy Martyrs and Fathers in the old time ministered the communion in both kinds to the people, and taught that Faith was necessary in receiving the Sacrament; is the same doth Luther affirm, and the Pope denieth. The old Princes and Fathers was this, so contemptuously vilipend the holy Canons and Decrees of the Fathers, yea, and the most holy Councils also, (to whose Authority the Emperor's Legats have always given room and place) and not only vilipend them, but also with a diabolical audacity have not feared to rend them in pieces, and set them on a light fire? They which refuse to render due obedience to Priests, to Bishops, yea, to the high Bishop of all, and which daily before your own faces make their Boastings of Church-Goods, and of things consecrated to God; think ye that they will refrain their sacrilegious hands from the spoil of Lay-men's Goods? yea, that they will not pluck from you whatsoever they can rap or reave? Finally, to conclude, (f) how can you hope that they will more spare you, or hold their murdering hands from your Throats, which have been so bold to vex, to kill, to slay the Lord's Anointed, which are not to be touched? Nay, think you not contrary, but this miserable Calamity will as length redound upon your Goods, your Houses, Wives, Children, Dominions, Possessions, and these your Temples which you hallow and reverence, except you provide some speedy Remedy as the Church, ^g gaining the same.

phenomies of Thistis Supper, and of the Incest of Oedipus, the worshipping of an Affes Head. In much like sort doth the Pope here lay unto Luther Riots, Rebellions, and all Mischief he can devise, not because they are true; but because he would have the World so to believe.

Wherefore we exhort your Fraternities, Nobilities, and Devotions of all and singular in the Lord, and beseech you for Christian Charity and Religion, (for which Religion your Fore-fathers oft-times have given their blood to uphold and encrease the same) and notwithstanding require you also, in virtue of that obedience (g) which all Christians owe to God, and blessed St. Peter, and to his Vicar here on Earth, that setting aside all other quarrels and dissensions among your selves, you confer your helping hands every Man to quench this publick Fire, and endeavour and study, the best way ye can, how to reduce the said Martin Luther, and all other Fanciers of these Tumults and Errors, to better conformity and trade both of Life and Faith.

(g) Obedience to God, and to St. Peter, and to his Vicar, do not well match together by the Scripture; for the obedience to the Creator is one, and the obedience to the Creature is another.

And if they who be infected, shall refuse to hear your Admonitions; yet provide that the other part, which yet remaineth sound, by the same contagion be not corrupted. He to whom all secrets of Men are open, doth know how we both for our Nature, and also for our pastoral Office, whereto we are called, are much more prone to remit than to revenge. But when this pestiferous Cancer cannot with simple and gentle Medicines be cured, more sharp Salves must be proved, and fiery Scarrings. The purrified Members must be cut off from the Body, lest the sound parts also be infected. So God did cast down into Hell the Schismatical Brethren. (h) Dathan and Abiram. And him that would not obey the Authority of the Priest, God commanded to be punished with death. So Peter, Prince of the Apostles, denounced sudden death to Ananias and Saphira, which lied unto God. So the old and godly Emperors commanded (i) Jovinianus and Priscilianus, as Hereticks, to be beheaded. So St. Hierom writeth Vigilantius, as an Heretic, to be given to the destruction of the flesh, that the Spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord. So also did our Predecessors in the Council of (k) Constance condemn to death John Hus and his Fellow Hierom, which now appeareth to revive again in Luther. The worthy (l) acts and examples of which Forefathers, if you in these doings were, (seeing otherwise ye cannot) shall imitate, we do not doubt but God's merciful Clemency shall effsoon relieve his Church; which, being now sore vexed of Infidels, hath her eyes chiefly and principally directed upon you, as being the most pious and most populous Nation that we have in Christendom.

(h) Lethe Pope follow the Word of God, as Meier did, be feat of God exactly as Meier was; and then let Luther be punished as Da. condemn to death John Hus and his Fellow Hierom, which now appeareth to revive again in Luther. The worthy (l) acts and examples of which Forefathers, if you in these doings were, (seeing otherwise ye cannot) shall imitate, we do not doubt but God's merciful Clemency shall effsoon relieve his Church; which, being now sore vexed of Infidels, hath her eyes chiefly and principally directed upon you, as being the most pious and most populous Nation that we have in Christendom.

upon Luther his great Enemy, as Peter did upon Ananias and Saphira?

(i) If Jovinianus, Priscilianus, and Vigilantius were proved Hereticks; so was Luther never.

(k) Your Fathers in the Council of Constance did kill the Prophets of God, and you make up their Graves. But thanks be unto God, which hath given such light unto the World, to understand your cruel Impety in killing John Hus, which you thought should never be expied.

(l) You have well imitated your Forefathers already, in burning so many Lutherans; and yet how have you prospered against the Turkish Infidels the space of these forty years?

Wherfore upon the blessing of Almighty God, and of blessed Saint Peter, which here we send unto you, take courage unto you, as well against the false Dragon, as the strong Lion, that both these, that is, as well the inward Heretics, as the foreign Enemies, by you being overcome, you may purchase to your Honours an immortal Victory, both here and in the World to come. This we give you to understand, that whatsoever the Lord hath given us to aid you withal, either in Money or Authority, we will not fail to support you therewith, yea, and to bestow our Life also in this holy quarrel, and for the health of our Sheep to us committed. Other things as touching the matter of Luther, we have directed purposely for the same unto your Assembly, whom we wish you to credit, as being our truly Legat.

The false Dragon represents the Pope and the strong Lion the Turks.

The false Dragon here teacheth that it is time to begin this.

Datum Rom. apud S. Petrum, sub annulo Picatoris, die 25. Novemb. Anno 1522; Pontificatus nostri anno primo.

By this Letter above prefixed, thou hast, gentle Reader, to note and understand, what either wily persuasions, or strength of authority could devise against Luther, here not to have lacked. If plausible terms, or glossing sentences, or outward facing and bracing could have served, where no ground of Scripture is brought, this might seem apparently a pithy Epistle. But if a Man should require the particulars or the specialities of this Doctrine which he here reprehendeth, to be examined and tried by God's Word, there is no substance in it, but only words of office, which may seem well to serve for waste Paper. And yet I thought to exhibit the said Letter unto thee, to the intent that the more thou seest Man's strength with all his policy bent against Luther, the more mayest thou consider the Almighty Power of God; in defending the cause of this poor Man against so mighty Enemies.

Now hear further what Instructions the said Pope Adrian sent to his Legat Cheregatus, how and by what reasons to move and inflame the Princes of Germany to the destruction of Luther and his Cause, and yet was not able to bring it to pass.

Instructions given by Pope Adrian to Cheregatus his Legat, touching his proceedings in the Diet of Norimberg, how and by what persuasions to incense the Princes against Luther:

I N prima, you shall declare to them the great grief of our Heart for the prosperity of Luther's Sect, to see the innumerable Souls, redeemed with Christ's Blood, and committed to our pastoral Government, to be turned away from the true Faith and Religion into perdition by this occasion; and that especially in the Nation of Germany, being our native Country, which hath ever been heretofore, all these few years past, most faithful and devout in Religion; and therefore our desire to be the greater that this Perilence should be stopped betime, lest the same happen to that Country of Germany, which happened of late to Bohemia. And us for our part, there shall be no lack to help forward what we may. As likewise we desire them to endeavour themselves to the uttermost of their power, whom these causes ought to move, which here we direct unto you to be declared to them.

First, the (c) honour of God, which before all other things, ought to be preferred, whose honour by these Heresies is greatly defaced, and his Worship not only diminished, but rather wholly corrupted. Also the Charity toward (e) the our Neighbour, by which Charity every Man is bound to reduce his Neighbour out of error; otherwise God will surely require at their hands all such as by their negligence do perill.

The first cause to stir Men against Luther.

The second cause to stir Men against Luther.

the Son of God, whom the Father hath sent. Now examine (good Reader) whether more extollet the honour of Christ, the Doctrine of Luther, or the Doctrine of the Pope. Luther lendeth us only to Christ; the Pope lendeth us to other Patrons and Helpers. Luther's Doctrine tendeth wholly to the glory of Christ; The Pope's Doctrine, if it be well weighed, tendeth to the glory of Man. Luther cleaveth only to the Scriptures; the Pope leaneeth to the Canons and Councils of Men.

The

Pope Adrian's railing Letter to the Princes of Germany concerning Luther.

The second cause, to move them against Luther, is the Infamy of their Nation; which being counted before time always most Christian, now by the Sectaries of Luther is evil spoken of in all other Quarters.

The third cause is the respect of their own Honour, which notoriously will be disfrained, if they, which most excel in Nobility and Authority among the Germans, shall not bend all their power to expel these Heretics; First, for that they shall appear to be degenerate from their Progenitors, who, being present at the Condemnation of John Hus and other Heretics, are said some of them with their own hands to have led John Hus to the Fire. Secondly, for that they, or the greater part of them, approved with their Authority the Imperial Edict set forth of late in condemnation of Martin Luther. (a) Now except they shall follow the execution of the same, they shall be noted inconstant, or may be thought to favour the same, seeing it is manifest, that they may easily exterminate him if they were disposed.

(a) This Edict of the Emperor above touch'd, was devis'd and set out, not knowing to divers of the Princes there, and seemeth chiefly to be brought about by the Pope and his Flatterers about him. Look more hereof in the Story of Sileidan. lib. 3.

The fourth Cause. The fourth Cause is the Injury wrought by Luther to them, their Parents, and Progenitors, forasmuch as their Fathers, Progenitors, and themselves also have always holden the same Faith which the Catholick Church of Rome hath appointed: contrary to the which Faith Luther with his Sectaries now doth hold, saying, that many things are not to be believed which their forefaid Ancestors have holden to be of Faith. It is manifest therefore, that they be condemned of Luther for Infidels and Heretics, and so consequently, by Luther's Doctrine, all their Fore-elders and Progenitors which have deceased in this our Faith, be in Hell; for Error in Faith importeth Damnation.

The fifth Cause. The fifth Cause to remove them, is, that they should well advise and consider the end wherunto all these Lutherians do tend: which (b) is, that under the shadow of Evangelical Liberty, they may abolish all Superiority and Power. For altho at the first beginning they pretended only to ad-mul and repress our Power Ecclesiastical, as being falsely and tyrannously usurped against the Gospel: yet forasmuch as liberty is their only Foundation and Pretence; by the which Liberty the Secular Power and Magistrates cannot bind men by any Commandments, be they never so just or so reasonable, (c) to obey them under pain of mortal Sin: it is manifest that their Scope is to infeeble and infringe, as much or more, the Secular State also, altho covertly they pretend to save it: to the end, that when the Secular Princes shall believe this their working not to be directed against them, but only against the usurped Domination of the Church and Church-men; then the Laity (which commonly hath been always against men of the Church) holding with them, shall suffer the Churchmen to be devoured. Which done, no doubt but (d) they will afterward practise the like upon the Secular Princes and Potestates, which now they attempt against our Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction.

them, resisteth God. So is not the usurped power of the Pope. (e) If the Pope doth say, that no precepts of Magistrates do oblige under pain of mortal sin, he saith not true; if he say Luther so teacheth, he believeth Luther; who teacheth all men to be subject unto Magistrates, no man more. (f) Who so considereth the Doctrine of Luther, De libertate Christiana, shall find this to be a false slander. For how is it like that he meaneth any Rebellion, who, describing a Christian, calleth him a Servant and an Underling to all men.

The sixth Cause. The sixth cause to move and perfwade them against Luther, is this, for them to consider the Fruits which follow that Sect: as Slanders, Offences, Disturbance, Robberies, Murders, (e) Seditions, Diffentions, which this Sect hath, and daily doth fit up through whole Germany: Also Blasphemies, slanderous Words, Scoffings, (f) Jests and bitter Taunts, which are ever in their Mouths; against which, unless that they shall find a present Remedy, it is to be feared lest the Defolation of God's Wrath will fall upon Germany, being so divided; or rather upon the Princes of Germany, who, having the Sword given of God into their own Hands, Seckis a valiant man, and a great favourer of Luther, did war against the Archbishop of Triers, for withholding two certain persons from judgment, which should have appeared, and by his means did not. (g) As for slanderous words and bitter taunts, with what face can the Pope charge Luther, being himself so impudent and bitter, as in this his present Letter is manifest to be seen? wherein he saith himself in his own colours what he is.

Hands for the suppression of Malefactors, suffer such Enormities among their Subjects. Curst is he (saith the Prophet) which doth the work of the Lord negligently, and holdeth back his Sword from the Blood of evil doers. Jeremiah 28.

The seventh reason is, that the Princes should consider how Luther useth the same way of seducing the People of Christ, as hath the venomous Viper Mahumet practised in deceiving so many thousands of Souls, in permitting to them the liberty of those things which Fleish desireth, and afterward in exempting them from such things as be more sharp in the Law; but that Luther a little more temperately handleth the matter, whereby he may deceive more effectually: For (g) Mahumet giveth License to have many Wives, and to divorce and marry other at their pleasure. This Luther, to draw unto him the favour of Nuns, Monks, and Priests, such as be lascivious in fids, preacheth that Vows of perpetual Continency be unlawful, and much less to be obligatory: and therefore permitteth unto them that they may marry; forgetting by the way what the Apostle writeth of young Widows, saying; That when they wax wanton against Christ, then will they marry, having condemnation, because they have made void their first Faith, 1 Tim. 5.

decline from the Word of God, and stretch up another Law, to doth the Pope. He killeth and flayeth the contrary part, to doth the Pope. He holdeth Salvation by Works of the Law, so doth the Pope; and if Mahumet give liberty of fids, so doth not Luther, but the Pope both taketh it, and also dispenseth with the same. Mahumet would not have his Religion reasoned upon; no more will the Pope. Briefly, as the Sect of Mahumet is divided into many sundry sorts of Religion, and of religious men: so hath the Sect of the Pope his Priests, Monks, Nuns, Hermits and other swarms of an infinite variety.

These and other such like Reasons being opened and laid before them, you shall then in our name exhort the fore-said Princes, Prelates and People, to awake and employ their diligence how to gainst: first the injury of these Lutherians toward God, and toward his holy Religion; Secondly, their Villany toward the whole Nation of the Germans, and their Princes, and especially the shameful Contumely towards their Fathers and Elders, whom in effect they condemn to Hell. In consideration whereof you shall call upon them to remember themselves, and to proceed effectually to the execution of the Apostolical Sentence, and of the Emperor's Edict; giving pardon to them that will amend and acknowledge their fault: the other, which obstinately persist in their error, punishing with the Rod of discipline severity, according to the Decrees of the Cautious and Laws of the Church, that by their example such as stand may remain in Faith, and they, which are fallen may be reduced.

And if any shall object again, that Luther was condemned by the Apostolick See before he was heard, and that his Cause ought first to have been heard and adjudged before he was convicted. You shall answer, that those * things which pertain to Faith are to be believed for their own authority, and not to be proved. Take away (saith Ambrose) Arguments where Faith is sought: there the Fishers, not the Philosophers, must be believed. Truth it is, and we grant no less, but that lawful defence and hearing ought not to be denied in such Cases, where question is of the Fact, whether it were done or not, as whether he spake, preached, writ, or not? But where the matter is of God's Law, or in cause of the Sacraments, there must we always stand to the authority of Holy Fathers, and of the Church.

Now all things almost, wherein Luther dissenteth from other, are removed before by divers Councils: neither ought those things to be called into question, which have been defined before by general Councils, and the Universal Church, but ought to be received by Faith. For else he doth injury to the Synod of the Church, who so bringeth again into controversy things once rightly discussed and settled. Otherwise what certainty can there be amongst men, or what end shall there be of contending and disputing, if it shall be lawful for every lewd and presumptuous person to decline from the things which have been received and ratified by the consent, not of one, nor of a few, but of so many Ages, so many wise Heads, and of the Catholick Church, which God never permitteth to err in matters unto Faith appertaining? And how can it otherwise be chosen, but that all must be full of disturbance, offences, and confusion, unless the things which have been once, yea, many

(g) If the Doings and properties of Mahumet be rightly considered, none should be found so apply to resemble him, as the Pope himself. He

Doings and properties of Mahumet be rightly considered, none should be found so apply to resemble him, as the Pope himself. He

* Here the Pope agreeth rightly with Mahumet, for he will not have his Religion reasoned upon, no more will the Pope have his.

Grant this to the Pope, and he may play the Lord of Strife, and do what he listeth.

K. Hen. many times by right Judgment constituted, be observed of all men as inviolable? Wherefore seeing Luther and his fellows do condemn the Councils of holy Fathers, do burn the holy Canons, do confound all things at their pleasure, and do disquiet the whole World, what remaineth, but that they are to be rejected and exploded, as enemies and perturbors of the publick peace?

E. D. 59. Further, this you shall say unto them, that we confesse our selves, and deny not, but that God suffereth this Persecution to be inflicted upon his Church for the sins of men, especially of Priests and Prelates of the Clergy. For certain it is, That the hand of the Lord is not shortened, that he cannot save; but our sins have divided between God and us, and therefore he hideth his face from us that he will not hear us. The Scripture testifieth, That the sins of the People do issue out from the fins of the Priests. And therefore (saith St. Chrysostom) Christ, going about to cure the sick City of Hierusalem, first entred into the Temple, to correct the sins of the Priests like a good Physician, which first beginneth to cure the Disease from the very root. We Know that in this (b) holy See here have been many abominable things of long time wrought and practised: as Abuses in matters spiritual, and also Excesses in life and manners and all things turned cleane contrary. And no marvel if the Sicknes (c) first beginning at the Head, that is, at the high Bishops, have descended afterward to inferior Prelates. All we (that is, Prelates of the Church) have declined every one after his own way; Neither hath there been one

(b) And how then can this be called an holy See, where so many abominable impieties, and manifold Excesses, both in spiritual matters, and also in external Life, are seen and practised? such Ambition in the Prelates; such pride in the Pope, such avarice in the Court; and finally where such corruption is of all things, as you your selves do here confesse, and cannot deny?

Calixtus himself could never prophecie more truly.

(c) Truly it is, that the sicknes hath begun in the head, that is, at the very triple Crown: and therefore the sicknes being great, and having need of a sharp Physician, God hath sent Luther unto the Pope (as Erasmus writeth of him) as a meet Physician to cure his Disease; yet he refuseth to be healed, that hath done good, no not one. Wherefore need it is, that all we give glory to God, and that we humble our Souls to him, considering every one of us from whence he hath fallen; and that every one do judge himself before he be judged of God in the Rod of his Fury. For the redress whereof you shall inmate unto them, and promise in our behalf, that in us shall be lacking no diligence of a better Reformation, first beginning with our Court; that like as the contagion first from thence descended into all like as the contagion first from thence descended into all the inferior parts; so Reformation and Amendment of all that is amiss, from the same place again, shall take his beginning. Whereunto they shall find us so much the more ready, for that we see the whole World so desirous of the same. We our selves (as you know) never fought this Dignity, but rather coveted, if by otherwise might, to lead a private life, and in a quiet State to serve God: And also would utterly have refused the same, had not the fear of God, and the manner of our Election, and misdoubting of some Schism to follow after, urged us to take it. And thus took we the Burthen upon us, not for any Ambition of Dignity, or to enrich our Friends and Kinsfolks, but only to be obedient to the Will of God, and for Reformation of the Catholick Church, and for relief of the Poor, and especially for the Advancement of Learning and learned Men, with such other things moe, as appertaineth to the charge of a good Bishop and lawfull Heir of St. Peter. And tho all Errors, Corruptions, and Abuses be not straightways amended by us, men ought not thereat to marvel. The Sore is great, and far grown, and is not single, but of manifold Maladies together compacted, and therefore to the curing thereof we must proceed by little and little, first beginning to cure the greater and the most dangerous, lest while we intend to amend all, we delivroy all. All sudden mutations in a Common-wealth (saith Aristotle) are Perilous: and he that wringeth too hard, straineth out Blood. Prov. 30.

You proceed slowly by little and little, that nothing still is from. Sudden mutations be not for the Popes purpose: but the Lord promisseth to come suddenly when he is not looked for.

And whereas in your last Letters you write, that the Princes complain, how this See hath been and is prejudicial to their Ordinances and Agreements. Hereunto you shall thus answer: That such Excesses, which have been done before our time, ought not to be imputed to us, who always have nullified these Derogations; and therefore bid them so assure themselves, that though they had required no such matter, we of our own accord would have reformed the same; partly for that it is good, right and reason, that every one have that which is due unto him; and partly also that the said noble Nation of Germany shall have by us no hinderance, but furtherance rather, so much as in us shall lie to do for them.

And as touching the Proceffes which they desired to have removed away a Rota, and to be referred down to the Parties, you shall signifie unto them, that we will gratifie them herein as much as honestly we may. But because our Auditors are now presently absent from the City, by reason of the Plague, we cannot be informed as yet touching the quality of those Proceffes. As soon as they shall return (which we hope will be shortly) we shall do in the Princes favour what reasonably we may.

Rota is some office in the Court or Chancery of Rome.

Further; Whereas we understand, that there be many such flourishing Wits in Germany, and many well learned men, which are not seen unto, but be rejected and unlooked to, while in the mean time, through the Apostolical Provisions, Dignities, and Promotions are bestowed upon Taplers, and Dancers, and unfit persons: we will therefore that you inquire out what those learned men are, and what be their Names, to the intent that when any such Vacation of Benefices in Germany doth fall, we of our own voluntary motion may provide for them accordingly. For why? we consider how much it is against God's Glory, and against the health and edification of Souls, that Benefices and Dignities of the Church have so long time been bestowed upon unworthy and unable persons.

The Pope flattereth his advantage. And why then have you elected the Church so long with these Apostolical Provisions, and yet do not redress the same?

As touching the Subsidy for Hungarian, we send no other Information to you, but that which we gave you at your departure; save only that we will you to extend your diligence therein, as we also will do the like, in soliciting the matter with the Princes and Cities of Italy, that every one may help after his Ability. Ex Orb. Gratian.

These Popish Suggestions and Instructions of the Pope himself against Luther, I thought, Christian Reader, to set before thine Eyes, to the intent thou mayst see here (as in a Pattern, and go no further) all the Crimes, Objections, Exclamations, Sulpicions, Accusations, Slanders, Offentions, Contumelies, Rebukes, Untruths, Cavillations, Railings, whatsoever they have devised, or can devise, invent, articulate, denounce, infer, or surmise against Luther and his teaching. They cry, Heresie, Heresie; but they prove no Heresie. They cry, Councils, Councils; and yet none tangrefireth Councils more than themselves. If Councils go always with Scripture, then Luther goeth with them: If Councils do jarr sometime from the Scripture, what Heresie is in Luther in standing with Scripture against those Councils? And yet neither hath he hitherto spoken against any Councils, save only the Council of Constance. They inflame Kings and Princes against Luther, and yet they have no cause wherefore. They accuse him for teaching Liberty. If they mean the Liberty of the Flesh, they accuse him falsely: If they mean the Liberty of the Spirit, they teach wickedly which teach contrary: And yet when they have all said, none live so licentious as themselves. They pretend the Zeal of the Church, but under that Church lieth their own private Welfare, and Belly-cheer. They charge Luther with Disobedience, and none are so disobedient to Magistrates and Civil Laws, as they. They lay to his Charge Oppression and spoiling of Lay-men's Goods: And who spoileth the Lay-men's Livings so much as the Pope? For Probation whereof, let the Pope's Accounts be cast, what he raketh out of every Christian Realm. Briefly, turn only the Names of the Persons, and instead of Luther's Name, place the Name of the Pope, and the effect of this Letter above prefixed, shall agree upon none more aptly, than upon the Pope himself, and his own Sectaries. Now to proceed further in the Procefs of this forsaide matter, let us see what the Princes again for their parts answer to these forsaide Suggestions and Instructions of Pope Adrian, sent unto them in the Diet of Noremburg, in the Cause of Luther: the Answer of whom here followeth under-written.

Luther cried out, write out any such cause.

Liberty of Flesh, Liberty of Spirit.

Turn only the names of the persons and all the accusations; of the Princes against the Lutherans agree chiefly unto themselves.

The Answer of the noble and reverend Princes, and States of the sacred Roman Empire, exhibited to the Pope's Ambassador.

The answer of the Princes of Germany, to the Pope's Letter, and Instructions.

The noble and renowned Prince Lord Ferdinandus, Lieutenant to the Emperor's Majesty, with other reverend Princes in Christ, and mighty Princes Electors, and other States and Orders of this present Assembly of the Roman Empire in Noremburg convened, have gratefully received, and diligently perused the Letters sent in form of a Brief, with the Instructions also of the most holy Father in Christ and Lord, Lord Adrian the high Bishop of the holy and universal Church of Rome, presented unto them in the cause of Luther's Faction.

Pope Adrian a German born.

By the which foresaid Letters and Writings whereas first they understand his Holiness to have been born, and to have had his native Origine and Parentage out of this noble Nation of Germany, they do not a little rejoice. Of whose equegious Vertues and Ornaments, both of mind and body, they have heard great fame and commendation, even from his tender years: by reason whereof they are so much the more joyous of his advancement and preferment, by such consent of Election, to the high top of the Apostolical Dignity and yield to God most hearty thanks for the same: praying also, from the bottom of their hearts, for his excellent clemency, and perpetual glory of his name, and for health of Souls, and incolumity of the universal Church, that God will give his Holiness long continuance of felicity: Having no misdoubt, but that, by such a full and contenting election of such a Pastor of the universal Catholick Church, great profit and commodity will ensue. Which thing to hope and look for, his Holiness openeth to them an evident declaration in his own Letters, testifying and protesting what a care it is to him both day and night, how to discharge his pastoral Function, in studying for the health of the Flock to him committed: and especially in converting the minds of Christian Princes from War to Peace. Declaring moreover, what subsidy and relief his Holiness hath sent to the Souldiers of Rhodes, &c. All which things they perpending with themselves, conceive exceeding hope and comfort in their minds, thus reputing and trusting that this concord of Christian Princes will be a great help and stay to the better quieting of things now out of frame; without which neither the state of the Common-wealth, nor of Christian Religion, can be rightly redressed, and much less the tyranny of the barbarous Turks repressed.

Can any good thing come out of Rome?

Wherefore the excellent Prince, Lord Lieutenant to the Emperor's Majesty, with the other Princes Electors, and Orders of this present Assembly, most heartily do pray, that his Holiness will persevere in this his purpose and diligence, as he hath virtuously begun, leaving no stone unremoved, how the disagreeing hearts of Christian Princes may be reduced to quiet and peace; or if that will not be, yet at least some truce and intermission of domestical dissensions may be obtained for the necessity of the time now present, whereby all Christians may join their powers together, with the help of God, to go against the Turk, and to deliver the People of Christ from his barbarous tyranny and bondage. Whereunto both the noble Prince Lord Lieutenant, and other Princes of Germany, will put to their helping hands, to the best of their ability.

The Pope much grieved for the profectious of Luther.

And whereas by the Letters of his Holiness, with his Institution also exhibited unto them by his Legat, they understand that his Holiness is afflicted with great sorrow for the prospering of Luther's Sect, whereby innumerable Souls, committed to his charge, are in danger of perdition, and therefore his Holiness vehemently desireth some speedy Remedy against the same to be provided, with an explication of certain necessary Reasons and Causes, whereby to move the German Princes thereunto; and that they will tender the execution of the Apostolick Sentence, and also of the Emperor's Edict set forth touching the suppressing of Luther. To the Lord Lieutenant, and other Princes and States do answer, that it is to them no less grief and sorrow than to his Holiness; and also they do lament as much for these impieties and perils of Souls, and inconveniences which grow in the Religion of Christ, either by the Sect of Luther, or any otherwise. Further, what help or counsel shall lie in them for the extirpating of Errors and decay of Souls health, what their moderation can do, they are willing and ready to perform; considering how they stand bound and subject, as well to the Pope's Holiness, as also to the Emperor's Majesty. But why the Sentence of the Apostolick See, and the Emperor's Edict against Luther, hath not been put in execution hitherto, there hath been (said they) causes great and urgent, which have led them thereto: as first, in weighing and considering with themselves, that great evils and inconveniences would thereupon ensue. For the greatest part of the People of Germany have always had this persuasion, and now by reading Luther's Books are more therein confirmed, that great grievances and inconveniences have come to this Nation of Germany by the Court of Rome; and therefore if they should have proceeded with any rigor in executing the Pope's Sentence, and the Emperor's Edict, the multitude would conceive and suspect in their minds, this to be done for subverting the verity of the Gospel, and for supporting and confirming the former abuses and grievances, wherupon great Wars and Tumults (no doubt) would have ensued: which thing of the Princes and States there hath been well perceived by many Arguments. For the avoiding whereof, they thought to use more gentle Remedies, serving more opportunely for the time.

Again, whereas the reverend Lord Legat (said they) in the name of the Pope's Holiness, hath been instructed, to declare unto them, that God suffereth this Perfection to rise in the Church for the sins of Men, and that his Holiness doth promise therefore to begin the Reformation with his own Court, that as the corruption first sprang from thence to the inferior parts, so the redress of all again should first begin with the same: Also, whereas his Holiness, of a good and fatherly heart, doth testify in his Letters, that he himself did always mislike that the Court of Rome should intermeddle so much, and derogate from the Concordates of the Princes, and that his Holiness doth fully purpose in that behalf, during his Papacy, never to practise the like, but so to endeavour, that every one, and especially the Nation of the German, may have their proper due and right, granting especially to the said Nation his peculiar favour: who seeth not by these premises, but that this most holy Bishop omitteth nothing which a good Father, or a devout Pastor may or ought to do to his Sheep? Or who will not be moved hereby to a loving reverence, and to amendment of his defaults; namely, seeing his Holiness so intendeth to accomplish the same in deed, which in word he promiseth, according as he hath begun?

And thus undoubtedly both the noble Lord Lieutenant, and all other Princes and States of the Empire, well hope that he will, and pray most heartily that he may do, to the glory of our eternal God, to the health of Souls, and to the tranquillity of the publick State. For unless such abuses and grievances, with certain other Articles also, which the secular Princes (aligned purposely for the same) shall draw out in writing, shall be faithfully reformed, there is no true peace and concord between the Ecclesiastical and Secular Estates, nor any true extirpation of this Tumult and Errors in Germany, that can be hoped. For partly by long Wars, partly by reason of other grievances and hindrances, this Nation of Germany hath been so wasted and consumed in Money, that uneth it is able to sustain it self in private Affairs, and necessary upholding of Justice within it self; much less then to minister aid and succour to the Kingdom of Hungary, and to the Croatians, against the Turk. And whereas all the States of the sacred Roman Empire do not doubt, but the Pope's Holiness doth right well understand how the German Princes did grant and condescend for the many of Annates to be levied to the See of Rome for term of certain years, upon condition that the said Money should be converted to maintain War against the Turkish Infidels, and for defence of the Catholick Faith: and whereas the term of these years is now expired long since, when as the said Annates should be gathered, and yet that money hath not been so bestowed to that use, whereto it was first granted. Wherefore if any such necessity should now come, that any publick helps or contributions against the Turk, should be demanded of the German people, they would answer again, Why is not that money of Annates, reserved many years before to that use, now bestowed and applied? and so would they refuse to receive any more such burthens for that cause to be laid upon them.

R. Hen. 8.

Causes why the Princes have not proceeded by the Pope's Sentence against Luther. Grievances received by the Court of Rome.

The Pope answered with his own words.

Grievances of the Germans complained off to the Pope. Vide infra.

Anathas falsely pretended of the Pope, to maintain War against the Turk.

Wherefore

K. Hen. 8. Wherefore the said Lord Lieutenant, and other Princes and degrees of the Empire, make earnest petition, that the Pope's Holiness will with a fatherly consideration expend the premises, and surcease hereafter to require such Annates, which are accustomed after the death of Bishops and other Prelates, or Ecclesiastical Persons, to be paid to the Court of Rome, and suffer them to remain to the Chamber of the Empire, whereby Justice and Peace may be more commodiously administered; the tranquility of the publick State of Germany maintained, and also by the same due helps may be ordained and disposed to other Christian Potentates in Germany, against the Turks, which otherwise without the same is not to be hoped for.

Remedy of Reformation. A General Council in Germany required. An Interim before the Council. Writings and Printed Books a time full spent. The Office of Preaching tempered. Preachers limited within certain bounds. Against selling and printing of ungodly Libels. Famous Libels be such Books as calumniate the Line of any person, bearing no name of the Author thereof. For Priests or religious Men that marry.

Item, Whereas the Pope's Holiness doth seem to be informed, what way were best to take in redressing these Errors of the Lutherans. To this the Lord Lieutenant, with other Princes and Nobles do answer, that whatsoever help or counsel they can devise, with willing hearts they will be ready thereunto. Seeing therefore the State, as well Ecclesiastical as Temporal, is far out of frame, and have so much corrupted their ways; and seeing not only of Luther's part, and of his Sect, but also by divers other occasions besides, so many errors, abuses, and corruptions have crept in; much requisite and necessary it is, that some effectual Remedy be provided, as well for redress of the Church, as also for repressing the Turks tyranny. Now what more present or effectual Remedy can be had, the Lord Lieutenant, and other Estates and Princes do not see, than this, that the Pope's Holiness, by the consent of the Emperor's Majesty, do summon a free Christian Council in some convenient place of Germany, as at Strasbourg, or at Mentz, or at Colen, or at Metz, and that with as much speed as conveniently may be, so that the Congregation of the said Council be not deferred above one year: in which Council it may be lawful for every person that there shall have interest, either Temporal or Ecclesiastical, freely to speak and consult, to the glory of God and health of Souls, and the publick wealth of Christendom, without impeachment or restraint, whatsoever Oath or other Bond to the contrary notwithstanding; yea, and it shall be every good Mans part there to speak, not only freely, but to speak that which is true, to the purpose, and to edifying, and not to pleasing or flattering, but simply and uprightly to declare his judgment, without all fraud or guile. And as touching by what ways these Errors and tumults of the German people may best be stayed and pacified in the mean time, until the Council be set, the foresaid Lord Lieutenant, with the other Princes, thereupon have consulted and deliberated; that forasmuch as Luther, and certain of his Followers, be within the Territory and Dominion of the noble Duke Frederick, the said Lord Lieutenant and other States of the Empire shall labour the matter with the aforementioned Prince, Duke of Saxony, that Luther and his followers, shall not write, set forth, or print any thing during the said mean space: neither do they doubt but that the said noble Prince of Saxony, for his Christian piety, and obedience to the Roman Empire, as becometh a Prince of such excellent vertue, will effectually condescend to the same.

Item, The said Lord Lieutenant and Princes shall labour so with the Preachers of Germany, that they shall not in their Sermons teach or blow into the Peoples ears such matter whereby the multitude may be moved to rebellion or uproar, or to be induced into error; and that they shall preach and teach nothing but the true, pure, sincere, and holy Gospel, and approved Scripture, godly, mildly, and Christianly, according to the doctrine and exposition of the Scripture, being approved and received of Christ's Church, abtaining from all such things which are better unknown than learned of the people, and which to be subtly searched, or deeply discussed, is not expedient. Also, that they shall move no contention of disputation among the vulgar sort: but whatsoever hangeth in controversy, the same they shall referre to the determination of the Council to come.

Item, The Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelats within their Dioceses, shall assign godly and learned Men, having good judgment in the Scripture, which shall diligently and faithfully attend upon such Preachers; and if they shall perceive the said Preachers either to have erred, or to have uttered any thing inconveniently, they shall godly, mildly, and modestly advertise and inform them thereof, in such sort as no Man shall justly complain the truth of the Gospel to impeached. But if the Preachers, continuing still in their stubbornness, shall refuse to be admonished, and will not desist from their lawfulness, then shall they be reformed and punished by the Ordinaries of the place, with punishment for the same convenient.

Furthermore, the said Princes and Nobles shall provide and undertake, so much as shall be possible, that, from henceforth during the foresaid time, no new Book shall be printed, especially none of these famous Libels, neither shall they privately or apertly be sold. Also order shall be taken amongst all Potentates, that if any shall set out, sell, or imprint any new work, it shall first be seen and perused of certain godly, learned, and discreet Men appointed for the same: so that if it be not admitted and approved by them, it shall not be permitted to be published in print, or to come abroad. Thus by these means they hope well, that the Tumults, Errors, and Offences among the people, shall cease, especially if the Pope's Holiness himself shall begin with an order, and due reformation, in the foresaid grievances above mentioned, and will procure such a free and Christian Council, as hath been said, and so shall the people be well contented and satisfied. Or if the tumult shall not so fully be calmed as they desire, yet the greater part thus will be quieted, for all such as be honest and good Men, no doubt, will be in great expectation of that General Council, so shortly and now ready at hand to come. Finally, as concerning Priests which contract Matrimony, and religious Men leaving their Cloisters, whereof intimation was also made by the Apostolical Legat, the foresaid Princes do consider, that forasmuch as in the Civil Law there is no penalty for them ordained, they shall be referred to the Canonical Constitutions, to be punished thereafter accordingly; that is, by the loss of their Benefices and Privileges, or other condign Censures; & that the said Ordinaries shall in no case be stopped or inhibited by the secular Powers, from the correction of such: but that they shall add their help and favour to the maintenance of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction, and shall direct out their publick Edicts and Precepts, that none shall impeach or prohibit the said Ordinaries in their Ecclesiastical Cognition, upon such Transgressors to be administered.

To conclude, The redoubted Prince Lord Lieutenant, and other Princes, Estates, and Orders of the publick Empire, vehemently and most heartily do pray and beseech that the Pope's Holiness, and the reverend Lord his Legat will accept and take all the premises to be no otherwise spoken and meant, than of a good free, sincere, and a Christian mind. Neither is there any thing that all the foresaid Princes, Estates, and Nobles, do more wish and desire, than the maintenance and prosperous estate of the holy Catholick Church of Rome, and of his Holiness. To whose wishes desires, and obedience, they offer and commend themselves not ready and obsequious, as faithful Children. Ex Orth. Gratian.

Thus hast thou, loving Reader, the full discourse, both of the Pope's Letter, and of his Legat's Instructions, with the Answer also of the States of Germany to the said Letter and Instructions to them exhibited in the Diet of Nuremberg. In the which Diet what was concluded, and what order and consultation was taken, first touching the Grievances of Germany, which they exhibited to the Pope, then concerning a General Council to be called in Germany, also for printing, preaching, and for Priests Marriage, hath been likewise declared, &c.

The occasion of this matter, moved against Priests Marriage, came first by the Ministers of Strasbourg, which about this time began to take Wives, and therefore were cited by the Bishop of Strasbourg to appear before him at a certain day, as violators of the Laws of Holy Church, the Holy Fathers, the Bishops of Rome, and of the Emperor's Majesty, to the prejudice both of their own order of Priesthood, and Majesty of Almighty God: but they referred their cause to the hearing of the Magistrates of the same City; who, being Suiters for them unto the Bishops, laboured to have the matter either released, or at least to be delayed for a time.

Long it were to recite all the Circumstances following upon this Diet or Assembly of Nuremberg, how their Decree was received of some, of some neglected, of divers diversely wrested and expounded. Luther writing his Letters upon the same Decree, to the Princes, thus made his exposition of the meaning thereof: that whereas the Preachers were commanded to preach the pure Gospel, after the Doctrine of the Church received, he expounded the meaning thereof to be, not after the Doctrine of Thomas Aquinas, or Scotus, or such other late School-writers, but after the Doctrine of Hilarie, Cyprian, and Austen, and other ancient Doctors, and yet the Doctrine of the said Ancients no farther to be received, but as it should agree with the Scripture.

Secondly, As concerning new Books not to be sold nor printed, he expounded the meaning thereof to extend no further, but that the Text of the Bible, and Books of the Holy Scripture might be printed notwithstanding, and published to all Men.

And as for the prohibition of Priest's Marriage, he writeth to the Princes, and desireth them to bear with the weakness of Men; declaring that branch of their Decree to be very hard; which tho it stand with the Pope's Law, yet it accordeth not with the Gospel, neither conduceth to good manners, nor to honesty of Life, &c.

An hundred grievances of the Germans against the Pope.

Furthermore, Whereas in the same Session of Noremburg, mention was made before of certain grievances collected to the number of an hundred, and exhibited to the Bishop of Rome, they were tedious likewise to insert them all: yet to give some taste of a few I judg it not unprofitable; to the intent that the World may see and judg, not only what abuses and corruptions, most monstrous and incredible, lay hid under the glorious title of the Holy Church of Rome: but also may understand, with what hypocrisy and impudence the Pope taketh upon him so grievously to complain upon M. Luther and other: when in all the universal Church of Christ, there is none so much to be blamed all manner of ways, as he himself, according as by these hainous complaints of the German Princes, here following, against the Pope's intolerable oppressions and grievances, may right well appear. Which grievances being collected by the Princes of Germany at Noremburg, to the number of an hundred, I with might be fully and at large set forth to the studious Reader, whereby might appear the subtil sleights and intolerable frauds of that pretended Church. But forasmuch as it were too long to comprehend the whole, I have thought good to exhibit some part thereof for example, as giving only a certain taste, whereby thou mayest more easily conceive, what to think and esteem of all the residue, which both to me would be tedious to write, and perhaps more grievous to thee to hear.

Certain Grievances and Oppressions of Germany, against the Court of Rome, collected and exhibited by the Princes, at the Council of Noremburg, to the number of an hundred, whereof certain specialties here follow.

Forbidden thing of marriage in divers degrees, not forbidden by Gods Law.

Amongst other burdens and grievances, this is not least to be regarded, that many things are prohibited by Mens constitutions, and many things exacted, which are not prohibited or commanded by any precept of God: as the innumerable obstacles of Matrimony invented and brought in, whereby Men were forbid to marry in cases of Kindred, which stand upon divers degrees: as upon affinity, publick honesty, spiritual kindred, kindred by Law, and kindred in Blood, &c. And likewise in forbidding the use of Meats, which God hath created for Mans necessity, and taught by the Apostles indifferently to be received with thanksgiving. By these, and many other humane constitutions, Men are yoked in bondage, until by money they obtain some dispensation of those Laws, at their hands which made them: so that Money shall make that lawful for rich Men, which is clearly prohibited unto the poor. By these snares of Mens Laws and Constitutions, not only great sums of Money are gathered out of Germany, and carried over the Alps, but also great iniquity is sprung up among Christians: many offences and privy hatreds do rise, by reason that poor Men do see themselves intangled with these snares, for no other cause, but for that they do not possess the Thorns of the Gospel; for so Christ doth often call Riches.

Times of Marriage restrained, and after released for Mo-ny.

The like practice also is to be seen in the times restrained from Marriage, by the Heads of the Church of Rome, from the Sepuagesima Sunday, somewhat before Lent: when as notwithstanding both the Clergy and the Seculars in the mean time will live licentiously, and that openly in the face of all the World. But this interdict proceedeth to this effect: if a Man shall presume so to do upon his own liberty, without compounding. But otherwise if there be any hope of Money, then that which was before unlawful, is now made lawful for every Man to do freely. And this is also another drawing Net, whereby great sums of Money are dragged out of the Germans purses. Whereupon also hangeth another grievance as great as this; that in fixing out a Dispensation, the state of the poor and of the rich is not indifferently weighed: For where the rich escapeth many times for little or nought, and goeth clear away, the poor Man shall be sure to pay for the shot.

A complaint for selling Remission of Sins for Money.

But especially the burden and grievance of the Pope's Indulgences and Pardons are most importable: whereas the Bishops of Rome, under pretence of building some Church in Rome, or to war against the Turks, do make out their Indulgences with their Bulls: perfwading and promising to the simple people strange and wonderful benefits of remission à pena & culpa, that is, from all their sins and punishment due for the same, and that not in this life only, but also after this life, to them that be dead burning in the fire of Purgatory. Through the hope and occasion whereof, true piety is almost extinct in all Germany, while every evil disposed person promitteth to himself, for a little Money, licence and impunity to do what him listeth: whereupon followeth Fornication, Incest, Adultery, Perjury, Homicide, Robbing, and Spoiling, Rapine, Usury, with a whole flood of all Mischiefs, &c.

Item, Whosoever he be that hath received any Ecclesiastical Orders, great or small, thereby he doth contend to be freed from all punishment of the secular Magistrature, how great offence soever he do: neither doth he unadvisedly presume thereupon, but is maintained in that liberty to sin, by the principal Estates of the Clergy. For it hath often bin seen, that whereas by the Canonical Laws, Priests are forbidden to marry, afterward they diligently labour and go about day and night to attempt and try the chastity of Matrons, Virgins, and of the Wives, Daughters, and Sisters of the Lay-men: and through their continual instance and labour, partly with Gifts and Rewards, and flattering words, partly by their secret confessions (as they call them) as it hath been found by experience, they bring to pass that many Virgins and Matrons, which otherwise would be honest, have been overcome and moved to sin and wickedness: and it hath oftentimes, that they do detain and keep away the Wives and Daughters from their Husbands and Fathers, threatening them with Fire and Sword, that do require them again. Thus through their raging Lust, they heap and gather together innumerable Mischiefs and Offences. It is to be marvelled at, how licentiously, without punishment, they daily offend in Robberies, Murder, accusing of Innocents, Burning, Rapine, Theft, and counterfeiting of false Coin, besides a thousand other kinds of mischiefs, contrary and against all Laws both of God and Man, not without great offence of others, trusting only upon the freedom and liberty of sin, which they usurp unto themselves by the privilege of their Canons. For whereas they once perceive that it is lawful for them to do what they list without controulment, then they do not only condemn the Civil Magistrates, but also their Bishops and Superiors, whatsoever they either command or forbid them to do.

priests.

And moreover, to the intent they may be the more maintained in their mischief and wickedness, contrary to all reason and equity, it is partly forbidden the Archbishops and Bishops to condemn these Malefactors openly, except they be first degraded, which must be done with sumptuousness and pomp: whereby it hath very seldom, that those appointed naughty Packs, do receive condign punishment. Besides that, the Bishops are so bound by their Chapters, that they dare not punish any person which hath taken Orders, by the Canonical Laws, be the punishment never so light or small. By reason whereof, the matter so falleth out, that through this unequal partiality between the Laity and the Clergy, great hatred, discord, and dissention is sprung and risen. It is also not a little to be feared, that if the Clergy, which are the cause of this grievance, and of other mischiefs (which daily they do proceed to perpetrate) have not like Laws, equal Judges, and like Punishment, their offensive Life will move and stir up some great Tumults and Sedition amongst the common People, not only against the Clergy themselves, but also against the Superiours and Magistrates, for that they leave so notorious Offences unpunished.

Be it thought to be subject to the same punishments as are the Lay-people.

Wherefore Necessity and Justice doth require, that the said prejudicial Privileges of the Clergy should be abrogate and taken away, and in their place it be provided, ordained, and decreed, That the Clergy, of what order or degree soever they be, shall have like Laws, like Judgment and Punishment as the Laity have: so that they shall pretend no prerogative or freedom in like offence, more than the Laymen; but that every one of the Clergy offending, under the Judge where the offence is committed, shall be punished for his fact, according to the measure and quality of his offence, in such like manner as other Malefactors are, with the punishment appointed by the common Laws of the Empire. Which thing (without doubt) will please the true Ministers of the Church, such as are honest and learned, and they will not think their Power and Authority thereby in any case diminished. By this means it shall be brought to pass, that such as are of the Clergy only by name, and otherwise naughty wicked Men, through the obedience due unto their Magistrates, shall be compelled to live more honestly; and all sedition and privy hatred between them and the Laity shall be put away; and finally, thereby the Laity shall be more moved and stirred to love and reverence such of the Clergy as be of a sound Life.

Complaint of Excommunication abused.

Excommunication abused in the church of Rome.

Item, At Rome and in other places many Christians are excommunicate by the Archbishops, Bishops, or by their Ecclesiastical Judges, for prophane causes, through the desire and covetousness of Money and Lucre. The Consciences of Men, which are weak in faith thereby are burdened and brought unto desperation. And finally, for Money and Lucre, a matter of no importance is made to tend to the destruction both of Body and Soul, contrary to the Law both of God and Man; forasmuch as no Man ought to be excommunicate but only for Heresy, or for some heinous fact perpetrate; not to be counted as separate from the Christian Catholick Church, as the Scriptures do witness. Therefore the Princes, Nobles, States, and Laity of the Sacred Empire, desire and require the Pope's Holiness, that as a faithful Christian, and loving Father, he will remove the said Burden of Excommunication, used both in the See of Rome, and also in the Sees of all other Archbishops and Ecclesiastical Judges; and finally decree, that no Man shall hereafter be excommunicate, but only for a manifest convicted Crime of Heresy: For it is too wicked a thing, that faithful Christians, for every light offence touching any temporal goods or gain, or for any other worldly matter, but only for obstinacy of Heresy, or some great enormity, should be excluded from Almighty God, and the Catholick Congregation.

The Church burdened with a number of Holy-days.

The number of Holy days to be diminished.

Moreover, the common People are not a little oppressed with the great number of Holy-days, for that there are now so many Holy-days, that the Husbandmen have scarcely time to gather the Fruits of the Earth, which they have brought forth with so great labour and travel, being often in danger of Hail, Rain, and other Storms; which Fruits notwithstanding, if they were not letted with so many Holy-days, they would gather and bring home without any loss. Besides that, upon these Holy-days innumerable Offences are committed and done, rather than God honoured or worshipped. Which thing is so manifest, that it needeth no witness. For that cause the Estates of the Sacred Empire think it best, and most profitable for the Christian Commonwealth, that this great number of Holy-days should be diminished, which ought rather to be celebrated in spirit and verity, than with the external Worship, and be better kept with abstinence from Sin.

Suspending and hallowing of Church-yards gainful to the Pope, and chargeable to the People.

Furthermore, if it happen that two or more do fight without any weapon in a Church-yard, only with their fists, or by the hair, that there be never so little blood shed by and by the Clergy have recourse to Interdictment, and do not suffer any more Christian Burials there to be done, before that all the Citizens with great pomp and expences do cause it to be consecrated and hallowed again, with no less charge than when at the first, of a prophane place, it was hallowed for Burial: all which things do redound to the charges and costs of the Laity. And tho the Churches or Chapels be never so little which are so hallowed, yet the Suffragans do burden and oppress the simple poor Household-ers, be they never so bare or needy, with superfluous expences, and require moreover gifts of the People, which is not for their ease to give.

Hallowing of Church-yards abused for Money.

Also the Suffragans have invented, that no other but only themselves may baptize Bells for the Lay-people: Whereby the simple People, upon the affirmation of the Suffragans, do believe, that such Bells so baptized will drive away evil Spirits and Tempests. Whereupon a great number of God-fathers are appointed, especially such as are rich, which at the time of baptizing, holding the Rope wherewithal the Bell is tied, the Suffragan speaking before them, as is accustomed in the baptizing of young Children, they all together do answer, and give the name to the Bell. The Bell having a new Garment put upon it, as is accustomed to be done unto the Christians; after this they go unto sumptuous Banquets, wherunto also the Gossips are bidden, that thereby they might give the greater reward; and the Suffragans, with their Chaplains and other Ministers, are sumptuously fed. Yet doth not this suffice, but that the Suffragan also must have a reward, which they do call a small gift or present: whereby it happeneth oftentimes, that even in small Villages a hundred Florins are consumed and spent in such Christenings. Which is not only superfluous, but also contrary unto Christian Religion, a seducing of the simple People, and meer Extortion. Notwithstanding the Bishops, to enrich their Suffragans, do suffer these things, and others far worse. Wherefore such wicked and unlawful things ought to be abolished.

Baptizing of Bells.

Complaint against Officials, and other Ecclesiastical Judges.

The Officials also of Archbishops for the most part are unlearned and unable Men; besides that, Men of evil conditions, taking thought for nothing but only for Money. Also how corruptly they live, and continue in notorious crimes and transgressions, it is daily seen. Whereby the Laity, whom they ought to correct and punish for their Offences, and instruct in Christian Godliness, are not in any point by them amended, but rather by them encouraged and confirmed in their Offences. Besides this, the Laity are miserably robbed and spoiled of their Goods by these light and vile Officials, in whose Consciences there is no spark of Christian Pity and Godliness, but only a wicked Desire and Covetousness. Which thing the Archbishops and Bishops, if they were indeed such as they are called, that is to say, the Pastors and Shepherds of Christ, without doubt they would no longer suffer or commit Christ's Flock to wicked and offensive Pastors to be fed and nourished.

Against Officials.

How the Ecclesiastical Judges do annex certain special Causes, being Lay-matters, unto their own jurisdiction, and will by no means release the same.

Whensoever any Causes are pleaded in Judgment before an Ecclesiastical Judge, either for ravishing of Virgins, or for Children unlawfully born out of Wedlock, or for Servants Wages, or any other matters concerning Widows, the Ecclesiastical Judges being called upon by the Superiours of the Laity which do contend, they will neither defer that Judgment, nor by any means will be entreated to remit them to their ordinary Jurisdiction.

IT happeneth oftentimes that Men and Women, through tinisher and false Reports and Slanders, are brought before the Official or Ecclesiastical Judge, as Men guilty, and shall not be declared innocent before they have cleared themselves by an Oath; which Purgation so made, they are restored again to their former estimation. And albeit that the Damages and Costs ought to be repayed again unto such as be so falsely accused, yet notwithstanding the Innocents themselves are forced to pay two gilderns and a quarter for their Letters of Absolution. And this is the cause why that the Officials and other Ecclesiastical Judges do so greedily follow the Action of such unlawful, false and slanderous Accusations, challenging the hearing thereof only unto themselves; which thing (no doubt) redoundeth to the great and most singular hurt and detriment of all Men: For oftentimes it happeneth, that Women fall together in contention, through anger, hatred, or some other affection, do speak evil or slander one another, and outrage so much, that the one oftentimes accuseth the other, either of Adultery or Witchery. Which thing being brought before the Official, the which through her anger had so slandered the other, is forced by an Oath to excuse and purge her self, that whatsoever injurious or slanderous word she had spoken, came not of any deliberate purpose or intent, but through wrath and displeasure. In like manner the other, which is accused either of Adultery or Sorcery, is commanded by her Oath to declare her Innocency, that she is not guilty of those facts. So that it is evident unto all Men, that in such cases, whether they be guilty or not guilty, they must swear, if they will keep their good name and fame. Whereby not only the unlawful lucre of Gain and Money is sought, but also wilful Perjury forced, and the Secular Power and Judges letted from the punishment thereof, so that contrary to all reason Offences do remain unpunished.

Albeit there be many Causes so indifferent to both Jurisdictions, that they may be pleaded and punished as well by the Civil Magistrate as Ecclesiastical Judge; notwithstanding it happeneth oftentimes, that when as the Civil Magistrates would exercise their Office and Jurisdiction in this behalf, they are so bidden and letted by the Ecclesiastical Judges, under pain of Excommunication. Which thing if it should long continue and be suffered, the Ecclesiastical Judges would shortly take away all manner of Causes from the Civil Magistrate, and his Jurisdiction; which is intolerable, and derogatory both unto the Emperor's Majesty, and other States of the Empire. And albeit that by the Common Laws manifest Perjuries, Adulteries, Witchcrafts, and such other like, may indifferently be punished by Ecclesiastical or Civil Judges for the time being, so that prevention in this behalf taketh place; notwithstanding the Ecclesiastical Judges go about to usurp unto themselves and their Jurisdiction all such manner of Causes: which Burden and Grievance the Civil Jurisdiction and Power ought not to suffer.

Moreover, the Ecclesiastical Judges say, that in such cases it is lawful for them to take prophane matters into their hands, if the Civil Magistrate be found negligent in executing of Justice: but contrariwise, they will not suffer that the like Order should be kept with them, neither will they permit that in Ecclesiastical Matters any Man may complain unto the Civil Magistrate for lack of Justice, and require the administration of Justice at his hand. Albeit, they do define all Laws generally common, and determine how the Canon Laws may help and assist the Civil, and contrariwise the Civil Laws the Canon.

Complaint against certain Misorders of Cathedral Churches, for using double Punishment for one Offence against the Law.

K. Hen. 8.

FOrasmuch as it is forbidden both by God's Law and Man's, that any Man should be beaten with two Rods, that is to say, to be punished with two kinds of Torments; worthily therefore do all wise Men detest and abhor the odious Statutes of divers Cathedral Churches, whereby Murderers, both Men and Women, and other, as well light as grievous Offenders, have been hitherto vexed and tormented: for hitherto it hath been accustomed, that such as were guilty of Murder, and such other Crimes, (which they call Causes reserved unto the Bishops) after they had made their Auricular Confession, were compelled (to their great ignominy and shame) to do penance in the sight of all the People: which Penance were not so much to be disallowed, bearing some semblance of the Institution of the Primitive Church, if so be it these busy Officials (being contented therewith) would not extort more and greater Sums of Money than were right and lawful, and so punish those Offenders with double punishment; wherewithal it is to be marvelled how many are offended and grieved. How wicked a thing this is, and how far it differeth from Christ's Institution, we will refer it to every good Conscience to judge.

Complaint of Officials for maintaining unlawful Usury.

Furthermore, the Officials, being allured through the greedy and unsatiable desire of Money, do not only not forbid unlawful Usuries and Gains of Money, but also suffer and maintain the same. Moreover, they taking a yearly Stipend and Pension, do suffer the Clergy and other religious Persons unlawfully to dwell with their Concubines and Harlots, and to beget Children by them. Both which things how great offence, and detriment they do bring, both unto Body and Soul, every Man may plainly see (so that it need not to be rehearsed) except he will make himself as blind as a Mole.

Complaint of Officials permitting unlawful cohabitation with other, when the Husband or Wife are long absent.

Furthermore, where it so happeneth (as it doth oftentimes) that either the good Man, or the good Wife, by means of War, or some other Vow, hath taken in hand some long Journey, and so tarrieth longer than serveth the appetite of the other, the Official, taking a reward of the other, giveth license to the Party to dwell with any other Person, not having first regard, or making inquisition whether the Husband or Wife, being absent, be in health or dead. And because these their doings should not be evil spoken of, they name it a Toleration of Sufferance, not without great offence to all Men, and to the great contempt of holy Matrimony.

Complaint of Canons in Cathedral Churches, which have their Bishop sworn unto them before he be chosen.

This is also unlawful and plainly wicked, that the Canons of Cathedral Churches, in whole hand the principal part of Ecclesiastical Judgments, Synods, and Censures do consist, and the Canons of other Collegiate Churches, which have power and authority to chuse their Superior and Bishop, will chuse none to their Bishop, except he bind himself first with an Oath, and plainly swear, yea, and oftentimes is bound by Bond and Instruments, sealed with their Seals, to them and their Ecclesiastical Judges, that in no matter, be it never so grievous, intolerable, or dishonest, he shall be against them: and if it happen at any time that they do offend, they may do it also without punishment for him.

Complaint

K. Hen. 8.

Complaint against Incorporations or Impropriations, and other piling of the People by Church-Men.

The inconvenience of Impropriations.

Many Parish-Churches are subject unto Monasteries, and to the Parsons of other Churches, by means of Incorporations, (as they call them) or otherwise, which they are bound also, according to the Canon Laws, to foresee and look unto by themselves, when as they do put them forth unto others to be governed, referring for the most part unto themselves the whole Stipend of the Benefits and Tithes; and moreover aggravate and charge the same with so great Penfions, that the Hiring-Priests, and other Ministers of the Church, cannot have thereupon a decent and competent living. Whereby it cometh to pass, that these Hiring-Priests (for that they must needs have whereupon to live) do with unlawful exactions miserably spoil and devour the poor Sheep committed unto them, and consume all their subsistence. For when as the Sacraments of the Altar and of Baptism are to be administered, or when the first, the seventh, the thirtieth, and Year-day must be kept; when Auricular Confession cometh to be heard, the Dead to be buried, or any other Ceremony whatsoever about the Funeral is to be done, they will not do it freely, but extort and exact so much Money, as the miserable Communality is scarce able to disburse: and daily they do increase and augment these their Exactions, driving the simple poor People to the payment thereof, by threatening them with Excommunication, or by other ways compelling them to be at charge: which otherwise through poverty are not able to maintain Obsequies, Year-minds, and such other like Ceremonies, as to the Funerals of the Dead be appertaining.

Buying and selling of Burials complained of.

Gain gotten by selling Burial.

It is ordained by the Pope's Canon, That Burial in the Church should be denied only unto them which being known to be manifest and notorious Offenders, have departed this life without receiving of the Sacrament. But the Clergy, notwithstanding those Decrees, will not suffer such as by chance are drowned, killed, slain with Fall or Fire, or otherwise by chance have ended their lives, (albeit it be not evident that they were in deadly Sin) to be buried in the Churches, until such time as the Wives, Children, or Friends of those Men so dead, do with great Sums of Money purchase and buy the Burial of them in the Church-yard.

Chaste and continent Priests compelled to pay Tribute for Concubines.

Concubines permitted for Priests, and how they are compelled to pay tribute for them.

Also in many places the Bishops and their Officials do not only suffer Priests to have Concubines, so that they pay certain Sums of Money, but also compel continent and chaste Priests, which live without Concubines, to pay Tribute for Concubines, affirming that the Bishop hath need of Money: which being paid, it shall be lawful for them either to live chaste, or to keep Concubines. How wicked a thing this is, every Man doth well understand and know.

These, with many other Burthens and Grievances more, to the number of an hundred, the Secular States of Germany delivered to the Pope's Legate; having (as they said) many more and more grievous Grievances besides these, which had likewise much need of redress: but because they would not exceed the limits of reasonable brevity, they would content themselves (they said) with these aforesaid hundred, referring the rest to a more apt and more convenient opportunity: steadfastly trusting and hoping, that when those hundred Grievances already by them declared, should be abolished, the other would also decay and fall with them. Of the which aforesaid Grievances and Complaints here is moreover to be noted, that a great part was offered up before to the Emperor at the Council of Worms; but because no redress thereof did follow, therefore the Secular States of Germany thought good to exhibit the same now again, with divers more annexed therunto, to Cherogatus, the Pope's Legat in this present Assembly of Nuremberg, desiring him to present the same to Pope Adrian. This was about the year of our Lord 1523. Which being done, the Assembly of Nuremberg brake up for a time, and was prorogued to the next year following.

The Diet of Nuremberg began anno 1523, and brake up Anno 1523.

In this mean time Pope Adrian died. After him succeeded Pope Clement the Seventh, who the next year following, which was Anno 1524, sent down his Legate, Cardinal Campeius, unto the Council of the German Princes assembled again at Nuremberg, about the Month of March, with Letters also to Duke Frederick, full of many fair Petitions and sharp Complaints, &c. But as touching the Grievances above-mentioned, no word nor message at all was sent, neither by Campeius, nor by any other. Thus, where any thing was to be complained of against Luther, either for suppression of the Liberty of the Gospel, or for upholding of the Pope's Dignity, the Pope was ever ready with all diligence to call upon the Princes: but where any redress was to be required for the publick wealth of Christian People, or touching the necessary reformation of the Church, herein the Pope neither giveth ear nor answer.

The death of Pope Adrian. Pope Clement the Seventh. Cardinal Campeius the Pope's Legate sent into Germany. The Pope only looketh to his own dignity, but publick Reformation never toucheth.

And thus having discoursed such matters occurrent between the Pope and Princes of Germany, at the Synod of Nuremberg, let us now proceed, returning again to the Story of Luther, of whom ye heard before, how he was kept sequestered and solitary for a time, by the advice and conveyance of certain Nobles in Saxony, because of the Emperor's Edict above mentioned. In the mean time, while Luther had thus absented himself out of Wittenberg, Andreas Carlostadius, proceeding more roughly and eagerly in Causes of Religion, had stirred up the People to throw down Images in the Temples, besides other things more. For the which cause Luther, returning again into the City, greatly misliked the order of their doings, and reproveth the rashness of Carlostadius, declaring that their proceedings herein were not orderly, but that Pictures and Images ought first to be thrown out of the Hearts and Consciences of Men; and that the People ought first to be taught, that we are saved before God, and please him only by Faith; and that Images serve to no purpose: This done, and the People well instructed, there was no danger in Images, but they would fall of their own accord. Not that he repugned to the contrary (he said) as tho he would maintain Images to stand or to be suffered: but that this ought to be done by the Magistrate, and not by force, upon every private Man's head, without order and authority. Ex Joan. Steid. lib. 3.

Carlostadius is called down Images in Wittenberg.

Luther misliked to throw out of Images by the People's hands.

Ex Joan. Steid. lib. 3.

Furthermore, Luther writing of Carlostadius, affirmed, that he also joined with the sentence of them, which began then to spread about certain parts of Saxony, saying, that they were taught of God that all Wickedness being utterly suppressed, and all the wicked doers slain, a new full perfection of all things must be set up, and the Innocent only to enjoy all things, &c.

The cause disliked by Luther permitted Images to stand.

The cause why Luther so stood against that violent throwing down of Images and against Carlostadius, seemeth partly to rise of this, by reason that Pope Adrian, in his Letters sent to the Princes and States of Germany, doth grievously complain and charge the Sect of Luther for Sedition and Tumults, and Rebellion against Magistrates, as subverters and destroyers of all Order and Obedience, as appeared by the words of the Pope's Letter before expressed: therefore Martin Luther, to stop the mouth of such slanderers, and to prevent such sinister suspitions, was enforced to take this way which he did, that is, to proceed as much as he might by Order and Authority.

Two things to be noted in Luther one bearing with Images.

Wherein are to be noted by the way two special points touching the doctrine and doings of Martin Luther, especially for all such who in these our days, now abusing the name and authority of Luther, think themselves to be good Lutherans, if they suffer Images still to remain in Temples, and admit such things in the Church, which themselves do wish to be away.

The first is, the manner how and after what sort Luther did suffer such Images to stand: For although he assented not, that the vulgar and private Multitude tumultuously by violence should rap them down; yet that is no argument now for the Magistrate to let them stand.

And tho he allowed not the Ministers to stir up the People by forcible means to promote Religion; yet that argueth not those Magistrates to be good Lutherans, which may and should remove them, and will not.

The second Point to be noted is, To consider the cause why that Luther did so stand with standing of Images, which cause was Time, and not his own Judgment: for albeit in Judgment he wished them away, yet Time so served not these-thereunto then, as it serveth now: For then the Doctrine of Luther first beginning to spring, and being but in the blade, was not yet known whereto it tended, nor to what it would grow; but rather was suspected to tend to disobedience and sedition; and therefore the Pope hearing of the doings of Caroloftadius in Wittenberg, and of other like, took his ground thereby to charge the Sect of Luther with sedition, uproars, and diffolute liberty of Life. And this was the cause why Luther compelled then by necessity of time to save his Doctrine from slander of sedition and tumult being laid to him by the Pope, (as ye have heard) was so much offended with Caroloftadius and others, for their violence used against Images. For otherwise had it not been for the Pope's Accusations, there is no doubt but Luther would have been as well contented with abolishing of Images, and other Monuments of Popery, as he was at the same time contented to write to the Friars Augustines for abrogating of private Masses. And therefore as Luther in this doing is to be excused, the circumstances considered; so the like excuse perhaps will not serve the overmuch curious imitation of certain Lutherans in this present Age now; which, considering only the fact of Luther, do not mark the purpose of Luther, neither do expend the circumstances and time of his doings: being not much unlike to the ridiculous Imitators of King Alexander the Great, which thought it not sufficient to follow him in his virtues, but they would also counterfeite him in his stooping, and all other gestures besides. But to these living now in the Church, in another age than Luther did, it may seem (after my mind) sufficient to follow the same way after Luther, or to walk with Luther to the Kingdom of Christ, tho they jump not also in every footstep of his, and keep even the same pace and turnings in all points as he did.

Luther not so become contemned for one little blemish.

Commendation of Martin Luther's Doctrine. Cyprian so much delighted in reading of Tertullian, that whosoever he called for his Book, he had reach him his Master.

The conflict between Luther and Zuinglius is not in effect of Doctrine.

And contrarywise, of the other sort, much less are they to be commended, which running as much on the contrary thing, are so precise, that because of one small blemish, or for a little stooping of Luther in the Sacrament, therefore they give clean over the reading of Luther, and fall almost in utter contempt of his Books. Whereby is declared, not so much the niceness and curiosities of these our days, as the hindrance that cometh thereby to the Church is greatly to be lamented. For albeit the Church of Christ (praised be the Lord) is not unprovided of sufficient plenty of worthy and learned Writers, able to instruct in matters of Doctrine; yet in the chief points of our consolation, where the glory of Christ, and the power of his passion, and strength of faith is to be opened to our Confidence; and where the Soul, wrestling for death and life, standeth in need of serious consolation, the same may be found of Martin Luther, among all the other variety of Writers, that St. Cyprian was wont to say of Tertullian Da magistrum, Give me my Master. And albeit that Luther went a little awry, and dissented from Zuinglius in this one matter of the Sacrament; yet in all other states of Doctrines they did accord, as appeared in the Synod holden at Marpurg, by Prince Philip Landgrave of Hesse, which was in the year of our Lord 1529. where both Luther and Zuinglius were present, and conferring together, agreed in these Articles:

1. On the Unity and Trinity of God. 2. In the Incarnation of the Word. 3. In the Passion and Resurrection of Christ. 4. In the Article of Original sin. 5. In the Article of Faith in Christ Jesus. 6. That this Faith cometh not of Man, but by the gift of God. 7. That this Faith is our Righteousness. 8. Touching the extreme Word. 9. Likewise they agreed in the Articles of Baptism. 10. Of good Works. 11. Of Confession. 12. Of Magistrate. 13. Of Monastic Traditions. 14. Of Baptism of Infants. 15. Lastly, concerning the Doctrine of the Lord's Supper: This they did believe and hold; first, that both the kinds thereof are to be ministered to the People according to Christ's institution; and that the Mass is no such work for the which a Man may obtain grace both for the Quick and the Dead. Item, that the Sacrament (which they call of the Altar) is a true Sacrament of the Body and Blood of the Lord. Item, that the spiritual manducation of his Body and Blood is necessary for every Christian Man. And furthermore, that the use of the Sacrament tendeth to the same effect as doth the Word, given and ordained of Almighty God, that thereby infirm Consciences may be stirred to belief by the Holy-Ghost, &c. Ex Paral. Abbat. Ursp.

Zuinglius did consent and agree; neither were their opinions so different in the matter of the Lord's Supper, but that in the principal points they accorded. For if the question be asked of them both, What is the material substance of the Sacrament, which our outward Senses do behold and feel? they will both confesse Bread, and not the Accidents only of Bread. Further, if the question be asked, whether Christ be there present? they will both confesse his true presence to be there, only in the manner of presence they differ. Again, ask, Whether the material substance laid before our eyes in the Sacrament is to be worshipped? they will both deny it, and judg it Idolatry. And likewise for Transubstantiation, and the Sacrifice of the Mass, they both do abhor, and do deny the same: as also the Communion to be in both kinds administered, they do both assent and grant.

Only their difference is in this, concerning the sense and meaning of the words of Christ, Hoc est corpus meum, This is my Body, &c. which words Luther expoundeth to be taken nakedly and simply as the letter standeth, without trope or figure; and therefore holdeth the Body and Blood of Christ truly to be in the Bread and Wine, and so also to be received with the mouth. Udricus Zuinglius, with Joannes Oecolampadius, and other more, do interpret these words otherwise; as to be taken not literally, but to have a spiritual meaning, and to be expounded by a trope or figure, so that the sense of these words, This is my Body, is thus to be expounded: This signifieth my Body and Blood. Ex Joan. Sleid. lib. 5. With Luther contented the Saxons, with the other side of Zuinglius went the Helvetians. And as time did grow, to the division of these opinions increased in fides, and spread in farther Realms and Countries: the one part being called, of Luther, Lutherans; the other having the name of Sacramentaries. Notwithstanding, in this one unity of opinion, both the Lutherans and Sacramentaries do accord and agree, that the Bread and Wine there present is not transubstantiate into the Body and Blood of Christ, (as is said) but is a true Sacrament of the Body and Blood.

But heretofore sufficient, touching this division between the Lutherans and the Zuinglians. In which division, if there have been any defect in Martin Luther, yet is that no cause why either the Papists may greatly triumph, or why the Protestants should despise Luther: For neither is the Doctrine of Luther touching the Sacrament so gross, that it maketh much with the Papists; nor yet so discrepant from us, that therefore he ought to be exploded. And tho a full reconciliation of this difference cannot well be made, (as some have gone about to do) yet let us give to Luther a moderate interpretation; and if we will not make things better, yet let us not make them worse than they be, and let us bear, if not with the manner, yet at least with the time of his teaching; and finally, let it not be noted in us, that we should seem to differ in Charity more (as Bucer said) than we do in Doctrine. But of this hereafter more (Christ willing) when we come to the History of John Frisli.

They which write the Life of Saints, use to describe and extoll their holy Life and godly Vertues, and also to set forth such Miracles as are wrought in them by God. Whereof there lacketh no plenty in M. Luther, but rather time lacketh to us, and opportunity to tarry upon them, having such haste to other things. Otherwise what a miracle might this seem to be, for one Man, and a poor Friar, creeping out of a blind Cloister, to be set up against the Pope, the Universal Bishop, and God's mighty Vice in Earth: to withstand all his Cardinals, yea, and to sustain the malice and hatred almost of the whole World being set against him; and to work that against the said Pope, Cardinals, and Church of Rome, which no King nor Emperor could ever do, yea, durst never attempt, nor all the learned Men before him could ever compass. Which miraculous work of God I recount nothing inferior to the miracle of David overthrowing great Goliath. Wherefore if Miracles do make a Saint, (after the Pope's definition) what lacketh in Martin Luther, but Age and Time only, to make him a Saint? who standing openly against the Pope, Cardinals, and Prelates of the Church, in number so many, in power so terrible, in practice so crafty, having Emperors and all the Kings of the Earth against him; who teaching and preaching Christ the face of nine and twenty years, could without touch of all his enemies, Lutherans and Zuinglians differ more in Charity than in Doctrine.

A notable miracle of God to overthrow the Pope by a poor Friar.

...mies, so quietly in his own Country where he was born, die and sleep in peace. In the which Martin Luther, first to stand against the Pope was a great Miracle; to prevail against the Pope, a greater; so to die untouched, may seem greatest of all, especially having so many Enemies as he had. Again, neither is it any thing less miraculous, to consider what manifold dangers he escaped besides: as when a certain Jew was appointed to come to destroy him by poison, yet was it so the will of God, that Luther had warning thereof before, and the face of the Jew sent to him by picture, whereby he knew him, and avoided the Peril.

The Sick-at Luther.

Another time, as he was sitting in a certain place upon his Stool, a great Stone there was in the Vault over his head where he did sit; which being said miraculously so long as he was sitting, as soon as he was up, immediately fell upon the place where he sat, able to have crush'd him all in pieces, if it had light upon him.

And what should I speak of his Prayers, which were so ardent unto Christ, that (as Melancthon writeth) they which stood under his Window where he stood praying, might see his tears falling and dropping down. Again, with such power he prayed, that he (as himself confesseth) had obtained of the Lord, that so long as he lived, the Pope should not prevail in his Country; after his death (said he) let them pray who could.

And as touching the marvellous works of the Lord, wrought here by Men, if it be true which is credibly reported by the Learned, what miracle can be more miraculous, than that which is declared of a young Man about Wittenberg, who, being kept bare and needy by his Father, was tempted by a way of Sorcery to bargain with a Devil, or a Familiar (as they call him) to yield himself body and soul into the Devil's power, upon condition to have his wish satisfied with Money. So that upon the same an Obligation was made by the young Man, written with his own blood, and given to the Devil: this case you see how horrible it was, and how damnable; now hear what followed. Upon the sudden wealth and alteration of this young Man, the matter first being noted, began afterward more and more to be suspected, and at length, after long and great admiration, was brought unto Martin Luther to be examined. The young Man, whether for shame or fear, long denied to confess, and would be known of nothing; yet God so wrought, being stronger than the Devil, that he uttered unto Luther the whole substance of the cause, as well touching the Money, as the Obligation. Luther understanding the matter, and pitying the lamentable state of the Man, willed the whole Congregation to pray, and he himself ceased not with his prayers to labour; so that the Devil was compelled at the last to throw in his Obligation at the window, and bad him take it again unto him. Which Narration, if it be so true, as certainly it is of him reported, I see not the contrary, but that this may well seem comparable with the greatest miracle in Christ's Church that was since the Apostles time.

Furthermore, as he was mighty in his Prayers, so in his Sermons; God gave him such a grace, that when he preached, they which heard him thought every one his own Temptation severely to be noted and touched. Whereof, when signification was given unto him by his Friends, and he demanded how that could be; mine own manifold temptations (said he) and experiences are the cause thereof. For this thou must understand (good Reader) that Luther from his tender years was much beaten and exercised with spiritual Conflicts, as Melancthon in describing his Life doth testify. Also Hieron. Wellerus, Scholar and Disciple of the said Martin Luther, recordeth, that he oftentimes heard Luther his Master thus report of himself, That he had been assailed and vexed with all kinds of temptations, saving only one, which was in Covetousness; with this Vice he was never (said he) in all his life troubled, nor once tempted.

And hitherto concerning the Life of Martin Luther, who lived till the year of his age sixty three, continued writing and preaching about twenty nine years. As touching the order of his death, the words of Melancthon be these:

In the year of our Lord 1546, and the 17th of February, Dr. Martin Luther sicked a little before Supper of his accustomed Malady, to wit of the oppression of humors in the orifice or opening of the Stomach, whereof I remember I have seen him oft diseased in this place. This Sicknes took him after Supper, with the which he vehemently contending, required feces into a By-chamber, and there he rested on his bed two hours, all which time his pains increased: And as Dr. Jonas was lying in his Chamber, Luther awaked, and prayed him to rise, and to call up Ambrose his Childrens Schoolmaster, to make fire in another Chamber. Into the which when he was newly entred, Albert Earl of Mansfield, with his Wife, and divers others, (whose names in these Letters for haste were not expressed) at that instant came into his Chamber. Finally, feeling his fatal hour to approach, before nine of the clock in the morning, Feb. 18. he commended himself to God with this devout Prayer:

The Prayer of Luther at his death.

*M*T heavenly Father, eternal and merciful God, thou hast manifested unto me thy dear Son, our Lord Jesus Christ; I have taught him, I have known him, I love him as my Life, my Health, and my Redemption; whom the Wicked have persecuted, maltreated, and with injury afflicted. Draw my Soul to thee.

The Prayer of Luther at his death

After this he said as ensueth, thrice: I commend my Spirit into thy hands, thou hast redeemed me, O God of Truth: God so loved the World, that he gave his only Son, that all those that believe in him should have life everlasting: John 3.

Having repeated oftentimes his prayers, he was called to God, unto whom so faithfully he commended his Spirit; to enjoy, no doubt, the blessed Society of the Patriarchs, Prophets, and Apostles in the Kingdom of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy-Ghost. Let us now love the memory of this Man, and the Doctrine that he hath taught. Let us learn to be modest and meek: let us consider the wretched Calamities and marvellous Changes, that shall follow this Misfall and doleful Chance. I beseech thee, O Son of God, crucified for us, and resurrected Emmanuel, govern, conserve, and defend thy Church. Hec Melancthon.

Fredericus Prince Elector died long before Luther, in the year of our Lord 1525; leaving no issue behind him, for that he lived a single life, and was never married: wherefore after him succeeded John Fredericus Duke of Saxony.

The death of
rick.

Mention was made a little before of the Ministers of Strasbourg, which because of their marriage were in trouble, and cited by the Bishop to appear before him, and there to be judged, without the precinct of the City of Strasbourg; whereas there had been a contrary order taken before between the Bishop and the City, that the Bishop should execute no judgment upon any, but under some of the Magistrates of the said City of Strasbourg. Whereupon the Senate and the Citizens taking into their hands the cause of these married Ministers, in defence of their own Right and Liberties, wrote (as is said) to their Bishop of Strasbourg, and caused the Judgment thereof a while to be stayed. By reason whereof the matter was brought at length before Cardinal Campeius, Legate, sent by Pope Clement to the Assembly of Nuremberg, Anno 1524.

The chief doer in this matter was one Thomas Murnerus, a Franciscan Friar, who had commenced a grievous complaint against the Senate and City of Strasbourg, before the said Cardinal Campeius. Wherefore the Senate, to purge themselves, sent their Embassadors, thus clearing their cause, and answering to their accusation: That they neither had been nor would be any Let to the Bishop, but had signified to him before by their Letters, that whatsoever he could lay against those married Priests, conform to the Law of God, they would be no stay, but rather a furtherance unto him to proceed in his action. But the Senate herein was not a little grieved, that the Bishop, contrary to the Order and Compact which was taken between him and them, did call the said Ministers out of the Liberties of their City; for so it was between them agreed, that no Ecclesiastical Person should be adjudged but under some Judge of their own City. But now contrary to their said agreement, the Bishops called those Ministers out of their Liberties; and so the Ministers, claiming the Right and Privilege of the City, were condemned, their cause being neither heard nor known. And now if the Senate should shew themselves any thing more sharp or rigorous unto those Ministers, claiming the Right of the City, the People, no doubt, would not take it well, but haply would rise up in some commotion against them in the quarrel and defence of their Franchises and Liberties.

And

And where it is objected, that they receive Priests and men of the Clergy into the Freedom and Protection of their City: to this they answered, That they did nothing herein, but that which was correspondent to the ancient usage and manner of the City before: and moreover, that it was the Bishops own request and desire made unto them so to do.

To this the Cardinal again, advising well the Letters of the Bishop, and the whole order of the matter which was sent unto him, declared, that he right well understood by the Letters sent, that the Ministers indeed (as the Embassadors said) were called out from the Freedom and Liberties of the City, and yet no order of Law was broken therein; forasmuch as the Bishop (said he) had there no less power and authority, than if he were his own Vicar Delegate, and therefore he desired them, that they would assist the Bishop in punishing the foresaid Ministers, &c.

After much other talk and reasoning, on both Parties, wherein the Ambassadors argued in defence of their Freedom, that the Judgment should not be transferred out of the City: Among other Communication, they inferred moreover, and declared, how in the City of Strasbourg were many, yea, the most part of the Clergy, which lived viciously and wickedly with their Strumpets and Harlots, whom they kept in their Houses, to the great offence of the People, shame to Christ's Church, and pernicious Example of others; and yet the Bishop would never once stir to see any punishing or correction thereof. Wherefore if the Senate (said the Ambassadors) should permit the Bishop to extend his Cruelty and Extremity against these married Ministers, for not observing the Bishop of Rome's Law, and leave the other notorious Whoremasters, which break the Law of God, to escape unpunished, doubtless it would redound to their great danger and peril, not only before God, but also among the Commons of their City, ready to rise upon them.

To this Campeius answered, What Composition or Bargain was betwixt the Bishop and them, he knew not, but surely the act of the one was manifest, and needed no great Tryal in Law of proving and confessing, and therefore they were sequestered and abandoned from the Communion of the Church, ipso facto. As for the other sort of them, which keep Harlots and Concubines, altho (said he) it be not well done, yet doth it not excuse the enormity of their Marriage. Neither was he ignorant, but that it was the manner of the Bishops of Germany, for Money to wink at Priests Lemans, and the same also was evil done indeed: And further, that the time should come when they shall be called to an account for the same: but yet nevertheless it is not sufferable that Priests therefore should have Wives. And if Comparison should be made (said he) much greater offence it were, a Priest to have a Wife, than to have and keep at home many Harlots. His Reason was this; for they that keep Harlots (said he) as it is naught that they do, so do they acknowledge their sin: the other perfwade themselves that they do well, and so continue still without Repentance, or Conscience of their Fact. All men (said he) cannot be chaste, as John the Baptist was; yet can it not be proved by any example, to be lawful for Priests, professing Chastity, to leave their single life, and to marry: no, not the Greeks themselves, which in Rights be differing from us, do give this Liberty to their own Priests to marry: wherefore he prayed them to give their aid to the Bishop in this behalf.

Whereunto the Ambassadors replied again, saying, That if he would first punish the Whoremasters, then might the Senate assist him the better in correcting the other: but the Cardinal was still instant upon them, that first they should assist their Bishop, and then if the Bishop would not punish Whoredom, he would come thither himself and see them punished accordingly.

This Cardinal Campeius, how he was sent by Pope Clement the sixth to the second Assembly or Dyet of Norrenberg, Anno 1524, and what was there done by the said Cardinal, is before signified. After this Council of Norrenberg, immediately followed another Sitting at Ratisbone, where were present Ferdinandus, Campeius, the Cardinal of Salzburg, the two Dukes of Bavaria, the Bishops of Trent and Ratisbone; also the Legats of the Bishops, Bamberg, Spire, Strasbourg, Augsburg, Constance, Basil, Erfing, Passawe, and Brixim. By whom in the said Assembly it was concluded;

K. Hen. 8.

That forasmuch as the Emperor, at the request of Pope Leo, had condemned by his publick Edit set forth at Worms, the Doctrine of Luther for erroneous and wicked; and also it was agreed upon in both the Assemblies of Norrenberg, that the said Edit should be obeyed of all men; they likewise, as the request of Cardinal Campeius, do will and command the foresaid Edit to be observed through all their Fines and Precincts: That the Gospel, and all other holy Scriptures, should be taught in Churches according to the Interpretation of the ancient Forefathers: That all they which receive any old Heresie before condemned, or teach any new thing consensuall, either against Christ, his blessed Mother, and holy Saints, or which may breed any occasion of Sedition, are to be punished according to the Tenour of the Edit aforesaid: That none be admitted to preach without the Licence of his Ordinary: That they which be already admitted, shall be examined how, and what they preach: That the Laws which Campeius is about to set forth for Reformation of manners, shall be observed: That in the Sacraments, in the Mass, and all other things, there shall be no Innovation, but all things to stand as in fore-time they did: That all they which approach to the Lord's Supper without Confession and Absolution, or do eat Flesh on days forbidden, or which do run out of their Order; also Priests, Deacons, and Sub-deacons, that be married, shall be punished: That nothing shall be printed without consent of the Magistrate: That no Book of Luther, or any Lutheran shall be printed or sold: That they of their Jurisdiction, which study in the University of Wittenberg, shall every one repair home within three Months after the publishing hereof, or else turn to some other place free from the Infection of Luther, under pain of confiscating all their Goods, and losing their Inheritance: That no Benefice, nor other office of teaching, be given to any Student of that University. Item, That certain Inquisitors sit for the same, be appointed to enquire and examine the Premises. Item, lest it may be said, that this Faction of Luther taketh his origin of the corrupt Life of Priests, the said Campeius, with other his Assistants in the said Convocation of Ratisbone, charged and commanded, that Priests live honestly, go in decent Apparel, play not the Merchant, hunt not the Taverners, be not covetous, nor take money for their Ministration; such as keep Concubines to be removed: the number also of Holy-days to be diminished, &c.

These things would Campeius have had Enacted in a full Council, and with the consents of all the Empire: but when he could not bring that to pass, by reason that the minds of divers were gone from the Pope; he was faine therefore to give the same ratified in this particular Conventicle, with the Assents of these Bishops above rehearsed.

These things thus hitherto discoursed, which fully may be seen in the Commentaries of John Sleiden, it remaineth next after the Story of Martin Luther, somewhat to adjoyn likewise touching the History of Zuinglius, and of the Helvetians. But before I come to the explication of this Story, it shall not be inconvenient, first to give some little touch of the Towns, called Pages, of these Helvetians, and of their League and Confederation first begun amongst them.

The History of the Helvetians or Switzers, how they first recovered their Liberty, and after were joyned in League together.

THE Helvetians, whom otherwise we call Switzers, are divided principally into thirteen Pages. The Names of whom are Tigurini, Bernotens, Lucernates, Uriani, Suicerfes, Unterwaldii, Tugiani, Glarantii, Basilienses, Soloduri, Friburgi, Scasufiani, Appenzelenses. Furthermore, to these be added seven other Pages, albeit not with such a full Bond as the other be, together conjoined; which be these: Rheti, Leptontii, Seduni, Veragri, Sangalli, Mullusiani, Rotensenses. Of these thirteen confederate Pages above recited, these three were the first, to wit, Urania, Suicerfes, and Sivani, or (as some call them) them) Unterwaldii, which joyned themselves together. If credit should be given to old Narrations, these three Pages or Valleys * first suffered great Servitude and Thralldom under cruel Rulers or Governors: insomuch that the Governour of Sylvania (a) required of one of the Inhabitants a yoke of his Oxen; which when the Townsmen denied to give him, the Ruler sent his servant by force to take his Oxen from him. This when the Servant was about to do, cometh the poor man's Son, and cutteth off one of his Fingers, and upon the same avoided. The Governour hearing this, taketh the poor man and putteth out his eyes.

At another time in the said Sylvania, as the good man of the Houle was absent abroad, the Governour which had then the rule of the Town, entering into the Houle, commanded the Wife to prepare for him a Bath, and to let him have his pleasure of her. Whereunto the being unwilling, deferred the Bath as long as she might, till the return of her Husband. To whom then the making her complaint, so moved his mind, that he, with his Axe or Hatchet which he had in his hand, flew upon the adulterous Ruler and slew him.

Another example of like violence is reported of the Ruler of Suicia and Sylvania, who, surprised with the like Pride and Didain against the poor Underlings, caused his Cap to be hanged upon a Pole, charging and commanding by his Servant, all that passed by to do obedience to his Cap. Which when one named William Tell refused to do, the Tyrant caused his Son to be tied, with an Apple (set upon his Head, and the Father with a Cross-bow, or a like Instrument, to shoot at the Apple. After long refusing, when the woful Father could not otherwise chuse, being by force constrained, but must level at the Apple; as God would, he mist the Child, and struck the Mark. This Tell being thus compelled by the Tyrant to shoot at his Son, had brought with him two Shafts; thinking that if he had struck the Child with one, the other he would have let drive at the Tyrant. Which being understood, he was apprehended and led to the Ruler's Houle: but by the way escaping out of the Boat between Urania and Brun, and passing through the Mountains with as much speed as he might lay in the way secretly as the Ruler should pass, where he discharged his Arrow at the Tyrant and slew him.

And thus were these cruel Governours utterly expelled out of these three Valleys or Pages afore said; and after that such order was taken by the Emperor Henricus the seventh, and also by the Emperor Lodovicus Duke of Bavaria, that henceforth no Judge should be set over them, but only of their own Company, and Town-dwellers. Ex Seb. Munster. Cosmog. lib. 3.

It followed after this, in the year of our Lord, 1315, that great Contention and War fell between Frederick Duke of Austria, and Ludovick Duke of Bavaria, striving and fighting the space of eight years together about the Empire. With Ludovick held the three Pages afore said; who had divers Conflicts with Lupoldus, Brother to the aforementioned Frederick Duke of Austria, fighting in his Brother's quarrel. As Lupoldus had reared a mighty Army of twenty thousand Footmen and Horsemen, and was come to Egrie, so to pass over the Mountains to subdue the Pages; he began to take advice of his Council, by what way or passage best he might direct his Journey towards the Switzers. Whereupon as they were busie in consulting, there stood a Fool by, named Kune de Stucken, which hearing their advice, thought also to shoot his Bolt withal, and told them, that their Council did not like him: For all you (quoth he) confide how we should enter into yonder Country; but none of you giveth any counsel how to come out again after we be entered. And in conclusion, as the Fool said, so they found it true. For when Lupoldus with his host had entered into the Streights and Valleys between the Rocks and Mountains, the Switzers with their Neighbours of Urania and Sylvania, lying in privy wait, had them at such advantage, and with tumbling down Stones from the Rocks, and sudden coming upon their Backs in blind Lanes, did so incumber them, that neither they had convenient standing to fight, nor room almost to fly away. By reason whereof a great part of Lupoldus Army there, being inclosed about the place called Morgarten, lost their lives, and many in the fight were slain. Lupoldus with them that remained, retired and escaped to Turgota. This Battel was fought Anno 1315, the sixteenth day of November.

After this, the Burgers of these three Villages, being continually vexed by Frederick Duke of Austria, for that they would not acknowledge him for Emperor, assembled themselves in the Town of Urania, Anno 1316, and there entered a mutual League and Bond of perpetual Society and Conjunction, joyning and swearing themselves, as in one Body of a Common-wealth, and publick Administration together. After that came to them Lucernates, then Tugani, after them the Tigurines, next to whom followed Bornates, the last almost of all were the Basiliens, then followed after the other seven Pages above recited.

And thus have ye the Names, the Freedom, and Consideration of these Switzers, or Cantons, or Pages of Helvetia, with the Occasions and Circumstances thereof, briefly expressed. Now to the purpose of our Story intended, which is to declare the success of Christ's Gospel and true Religion received among the Helvetians: also touching the Life and Doctrine of Zuinglius, and order of his Death, as here ensueth.

The Ails and Life of Zuinglius: and of receiving the Gospel in Switzerland.

IN the tractation of Luther's Story, mention was made before of Uldricus Zuinglius, who first abiding at Glaronna, in a place called then our Lord's Ermitage, from thence removed to Zurich about the year of our Lord 1519, and there began to teach, dwelling in the Minster among the Canons or Priests of that Close; using with them the same Rites and Ceremonies during the space of two or three years, where he continued reading and explaining the Scriptures unto the people with great travel, and no less dexterity. And because Pope Leo the same year had renewed his Pardons again through all Countries (as is above declared) Zuinglius zealously withstood the same, detecting the Abuses thereof by the Scriptures, and of other Corruptions reigning then in the Church, and so continued by the space of two years and more, till at length Hugo Bishop of Constance (to whose Jurisdiction Zurich then also did belong) hearing thereof, wrote his Letter to the Senate of the said City of Zurich, complaining grievously of Zuinglius; who also wrote another Letter to the Colledge of Canons, where Zuinglius was at the same time dwelling, complaining likewise of such new Teachers which troubled the Church, and exhorted them earnestly to beware, and to take diligent heed to themselves. And forasmuch as both the Pope and the Emperor's Majesty had condemned all such new Doctrine by their Decrees and Edicts, he willed them therefore to admit no such new Innovations of Doctrine, without the common consent of them to whom the same did appertain. Zuinglius hearing thereof, rewereth his cause to the judgment and hearing of the Senate, not refusing to render to them an account of his Faith. And for so much as the Bishop's Letter was read openly in the Colledge, Zuinglius directed another Letter to the Bishop again, declaring that the said Letter proceeded not from the Bishop, and that he was not ignorant who were the Authors thereof; desiring him not to follow their sinister Counsels: for that Truth (said he) is a thing invincible, and cannot be refuted. After the same tenour certain other of the City likewise wrote unto the Bishop, desiring him that he would attempt nothing that should be prejudicial to the liberty and free course of the Gospel: requiring moreover, that he would forbear no longer the filthy and infamous life of Priests, but that he would permit them to have their lawful Wives, &c. This was in the year of our Lord 1522.

Besides this, Zuinglius wrote also another Letter to the whole Nation of the Helvetians, admonishing them in no case to hinder the passage of sincere Doctrine, nor to infer any molestation to Priests that were married. For as for the Vow and Coaction of their single life, it came (saith he) of the Devil, and a devilish thing it is. And therefore whereas the said Helvetians had such a Right and Custom in their Towns and Pages, that when they received any new Priest into their Churches, they used to premonish him before to take his Concubine, lest he should attempt any misuse with their Wives and Daughters: he exhorted them that they would no less grant unto them to take their Wives in honest Matrimony, than to take Concubines and Harlots, against the Precept of God.

Thus as Zwingli continued certain years, labouring in the Word of the Lord, offence began to rise at this new Doctrine, and divers stepped up, namely the Dominick Friars on the contrary side, to preach and inveigh against him. But he, keeping himself ever within the Scriptures, protested that he would make good by the Word of God that which he had taught. Upon this, the Magistrates and Senate of Zurich sent forth their Commandment to all Priests and Ministers within their Dominion, to repair to the City of Zurich against the nine and twentieth day of January next ensuing (this was Anno 1523) there every one to speak freely, and to be heard quietly touching these Controversies of Religion, what could be said: directing also their Letters to the Bishop of Constance, That he would either make his repair thither himself, or else send his Deputy. When the day appointed came, the Bishop's Vicegerent, which was Joannes Faber, was also present. The Council first declaring the cause of this their Frequency and Assembly (which was for the Disputation newly risen about matters of Religion) required, that if any there had to object or infer against the Doctrine of Zwingli, he should freely and quietly declare and utter his mind.

Zwingli had disposed his matter before, and contrived all his Doctrine in a certain order of places, to the number of sixty seven Articles: which Articles he had published also abroad before, to the end that they which were disposed, might report thither the better prepared to the Disputation. When the Council had finished that which he would say, and had exhorted others to begin: then Faber, first entering the matter, began to declare the cause of his sending thither, and afterward would persuade, that this was no place convenient, nor time fit for the discussing of such matters by Disputation, but rather that the Cognition and Tractation thereof belonged to a General Council, which, he said, was already appointed, and now near at hand. Notwithstanding Zwingli still continued urging and requiring him, that if he had there any thing to say or to dispute, he would openly and freely utter his mind. To this he answered again, That he would confute his Doctrine by Writing. This done, with a few other words on both sides had to and fro, when no man would appear there to offer any Disputation, the Assembly brake, and was discharged. Whereupon the Senate of Zurich incontinent caused to be proclaimed through all their Dominion and Territory, that the Traditions of Men should be displaced and abandoned, and the Gospel of Christ purely taught out of the Old and New Testament. Anno 1523. ex Joan. Sleid. lib. 3.

When the Gospel thus began to take place, and to flourish in Zurich and certain other places of Helvetia, the year next following, Anno 1524, another Assembly of the Helvetians was convened at Lucerna, where this Decree was made on the contrary part: That no man should deride or condemn the Word of God, which had been taught now above a thousand and four hundred years heretofore: nor the Mass to be scorned, wherein the Body of Christ is consecrated, to the honour of God, and to the Comfort both of the quick, and the dead.

That they who are able to receive the Lords Body at Easter, shall confess their sins in Lent to the Priests, and do all other things, in the use and manner of the Church requireth.

That Rights and Customs of holy Church be kept.

That everyone obey his own proper Pastor and Curate, and receive the Sacraments of him, after the manner of holy Church, and pay him his yearly Duties.

That honour be given to Priests.

Item, to abstain from Flesh-eating on Fastings-days, and in Lent to abstain from Eggs and Cheese.

That no opinion of Luther be taught privily or openly, contrary to the received Determination of holy Church; and that in Taverns and at Table no mention be made of Luther, or any new Doctrine.

That Images and Pictures of Saints in every place be kept inviolate.

That Priests and Ministers of the Church be not compelled to render account of their Doctrine, but only to the Magistrate.

That due Aid and Supperation be provided for them, if any Communion do happen.

That no person deride the Reliques of the Holy Spirit, or of our Lady, or of St. Anthony.

Finally, That all the Laws and Decrees set forth by the Bishop of Constance, be observed.

These Constitutions whosoever shall transgress, let them be presented to the Magistrate, and Overseers to be set over them that shall so transgress.

After these things concluded thus at Lucerna, the Cantons of Helvetia together direct their publick Letter to the Tigurinus or men of Zurich; wherein they may much lament and complain of this new broached Doctrine which hath set all men together by the ears, through the occasion of certain rash and new fangled Heads which have greatly disturbed both the State of the Church, and of the Common-wealth, and have scattered the Seeds of Discord, whereas before time all things were well in quiet. And although this Senate said they, ought to have been looked to betime, so that they should not have suffered the Glory of Almighty God, and of the blessed Virgin, and other Saints to be dishonoured, but rather should have bestowed their Goods and Lives to maintain the same; yet notwithstanding they required them now to look upon the matter, which otherwise would bring to them Detraction both of Body and Soul: as for example, they might see the Doctrine of Luther, what Fruit it brought. The rude and vulgar People now (said they) could not be holden in, but would burst forth to all Licence and Rebellion, as hath appeared by sufficient Proofs of late; and like is to be feared also among themselves, and all by the occasion of Zwingli, and of Leo Juda, which so took upon them to expound the Word of God after their own Interpretation, opening thereby whole Doors and Windows to Discord and Diffension. Albeit of their Doctrine they were not certain what they did teach; yet what inconvenience followed upon their Doctrine, they had too much experience. For now all Fasting was laid down, and all days are alike to eat both Flesh and Eggs, as well one as another: Priests and religious persons both Men and Women brake their Vows, ran out of their order, and fell to marrying; God's Service was decayed, singing in the Church left, and Prayer ceased; Priests grew in contempt, Religious Men were thrust out of their Cloisters; Confession and Penance were neglected; so that men would not stick to presume to receive at the holy Altar, without any Confession made to the Priest before. The holy Mass derided and scorned; our blessed Lady, and other Saints blasphemed; Images plucked down and broken in pieces, neither was any honour given to the Sacrament. To make short, men now were grown unto such a Licence and Liberty, that uneth the Holy Ghost could be faith within the Priest's hands, &c.

The Disorder of all which things as it is of no small importance, so it was, said they, to them so grievous and lamentable, that they thought it their part to suffer the same no longer. Neither was this the first time (they said) of this their complaining, when in their former Assembly they sent unto them before the like Admonition, writing to them by certain of the Clergy, and craving their aid in the same, which seeing it is so, they did now again earnestly call upon them touching the Premises, desiring them to surcease from such doings, and to take a better way, continuing in the Religion of their old Ancestors which were before them. And if there were any such thing, wherein they were grieved and offended against the Bishop of Rome, the Cardinal, Bishops, or other Prelates, either for their Ambition in heaping, exchanging and selling the Dignities of the Church, or for their oppression in pillaging men's Purfes with their Indulgences, or else for their usurped Jurisdiction and Power, which they extend too far, and corruptly apply it to matters external and political, which only ought to serve in such cases as be spiritual: if these and such other Abuses were the causes, wherewith they were so grievously offended, they promised that, for the Correction and Reformation thereof, they would also themselves joyn their diligence and good will thereto, so far as themselves also did not a little mislike therewith, and therefore would confer their Councils together with them, how and by what way such Grievances might best be removed.

To this effect were the Letters of the Helvetians written to the Senate and Citizens of Zurich. Whereunto the Tigurines made their Answer again the one and twentieth day of March, the same year, in manner as followeth,

 The Letter of the Tigrines, answering again the letter of the Electors.*
 I first, * declaring, how their Ministers had laboured and travelled among them, teaching and preaching the Word of God unto them the space now of five years. Whole Doctrine at the first seemed to them very strange and novel, because they never heard the same before. But after that they understood and perceived the scope of that Doctrine only to tend to this, to set forth Christ Jesus unto us, to be the Pillar and Refuge of our Salvation, which gave his Life and Blood for our Redemption, and which only delivered us also final Misers from eternal death, and is the only Advocate of Mankind before God; they could no otherwise do, but with ardent affection receive to wholesome and joyful message.

 It will be hard for any Man to judge which is the true Doctrine. For the whole end and scope of the Pope's Doctrine, tendeth to sit up the honour and wealth of Man, as may appear by the Doctrine of Supremacy, of Conscience, of the Mass, of the Sacrament of the Altar, &c. All which do tend to the magnifying of Priests like as Purgatory, Obsequies, Pardons, and such other serve for their profit. Contrariwise, the teaching of the Protestants, as well touching Justification, original Sin, as also the Sacraments and Invocation, and all other such like, tend only to the setting up of Christ alone, and taking down of Man.*

The holy Apostles and faithful Christians, after they had received the Gospel of Christ, did not fall out by and by in debate and variance, but lovingly agreed and consented together: and so they trusted (said they) that they should do, if they would likewise receive the Word of God, setting aside Mens Doctrines and Traditions dissident from the same.

Whatsoever Luther or any other Man doth teach, whether it be right or wrong, it is not for the names of the Persons, why the Doctrine which they teach, should be either evil or well-judged upon, but only for that it agreeth with, or disagreeeth from the Word of God: for that were but to go by affection, and were prejudicial to the Authority of the Word of God, which ought to rule Man, and not to be measured by Man.

And if Christ only be worshipped, and Men taught solely to repose their confidence in him; yet neither doth the blessed Virgin, nor any Saint else, receive any injury thereby, who being here in Earth, received their Salvation only by the Name of him.

And whereas they charge their Ministers with wresting the Scripture after their own interpretation, God had shined up such Light now in the hearts of Men, that the most part of their City have the Bible in their hand, and diligently peruse the same: so that their Preachers cannot so wind the Scriptures awry, but that they thickly be perceived. Wherefore there is no danger why they should fear any Sects or Factions in them; but rather such Sects are to be objected to those, who for their gain and dignity, writ the Word of God after their own Affections and Appetites.

And whereas they, and other, have accused them of Error, yet was there never Man that could prove any Error in them: Altho divers Bishops of Constance, of Basil, of Curiake, with divers Universities besides: Also they themselves have been sundry times desired so to do; yet to this present day neither they, nor ever any other so did; neither were they, nor any of all the foresaid Bishops, at their last Assembly, being requested to come, so gentle to repair unto them, save only the Schaffhusians and Sangallians. In the which foresaid Assembly of theirs, all such as were then present, considering thoroughly the whole case of the matter, concended together with them.

And if the Bishops haply will object again, and say, that the Word of God ought not so to be handled of vulgar people; they answered the same not to stand with equity and reason. For albeit it did belong to the Bishops Office, to provide that the Sheep should not go astray; and most convenient it were that by them they should be reduced into the way again; yet because they will not see to their charge, but leave it undone, referring all things to the Fathers and to Councils: therefore right and reason it is, that they themselves should hear and learn, not what Man doth determine, but what Christ himself doth command in the Scripture. Neither have their Ministers given any occasion of this division; but rather it is to be imputed to such, which for their own private lucre and preferments, contrary to the Word of the Lord, do seduce the people into Error, and grievously offending God, do provoke him to plague them with manifold Calamities. Who, if they would renounce the greediness of their own gain, and would follow the pure Doctrine of his Word, seeking not the Will of Man, but what is the Will of God, no doubt but they should soon fall to agreement.

* As for the eating of Flesh and Eggs; altho it be free to all Men, and forbidden to none by Christ; yet they have set forth a Law to restrain such intemperance and uncharitable offence of other.

 It will be the Pope's Law then, that no Man should eat Flesh, or Eggs, nor any other white meat; wherein it may seem to be verified which St. Paul doth prophesy, 1 Tim. 4. In the latter days certain shall depart from the Faith, hearkning to the Doctrine of Devils, forbidding to marry, and to eat, &c.*

And as touching Matrimony, God is himself the Author thereof, who hath left it free for all Men. Also Paul willeth a Minister of the Church to be the Husband of one Wife.

And seeing that Bishops for Money permit their Priests to have Concubines, which is contrary both to God's Law, and to good example; why then might not they as well obey God in permitting lawful Matrimony which he hath ordained, as to resist God in forbidding the same? The like is to be said also of Women vowing chastity; of whom this they judge, and suppose, that such kind of Vows and coacted Chastity, are not available nor allowed before God: and seeing that Chastity is not all Mens gift, better it were to marry, (after their judgments) than filthily to live in single life.

As for Monasteries, and other houses of Canons, they were first given for relief only of the poor and needy; whereas now they who inhabit them are wealthy, and able to live of their own Patrimony in such sort, as many times some one of them hath so much, as well might suffice a great number. Wherefore it seemeth to them not inconvenient, that those goods should be converted again to the use of the poor: Yet nevertheless they have therein such moderation, that they have permitted the inhabitants of those Monasteries to enjoy the possessions of their goods, during the term of their natural Life, lest any should have cause of just complaint.

Ornaments of Churches serve nothing to God's Service; but this is well agreeing to the Will and Service of God, that the poor should be succoured. So Christ commanded the young Man in the Gospel that was rich, not to hang up his Riches in the Temple, but to sell them, and distribute them to the needy.

The Order of Priesthood they do not condemn; such Priests as will truly discharge their duty, and teach soundly, they do magnify. As for the other Rabble, which serve to no publick Commodity, but rather damnify the Commonwealth, if the number of them were diminished by little and little, and their livings put to better use, they doubted not but it were a service well done to God. Now whether the singing and Prayers of such Priests be available before God, it may be doubted, forasmuch as many of them understand not what they say, or sing, but only for hire of Wages do the same.

As for secret Confession, wherein Men do detect their sins in the Priests ear, of what virtue this confession is to be esteemed, they leave it in suspense. But that confession, whereby repenting sinners do fly to Christ, our only Intercessor, they recount not only to be profitable, but also necessary to all troubled Consciences. As for satisfaction, which Priests do use, they reckon it but a practice to get Money, and the same to be not only erroneous, but also full of impiety. True penance and satisfaction is, for a Man to amend his life.

The Orders of Monks, come only by the invention of Man, and not by the institution of God.

And as touching the Sacraments, such as be of the Lord's Institution, neither do they despise, but receive with all reverence, neither do suffer the same to be despised of any person, nor to be abused otherwise than becometh; but to use rightly according to the precept rule of God's Word. And so with the like reverence they use the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according as the Word prescribeth, not, as many do abuse it, to make of it an Oblation and a Sacrifice.

 It will be the Pope's Law then, that no Man should eat Flesh, or Eggs, nor any other white meat; wherein it may seem to be verified which St. Paul doth prophesy, 1 Tim. 4. In the latter days certain shall depart from the Faith, hearkning to the Doctrine of Devils, forbidding to marry, and to eat, &c.*

carriers.

And if the Messengers sent to them of the Clergy, in their Letters mentioned, can justly charge them with any hindrance, or any error, they will be ready either to purge themselves, or to satisfy the offence. And if they cannot, then reason would that these Messengers of the Clergy should hereafter look better to their doings, and to their Doctrine, and to cease from such untrue slanders and contumelies.

The only

Finally, Whereas they understand by their Letters how detestable they are to have the Pope's Oppressions and Exactions, and usurped Power abolished, they are right glad thereof and joyful, supposing that the same can by no means be brought to pass, except the Word of God only and simply be received. For otherwise, so long as Mens Laws and Constitutions shall stand in force, there will be no place of Reformation. For by the preaching of God's Word, their estimation and dignity must needs decay: and that they well perceive, and therefore by all means do provide how to stop the course of the Word: and because they see themselves too weak to bring their purpose about, they fly to the aid of Kings and Princes. For the necessary Remedy whereof, if they shall think good to join their consent, there shall nothing be lacking in their behalf, what they are able either in counsel or goods to do in the matter: declaring moreover, that this should have been seen to long before. Which being so, they prayed and desired them to accept in good part, and diligently to expound that which they did write. As for their own part, they required nothing else more, than peace both between them and all Men. Neither was it ever their intent to stir any thing that should be prejudicial against their League and Band agreed upon between them. But in this cause which concerneth their eternal Salvation, they can do no otherwise but as they have done, unless their error by learning might be proved and declared unto them.

The Tigurines
will be the Scriptures.

Wherefore, as they did before, so now they desire again, that if they think this their Doctrine to be repugnant to the Holy Scripture, they will gently shew and teach them their error, and that before the end of the month of May next ensuing: for so long they will abide waiting for an answer, as well from them, as from the Bishop of Constance, and also from the University of Basil. And thus much containeth the Answer of the Tigurines unto the Letter of their other Colleagues of Helvetia.

The Bishop of Constance answereth
the Tigurines
by writing.

In the mean time, as this passed on, and the month of May, above mentioned, was now come, the Bishop of Constance with the advice of his Council about him, did answer the Tigurines, as he was requested of them to do, in a certain Book first written, and afterward printed; wherein he declareth what Images and Pictures those were, which the prophane Jews and Gentiles in the old-time did adore, and what Images these be which the Church hath from time to time received and admitted; and what difference there is between those Idols of the Jews and Gentiles, and these Images of the Christians. The conclusion hereof was this: that whereas the Scripture speaketh against Images, and willett them not to be suffered, that is to be understood of such Images and Idols, as the Jews and Idolatrous Gentiles did use: yet nevertheless such Images and Pictures as the Church hath received, are to be used and retained.

From this he entrench next into the discourse of the Mals, where he proveth, by divers and sundry Testimonies, both of the Pope's Canons and Councils, the Mals to be a Sacrifice and Oblation.

The Book of the Bishop of Constance

Senate of Zurich, in defense of the Mals and Images.

This Book being thus compiled and written, he sent it unto the Senate of Zurich, about the beginning of June, willing and exhorting them by no manner of means to suffer their Images, or the Mals to be abrogated; and shortly after he published the said Book in print, and sent it to the Priests and Canons of the Minister of Zurich, requiring them to follow the custom of the Church received, and not to suffer themselves otherwise to be persuaded by any Man.

The Senate again, answering to the Bishop's Book, about the mid of August, did write unto him: first, declaring that they had read over and over again his Book with all diligence: The which Book, so far as the Bishop had divulged abroad in print, they were therefore right glad, because the whole World thereby might judge between them the better. After this, they explained unto him the Judgment and Doctrine of their Ministers and Preachers: and finally, by the authority and testimonies of the Scripture, convinced his Opinion, and proved the Doctrine of his Book to be false. But before they sent their Answer to him, about the 13th day of June, they commanded all the Images, as well within the City as through their Dominions, to be taken down and burned quietly, and without any tumult. A few months after an Order was taken in the said City of Zurich, between the Canons of the Church and City, for disposing the Lands and Possessions of the College.

It would grow to a long discourse, to comprehend all things by order of circumstance, that happened among the Helvetians upon this new alteration of Religion; but briefly, to contract, and to run over the chief Specialities of the matter, here is first to be noted, that of the Helvetians which were confederate together in the 13 pages, chiefly, fix there were which most disdained and malign'd this Religion of the Tigurines: to wit, Lucernates, Urians, Suitenses, Unterwaldians, Tugians, Friburgenses; these in no case could be reconciled. The rest flew themselves more favourable. But the other, which were their Enemies, conceived great grudge, and raised many slanderous reports and false rumors against them, and laid divers things to their charge: as, first, for refusing to join their consent to the publick League of the other Pages with Franceis the French King: then for dissenting from them in Religion: and thirdly, for refusing to stand to the Popish Decree made the Year before at Ratisbone, by Ferdinandus, and other Bishops above mentioned. They laid moreover to their accusation, for aiding the Vuolsuenses their Neighbours, against Ferdinandus their Prince; which was false. Also for joining league secretly with other Cities, without their knowledge; which was likewise false.

Item, That they should intend some secret Conspiracy against them, and invade them with War; which was untrue as the rest. Many other quarrels besides they pretended against the Tigurines, which were all false and railing slanders: as that they should teach and preach, That Mary the Mother of Christ had more Sons; and that James the younger, the Apostle, did die for us, and not Christ himself. Against these and such other untruths, being meer matters of cavillation and slander, the Tigurines did fully and amply purge and acquit themselves by writing, and did expoliate vehemently with them, not only for these false and wrongful suspicions, of their parts undeceived, but also for other manifold Injuries received and born at their hands, among which other Wrongs and Injuries, this was one; that the Burghmasters of Turgovia had apprehended a certain Preacher, named Joannes Oxlinus, and led him home as Prisoner unto his house; being taken within the precinct and limits of the City of Zurich, contrary to Law and Order.

Finally, After much discoursing, wherein they in a long Letter declared their diligence and fidelity at all times, in keeping their League, and maintaining the liberty and dignity of their Country; as touching the cause of Religion, if that were all the matter of their offence, they offered themselves willing to hear, and more glad to amend, if any could prove any error in them by the Scripture. Otherwise if none so could, or would prove wherein they did err by the Word of God, they could not, they said, alter any thing in the state of that Religion wherein their Consciences were already staid by the Word of God and sealed, whatsoever peril or danger should happen to them for the same.

Altho here was no cause why these Pages or Cantons, which were so confederate together in the League of Peace, should disagree amongst themselves: yet herein we may see the course and trade of the World, that when difference of Religion beginneth a little to break the knot of Amity, by and by how Friends be turned to Foes, what suspicions do arise, what quarrels and grudges do follow, how nothing there liketh Men, but every thing is taken in the worst part; small Motes are made Mountains, Virtues made Vices, and one Vice made a thousand, and all for lack only of a little good will betwixt Party and Party. For as Love and Charity commonly among Men, either covereth or seeth not the Faults of their Friends, so Hatred and

Disdain,

K. Hen. 8.

Disdain, taking all things to blame, can find nothing in their Foes that they can like. And thus did it happen between these good Men of Zurich, and these other Suitzers above mentioned.

The Maf with all its Ceremonies put down in Zurich.

A Law in Zurich made against Adultery.

Disputation at Baden in Helvetia.

Theam or Propositions propounded in the Disputation at Baden.

Eckius stoutly defended. Oecolampadius against Eckius. Zuinglius exulteth himself for not coming to the Disputation.

Disputation at Bern in Helvetia.

Godly Laws of Disputation.

These Letters of the Tigurnines to the other Cantons, were written upon the occasion of their apprehending the Preacher, Joannes Olinius above-mentioned, Januar. 4. 1525. And in the month of April next following, the Magistrates and Senate of the said City of Zurich, commanded the Maf, with all the Ceremonies and Appurtenances thereof, to be put down, as well within the City, as without throughout all their Jurisdiction: and instead thereof was placed the Lord's Supper, the reading of the Prophets, Prayer, and Preaching. Also a Law was made against Whoredom, and Adultery, and Judges ordained to hear the Causes of Matrimony. Anno 1525. Ex Comment. Sleid. lib. 4.

All this while the Gospel was not yet received in any other Page of Helvetia, but only in Zurich. Wherefore the other 12 Pages, or Towns, appointed among themselves concerning a Meeting or a Disputation to be had at Baden: where were present among the Divines, Joannes Faber, Eckius, and Murnerus above mentioned. The Bishops also of Lucerna, Basil, Constanz, and Laufanna, sent thither their Legats. The Conclusions there propounded were these.

That the true Body and Blood of Christ is in the Sacrament.

That the Maf is a Sacrifice for the quick and dead.

That the blessed Virgin, and other Saints, are to be invoked as Mediators and Intercessors.

That Images ought not to be abolished.

That there is a Purgatory.

Which Conclusions or Assertions, Eckius took upon him stoutly to defend. Against him reasoned Oecolampadius, (who was then chief Preacher at Basil) with certain other more. Zuinglius at that time was not there present, but by writing confuted the Doctrine of Eckius; declaring withal the causes of his absence: which were for that he durst not, for fear of his life, commit himself unto the hands of Lucernates, Urants, Sultii, Untervaldii, and Tigiani, his Enemies: and that he refused not to dispute, but the place only of the disputation: exclaiming moreover that he was not permitted of the Senate to come: nevertheless if they would assign the place of disputation, either at Zurich, or at Berne, or at Sangallum, thither he would not refuse to come. Briefly, the conclusion of the disputation was this, that all should remain in that Religion which hitherto they had kept, and should follow the Authority of the Council, neither should admit any other new Doctrine within their Dominions, &c. This was in the month of June, the said year above-mentioned.

As the time proceeded, and disputation about Religion increased, it followed the next year after, Anno 1527, in the month of December, that the Senate and People of Berne, (whose power among all the Suitzers chiefly excelleth) considering how neither they could have the acts of the Disputation at Baden communicated unto them, and that the variance about Religion still more and more increased, assigned another Disputation within their own City, and sending forth writings thereof, called unto the same all the Bishops bordering near about them, as the Bishops of Constance, Basil, Seduna, Laufanna; warning them both to come themselves, and to bring their Divines with them, or else to lose all such positions as they had lying within the bounds of their precinct. After this they appointed out certain Ecclesiastical Persons of their Jurisdiction to dispute, prescribing and determining the whole Disputation to be decided only by the Authority of the Old and New Testament. To all that would come thither, they granted free conduct. Also they appointed, that all things there should be done modestly, without injury and brawling words; and that every one should have leave to speak his mind freely, and with such deliberation, that every Man's saying might be received by the Notary, and penned: with this proviso made before, that whatsoever there should be agreed upon, the same should be ratified, and observed through all their Dominions: and to the intent Men might come thither better prepared before, they propounded in publick writing, ten Conclusions in the said Disputation to be defended of their Ministers by the Scriptures; which Ministers were, Franciscus Colmus, and Beriboldus Hallerus. The Theams or Conclusions were these.

1. That the true Church, whereof Christ is the Head, riseth out of God's Word, and periseth in the same, and beareth the voice of no other.

2. That the same Church maketh no Laws without the Word of God.

3. That Traditions, ordained in the Name of the Church, do not bind, but so far forth as they be consonant to God's Word.

4. That Christ only hath made satisfaction for the sins of the World: and therefore if any Man say there is any other way of Salvation, or merit to put away sin, the same denieth Christ.

5. That the Body and Blood of Christ cannot be received really and corporally, by the Testimony of the Scripture.

6. That the use of the Maf, wherein Christ is present and offered up to his Heavenly Father, for the Quick and the Dead, is against the Scripture, and contumelious to the Sacrifice which Christ made for us.

7. That Christ only is to be invoked, as the Mediator and Advocate of Mankind to God the Father.

8. That there is no place to be found in the holy Scripture, wherein Souls are purged after this Life: and therefore all those Prayers and Ceremonies, yearly Diriges and Obits, which are belloyed upon the dead; also Lamps, Tapers, and such other things, profit nothing at all.

9. That to set up any Picture or Image to be worshipped, is repugnant to the Holy Scripture: and therefore, if any such be erected in Churches for that intent, the same ought to be taken down.

10. That Matrimony is prohibited to no state or order of Men, but for elchewing of Fornication generally is commanded and permitted to all Men by the Word of God. And so far as all Fornicators are excluded, by the testimony of Scripture, from the Communion of the Church, therefore this unchaste and filthy single Life of Priests, is most of all inconvenient for the Order of Priesthood.

When the Senate and People of Berne had sent abroad their Letters with these Themes and Conclusions to all the Helvetians, exhorting them both to send their learned Men, and to suffer all other to pass safely through their Countries: the Lucernates, Uranties, Sultians, Untervaldians, Tigians, Glarant, Solothurnians, and they of Friburg, answered again by contrary Letters, exhorting and requiring them in any case to desist from their purposed enterprise: putting them in remembrance of their League and compulsion made, and also of the Disputation of Baden above-mentioned, of the which Disputation they were themselves (they said) the first beginners and authors: saying moreover, that it was not lawful for any Nation or Province to alter the state of Religion, but the same to belong to a General Council: wherefore they desired them that they would not attempt any such wicked act, but continue in the Religion which their Parents and Elders had observed: and in fine thus in the end of their Letters they concluded, that they would neither send, nor suffer any of their learned Men to come, nor yet grant safe conduct to any others to pass through their Country. To this and such-like effect tended the Letters of these Suitzers above-named.

All which notwithstanding, the Lords of Bern proceeding in their intended purpose, upon the day prescribed (which was Jan. 7.) began their Disputation. Of all the Bishops before signified (which were assigned to come) there was not one present. Nevertheless the City of Basil, Zurich, and Schaffuse, and Abbecella, Sangallum, Mulhusa, with the Neighbours of Rhetia, also they of Strasburg, Ulms, Aurburg, Lindaw, Constance, and Ypse, sent thither their Embassadors.

The Doctors above-mentioned, of the City of Bern, began the Disputation. Whereat the same time were present Zuinglius, Oecolampadius, Bucerus, Capito, Blaurotus, with other more: all which defended the affirmative of the Conclusions propounded. On the contrary side, of them which were the Opponents, the Chiefman was Conradus Trugerus a Frier Augustine: who to prove his Assertion, when he was driven to shift out of the Scripture to seek help of other Doctors, and the Moderators of the Disputation would not permit the same, (being contrary to the order before appointed) he departed out of the place, and would dispute no more.

Theams to be disputed.

The Letters of the Suitzers to the Senate and People of Bern.

Ex Com. 10. Sleid. lib. 4.

The disputation begins. The parties present. The party opponents. The Pope's Doctrine cannot abide the trial of the Scriptures.

The Disputation endured 19 days; in the end whereof it was decided by the assent of the most part, that the Councils there disputed, were consonant to the truth of God's Word, and should be ratified not only in the City of Berne, but also proclaimed by the Magistrates in sundry other Cities near adjoining: Furthermore, That Masses, Altars, and Images, in all places, should be abolished.

At the City of Constance, certain things began to be altered a little before. Where also, among other things, Laws were made against Fornication and Adultery, and all in profit or dishonest Company; whereas the Canons (as they are called) of the Church taking great grief and displeasure, departed the City. In the said City was then Teacher, Ambrosius Blaurerius, a learned Man and born of a noble Stock, who had been a Monk a little before, professed in the Monastery of Alperpique, in the Duchy of Wittenburg, belonging to the Dominion of Ferdinandus. Which Blaurerius, by reading of Luther's Works, and having a good Wit, had changed a little before his Religion, and also his Coat, returning again home unto his Friends; and when his Abbot would have had him again, and wrote earnestly to the Senate of Constance for him, he declared the whole case of the matter in writing, propounding withal, certain conclusions, whereupon he was content (as he said) to return. But the conditions were such, that the Abbot was rather willing and contented, that he should remain still at Constance, and so he did.

After this Disputation thus concluded at Berne, (as hath been said) the Images and Altars, with Ceremonies and Masses, were abolished at Constance.

They, of Gien also, for their parts were not behind, following likewise the example of the City of Berne, in extinguishing Images and Ceremonies. By reason whereof the Bishop and Clergy there left and departed the City in no small anger.

The Beraters, after they had redressed with them the state of Religion, they renounced the League made before with the French King, refusing and forsaking his warly stipend whereby they were bound at his call to feed his Wars; following therein the example of the Tigurines, which before had done the like, and were contented only with their yearly Pension that the King payeth to every Page of the Helvetians, to keep peace.

* The day and year when this Reformation with them began, from Popery to true Christianity, they caused in a Pillar to be engraven with golden Letters, for a perpetual memory to all Posterity to come. This was Ann. 1528.

After that the rumor of this Disputation and Alteration of Berne, was noised in other Cities and Places abroad, but the Ministers of Strasbourg, encouraged by this occasion, began likewise to affirm and teach, that the Mass was wicked, and a great blasphemy against God's holy Name, and therefore was to be abrogated, and instead thereof the right use of the Lord's Supper to be restored again. Which, unless they could prove by the manifest Testimonies of the Scripture to be true, they would refuse no manner of punishment. On the contrary part, the Bishop of Rome's Clergy did hold and maintain, that the Mass was good and holy; whereupon kindled great contention on both sides: which when the Senate and Magistrates of the City would have brought to a Disputation, and could not, because the Priests would not condescend to any reasoning; therefore seeing they so accused the other, and yet would come to no trial of their cause, the said Magistrates commanded them to silence. The Bishop in the mean while ceased not with his Letters and Messengers daily to call upon the Senate, desiring the Senate to persevere in the ancient Religion of their Elders, and to give no ear to those new Teachers, declaring what danger and peril it would bring upon them.

The Senate again desired him, as they had done oftentimes before, that such things which appertained to the true Honour and Worship of God, might be set forward, and all other things, which tended to the contrary, might be removed and taken away, for that properly belonged to his Office to see to: But the Bishop, still driving them off with delays, pretended to call an Assembly for the same, appointing also time and place for the hearing and discussing of those Controversies, where indeed nothing was performed at all: but with his Letters he did often sollicite them to surcease their enterprize, sometimes by way of intreating, sometimes with menacing words terrifying them; and at last, seeing he could nothing by that way prevail, he turned his suit to the Assembly of the Empire, which was then at Spires collected, intreating them to set in a foot, and to help what they could with their Authority.

They, ready to satisfy the Bishop's request, sent a solemn Embassy to the Senate and Citizens of Strasbourg, about December the year above said, requiring them not to put down the Mass; for neither it was, said they, in the power of the Emperor, nor of any other Estate, to alter the ancient Religion received from their Forefathers, but either by a General, or by a Provincial Council; which Council if they supposed to be far off, at least that they would take a pause till the next sitting of the Empire, which should be with speed: where their Requests being propounded and heard, they should have such reasonable answer, as should not miscontent them: For it was (said they) against all Law and Reason, for a Private Magistrate to infringe and dissolve those things, which by general consent of the whole World have been agreed upon: and therefore good reason required, that they should obtain so much at their hands, or else if they should obstinately proceed in this their attempt, so with force and violence to work as they began, it might fortune, the Emperor, their supreme Magistrate under God, and also Ferdinandus his Deputy, would not take it well, and so should be compelled to seek such Remedy therein, as they would be sorry to use. Wherefore their request was, and advice also, that they should weigh the matter diligently with themselves and follow good counsel: who in so doing, should not only glad the Emperor, but also work that which should redound chiefly to their own commendation and safety.

Besides the Messengers thus sent from the Council of Spires, the Bishop also of Hildesheim had been with them a little before, exhorting them in the Emperor's Name after like manner. Neither did the Bishop of Strasbourg also cease with his Messengers and Letters daily to labour his Friends there, and especially such of the Senators as he had to him bound by any fealty, or otherwise by any Gifts or Friendship, that, so much as in them did lie, they should uphold the Mass, and gainstand the contrary proceeding of the other.

The Senate of Strasbourg in the mean time, seeing the matter did so long hang in controversy the space now of two Years, and the Preachers daily and instantly calling upon them for a Reformation; and suit also being made to them of the Citizens, assembled their great and full Council to the number of 300 (as in great matters of importance they are accustomed to do) and there with themselves debated the case, declaring on the one side, if they abolished the Mass, what danger they should incur by the Emperor: On the other side, if they did not, how much they should offend God; and therefore, giving them respite to consult, at the next meeting required them to declare their advice and sentence in the matter. When the day came that every Man should say his mind; so it fell out, that the Voices and Judgments of them which went against the Mass, prevailed. Whereupon immediately a Decree was made, the twentieth of February, Ann. 1529, that the Mass should be suspended and laid down, till the time that the adversary part could prove by good Scripture, the Mass to be a service available and acceptable before God.

This Decree being established by the consent of the whole City, the Senate efforts commanded the same to be proclaimed, and to take full place and effect, as well within the City, as also without, so far as their Limits and Dominion did extend; and afterward by Letters certified their Bishop touching the doing thereof. Who hearing this news, as heavy to his heart as lead, did signify to them again, how he received their Letters, and how he understood by them the effect and sum of their doings: all which he was enforced to digest with such patience as he could, tho they went fore against his stomach, seeing for the present time he could no otherwise chuse: hereafter would serve, he said, he would see therunto, according as his Charge and Office should require.

Thus how the Mass was overthrown in Zurich, in Berne, and Geneva, and in Strasbourg, you have heard.

Kitten, 8.
Reformation on beginneth at Basil.
Joannes Oecolampadi.

heard. Now what followed in Basil, remaineth likewise to understand. In this City of Basil was Oecolampadius Preacher (as is above signified) by whose diligent labour and travel, the Gospel began there to take such Fruit, that great diffention there also arose among the Citizens about Religion, and especially about the Mals. Whereupon the Senate of Basil appointed, That after an open Disputation it should be determined by Voices, what were to be done therein. This notwithstanding the Papists, still continuing in their former purpose, began more stoutly to inveigh against the other part; and because they were so distressed by the Magistrate without punishment, it was therefore doubted by the Commons, that they had some privy Maintainers among the Senators. Whereupon certain of the Citizens were appointed, in the name of the whole Commons, to sue to the Senators, and to put them in remembrance of their promise. Whole Suit and Request was this, That those Senators which were the aiders and supporters of the Papists, might be displaced, for that it did as well tend to the contempt of their former Decree there made, as also to the publick disturbance of the City. But when this could not be obtained of the Senate, the Commons, upon Febr. 8. the year above said, assembled themselves in the gray-Friers Church, and there, considering with themselves upon the whole matter, repaired again with their Suit into the Senate, but not in such humble wise as before: And therewithal gathered themselves in the publick places of the City, to fortify the same, albeit as yet without Armour. The same evening the Senate sent them word, That at their request they granted, that those Senators, although remaining still in office, yet should not sit in the Council what time any matter of Religion should come in talk.

Religion in Basil determined by the Commons.

By this Answer the Commons, gathering that the whole State was governed by a few, took threat grief and displeasure, protesting openly, that they would take counsel by themselves hereafter, what they had to do, not only in cases of Religion, but also in other matters of Civil Government, and forthwith took them to Armour, keeping the Towers and Gates, and other convenient places of the City with Watch and Ward, in as forcible wise, as if the Enemy had been at hand.

The next day the Senate, requiring respite to deliberate, was contented to commit the matter to them, whom the Commons before had sent as suiters unto them. Which offer the Citizens did not refuse, but with this condition, that these Senators, which were guilty, should in the mean season follow their Plea, as private Persons, upon their own private Costs and Charges: the other, which defended the publick Cause for the behoof of their Posterity, should be maintained by the publick Charges of the City. This the Senate was glad to grant unto, with some other like matters of lighter weight, to appease their rage.

It hapned the very same day, that certain of the Citizens, such as were appointed to go about the City for the viewing of things, came into the high Church, where one of them thrusting at a certain Image with his Staff, effoons it fell down and brake. By the occasion whereof, other Images also in like sort were served after the same devotion. But when the Priests came running to them, which seemed to be greatly offended therewith, they, because they would not pass their Commission, laid their hands and departed.

It followed upon this, that when word hereof was brought to the Citizens which stood in the Market-place, the matter being made worse unto them than it was, they incontinent discharged out 300 armed Men, to rescue their Fellows in the Church, supposing them to be in danger. Who coming to the Church, and not finding their Fellows there, and all things quiet, have only a few Images broken down; they likewise left they should have lost all their labour, threw down all the other Idols and Images which they found there standing; and so passing through all Churches in the City, did there also the like: and when certain of the Senate came forth to appease the tumult, the Citizens said, that which you have flood about these three years, consulting and advising whether it were best to be done or not, that shall we dispatch in one hour, that from henceforth never more contention shall grow between us for Images: and so the Senate permitted them free leave, without any more resistance: and twelve Senators were displaced from their order, albeit without note of reproach or dishonour. Also a Decree the same time was made, that as well within the City of Basil, as without, throughout all their Jurisdiction, the Mals with all Idols should be abandoned: and further, that in all such matters and cases as concerned the Glory of God, and the Affairs of the publick Wealth, besides the number of the other Senators, 260 of the Burgers or Citizens, should be appointed out of every Ward in the City to sit with them in Council. These Decrees being established, after they had kept watch and ward about the City 3 days and nights, every one returned again to his house quiet and joyfull, without any blood or stroke given, or anger wreaked, but only upon the Images.

On the 3d day, which was Ashwednesday, (as the Pope's ceremonial Church doth call it) all the wooden Images were distributed among the poor of the City, to serve them for firewood. But when they could not well agree in dividing the prey, but fell to brawling among themselves, it was agreed that the said Images should be burnt altogether: so that in nine great heaps all the Stocks and Idols there the same day were burnt to ashes before the great Church door. And thus by God's Ordinance it came to pass, that the same day wherein the Pope's Priests are wont to show forth all their mourning, and do mark Mens foreheads with ashes, in remembrance that they be but ashes, was to the whole City festive and joyfull, for turning their Images to Ashes, and so is observed and celebrated every year still unto this present day, with all mirth, plays and pastimes, in remembrance of the same Ashes, which day may there be called a right Ashwednesday of God's own making. The Men of Zurich, of Bern, of Solothurn, hearing what business was at Basil, sent their Embassadors to be a mean between them; but before the Embassadors came, all was ceased and at quiet.

All this mean space the Emperor and the French King were together occupied in Wars and Strife. Which as it turned to the great damage and detriment of the French King, who in the said Wars was taken Prisoner by the Emperor, so it hapned commodious and opportune for the success of the Gospel; for else it is to be thought that these Helvetians and other Germans, should not have had that leisure and rest to reform Religion, and to link themselves in league together, as they did. But thus Almighty God of his secret Wisdom disposeth Times and Occasions to serve his Will and Purpose in all things. Albeit Ferdinandus the Emperor's Brother, and Deputy in Germany, remitted no time nor diligence to do what he could in revisiting the proceedings of the Protestants, as appeared both by the Decree set forth at Ratisbona, and also at Spire, in the which Council of Spire, Ferdinandus at the same time, which was the year of our Lord 1529, had decreed against the Protestants in effect as followeth.

First, That the Edict of the Emperor made at Worms, should stand in force through all Germany, till the time of the General Council which should shortly follow: Also, that they which already had altered their Religion, and now could not revoke the same again for fear of Sedition, should stay themselves, and attempt no more Innovations hereafter, till time of the General Council.

Item, That the Doctrine of them which hold the Lord's Supper otherwise than the Church doth teach, should not be received, nor the Mals should be altered: and there, whereas the Doctrine of Religion was altered, should be no impediment to the contrary, but that they which were disposed to come to Mals, might safely therein use their devotion; against Anabaptists likewise; and that all Ministers of the Church should be enjoined to use no other interpretation of holy Scripture, but according to the exposition of the Church Doctors: other matters that were disputable not to be touched. Moreover, that all Persons and States should keep peace, so that for Religion, neither the one part should infer molestation to the other, nor receive any confederates under their protection and safeguard. All which Decrees they which should transgress, to be outlawed and exiled.

Unto this sitting at Spire, First, the Embassadors of Strasburg were not admitted, but repelled by Ferdinandus, because they had rejected the Mals: And therefore the said City of Strasburg denied to pay any contribution against the Turk, except they with other Germans might be likewise admitted unto their Councils: The other Princes which were received and not repelled, as the Duke of Saxony, and George of Brandenburg, Ernstus, G 3

Ernetus, and Franciscus, Earls of Lunenburg, Landgrave Ansbaldus, did utterly gainstand the Decree, and shewed their cause in a large Protestation written why they so did: Which done, all such Cities which subscribed and consented to the said Protestation of the Princes; estoons conjoined themselves in a common League with them, whereupon they had their name therefore called Prosefants. The names of the Cities were these; Argentia, or Strasburg, Norimborg, Ulmer, Constance, Rueting, Wisssemburg, Memminge, Lindavia, Campeidunum, Hailbrunum, Isna, Wissburgum, Norlinge, Sangallum.

Furthermore, as touching the Helvetians, (from whence we have somewhat digressed) how the City of Berne and Zurich had consented and joined together in reformation of true Religion, you heard before. Wherefore the other Pages in Helvetia, which were of contrary profession, in like manner confederated themselves in League with Ferdinandus: the number and names of which Pages especially were five, to wit, Lucernates, Uranti, Suiteris, Untervaldii, and Tugiani, which was in the year above said; to the intent, that they conjoining their power together, might overrun the Religion of Christ, and the professors of the same. Who also, for hatred and despite, hanged up the Arms of the fore said Cities of Zurich and of Berne upon the Gallows, besides many other Injuries and Grievances which they wrought against them. For the which cause the said Cities of Berne and Zurich raised their power, intending to set up on the fore said Switzers, as upon their capital Enemies. But as they were in the Field, ready to encounter one Army against the other, through the means of the City of Strasburg, and other Intercessors, they were parted for that time, and so returned.

The Council of Ansborg.
The Confession of the Protestants at Ansborg.

As touching the Council of Ansborg, which followed the next year after the Assembly of Spire, Anno 1530, how the Princes and Protestants of Germany, in the same Council exhibited their Confession, and what labour was sought to confute it, and how constantly Duke Frederick perilled in defence of his Confession against the threatening words and replications of the Emperor; also in what danger the said Princes had been, had not the Landgrave privily by night slipped out of the City, pertaineth not to this place presently to discourse.

To return therefore unto Zuinglius and the Helvetians, of whom we have here presently to treat: You heard before how the tumult and commotion between the two Cities of Zurich and Berne, and the other five Cities of the Cantons, was pacified by the means of intercession; which Peace so continued the space of two years. After that the old Wound waxing raw again, began to burst out, and gather to an head: which was by reason of certain injuries, and opprobrious words and contumelies, which the reformed Cities had received of the other; wherefore the Tigurines and the Bernates, stopping all passages and firais, would permit no Coin nor Victual to pass unto them. This was in the year of our Lord 1531.

And when great trouble was to be thereby, the French King, with certain other Townships of Switzerland, as the Glarians, Friburgians, Soloturnians, and other coming between them, laboured to set them at agreement, drawing out certain conditions of Peace between them: which Conditions were these. That all Contumelies and Injuries past should be forgotten. That hereafter neither part should molest the other. That they which were banished for Religion, should again be restored. That the five Pages might remain without disturbance in their Religion, so that none should be restrained amongst them from the reading of the Old and New Testament. That no kind of difficulties should be procured against them of Berne and Zurich: and that either part should confer mutual helps together, one to succour the other, as in times past. But the five Pagesmen would not observe these Covenants made, neither would their malicious Hearts be brought to any conformity. Wherefore the Bernates and Tigurines, shewing and declaring, first, their cause in publick writing, to purge and excuse the necessity of their War, being pressed with so many wrongs, and in manner constrained to take the Sword in hand, did, as before beset the high-ways and passages, that no furniture of Victual or other Forrage could come to the other Pages. By reason whereof, when they of the five Towns began to be pinched with want and penury, they armed themselves secretly, and set forward in warlike array towards the borders of Zurich, whereas then was lying a Garison of the Zurich Men, to the number of a thousand and more. Whereupon word was sent incontinent to the City of Zurich, to succour their Men with speed; but their Enemies approached so fast, that they could hardly come to relieve them. For when they were come to the top of the Hill, whereby they must needs pass, they saw their Fellows being in great distress in the Valley under them: whereupon they, encouraging themselves, made down the Hill with more haste than order, striving who might go fastest: but the nature of the Hill was such, that there could but one go down at once. By reason whereof, so far as they could not keep their Ranks to join all together, it followed that they, being but few in number, were discomfited and overmatched of the multitude, which was October 11, the year aforesaid. Among the number of them that were slain, was also Uldricus Zuinglius, the blessed Servant and Saint of God. Also the Abbot of Capella, and Commandator Kunasentis, with thirteen other learned and worthy Men were slain, being as is thought, falsely betrayed, and brought into the hands of their Enemies.

As touching the cause which moved Zuinglius to go out with his Citizens to the War, it is sufficiently declared and excused, both by Jo. Sleid., and especially by Oecolampadius, in his Epistle, (ep. Mart. Frechtum. & Som. Epist. l. 4.) where first is to be understood, that it is an old received manner among the Zurich Men, that when they go forth in Warfare, the chief Minister of the Church goes with them. Zuinglius also of himself being a Man (saith Sleid.) of a stout and bold courage, considering if he should remain at home, when War should be attempted against his Citizens, and if he, which in his Sermons did so encourage others, should now faint so cowardly, and tarry behind at home when time of danger came, what shame and disdain might worthily rise to him thereby, thought not to refuse to take such part as his Brethren did.

Oecolampad. moreover addeth, that he went not out as a Captain of the Field, but as a good Citizen with his Citizens, and a good Shepherd ready to die with his Flock. And which of them all, saith he, that most cry out against Zuinglius, can shew any such noble heart in him, to do the like? Again, neither did he go out of his own accord, but rather desired not to go; foretelling belike, what danger thereof would ensue. But the Senate being importune upon him, would have monay, urging and enforcing him most instantly to go: among whom were thought to have been some false Betrayers, laying and objecting to him, that he was a dastard if he refused to accompany his Brethren, as well in time of danger as in peace. Moreover the said Zuinglius, among other secular Arts, had also some skill in such matters of warfare. Hec Oecolampad. When he was slain, great cruelty was shewn upon the dead Corps; such was their hatred to him, that their malice could not be satisfied, unless also they should burn his body being dead. *Ex com. The report goeth, that after his body was cut first in four pieces, and then consumed with fire; three days after his death, his Friends came to see whether any part of him was remaining, where they found his heart in the albes whole and unburned; in much like manner as was also the heart of Cranmer Archbishop of Canterbury, which in the albes was found and taken up unconsumed, as it is credibly reported.

Furthermore, such was then the rage of these five Pages against the fore said Abbot Capellenius, that they took him being slain, and putting out both his eyes, clothed him in a Monk's Coull, and set him in the Pulpit to preach, railing and jelling upon him in most despiteful manner. Ex Epist. Oecolamp. ad Wolfgangum Capitenem. l. 4. Uldericus Zuinglius was when he died of the Age of 44 years, younger than Martin Luther by four years.

The Bernates, who were purposed the same time to achieve War against the Untervaldians bordering near unto them, when they heard of this discomfiture of the Tigurines, to comfort them again, desired them to be of good cheer and courage, promising that they would not fail but come, and revenge their quarrel. Again, when the Tigurines had assembled their Power together, which was the eighth day after the Battel, and had received aid from the Scheffusians, Mulians, Sangaller, and from Basil, (the Bernates Bernater at this time were nothing hasty) out of the whole number they chose out certain Ensigns, which setting forth in the night, lay in the Hill beside Messinge, intending when the Moon was up, to take the Town of Tugie, lying near at hand, upon the sudden. Which when their Enemies had perceived, which were encamped not far from them, with all speed and most secret manner they came upon them being at rest, the 24th day of October, and to put them in more fear, made a wonderful clamorous outcry: so it fell out in conclusion, that many on both Parties were slain. And albeit the five Pagones had the upper hand, yet would they of Zurich nothing relent in their Religion. At the last, through mediation, a Peace was concluded, and thus the matter agreed: that the Tigurney, Bernater, and Basilians, should forsake the League which they had lately made with the City of Strasbourg and the Lantgrave: likewise should the five Page-men give over their League and Composition made with Ferdinandus: and hereof Obligations were made and sealed in the latter end of November.

The death of John Frederick Duke of Saxony.

Oecolampadius the Preacher of the City of Strasbourg, above recorded, hearing of the death of Zuinglius his dear Friend, took thereat inward grief and sorrow; inasmuch that it is thought to have increased his Disease, and so he also departed this life, the same year and month of November above mentioned, being of the age of 49 years, elder than Martin Luther by one year. Altho this Oecolampadius then died, yet his learned and famous Commentaries upon the Prophets, with other worthy Works which he left behind him, live still and shall never die.

The next year following, which was Anno 1532, in the month of August, died also the worthy and memorable Prince John Frederick Duke of Saxony, who for testimony of Christ and of his Gospel, sustained such Trials, so many Brants, and so vehement Conflicts with the Emperor, and that especially at the Council assembled at Ausperg; that unless the almighty hand of the Lord had sustained him, it had not been possible for him, or any Prince, to have endured so constant and unremovable against so many perfwasions and assaults, as he did to the end. After him succeeded John Frederick his Son, &c.

And thus have the History of Zuinglius, and of the Church of Switzerland, with their Proceedings and Troubles, from the first beginning of their Reformation of Religion, set forth and described. Whereunto we will add one certain Epistle of the said Zuinglius, taken out of his other Epistles, and so therewith close up his Story. Which Epistle I thought here to record, especially for that in the same, among other matters; profitably is expounded for true meaning of the Apollle, writing to the Corinthians concerning how to judge the Lord's Body, to the intent that the simple thereby may the better be informed. The words of his Letter be these as follow.

Huldricus Zuinglius N. fratri in Domino.

Gratiam & pacem in Domin. Accipe igitur charis. frater, &c.

In English thus.

Unto your Questions propounded to me in your former Letters, (well-beloved Brother) I have sent you here mine Answer. First, I am also in the same mind with you, that the Lord's Supper is a very Thanksgiving: for so the Apollle himself meaneth, saying, Ye shall shew forth the Lord's Death. Where the word of shewing forth, signifies as much as Praising or Thanksgiving. Wherefore seeing it is an Eucharist, or a Thanksgiving; in my judgment, no other thing ought to be attributed to Mens Conscience, but only with due reverence to give thanks. Nevertheless, yet this is not to be neglected, that every Man do prove and examine himself; for so we ought to search and ask our own Conscience, What Faith we have in Christ Jesus & which if it be found and sincere, we may approach without stay to this Thanksgiving, to that that hath no Faith, and yet faintly or pretendeth to have, eateth his own judgment; for he lieth to the Holy Ghost. And whereas you suppose, that Paul in this place doth not reprove them which sit at the Table eating Meats offered to Idols, I dissent from you therein. For Paul a little before writeth vehemently against those arrogant persons, which, bragging upon their knowledge, thought they might lawfully eat of such Meats offered to Idols, sitting and eating at the Lord's Table: You cannot (saith he) be partakers both of the Lord's Table, and the Table of Devils, &c. Wherefore St. Paul's meaning is, that every one should try and examine himself what Faith he hath. Whereupon it followeth, that he which hath a right Faith, must have no part nor fellowship with those things which be given to Idols: for he is now a Member of another Body, that is of Christ: so that he cannot join himself now to be one Body with Idolaters. And therefore those be they which do not judge or discern the Lord's Body, that make no difference between the Church of Christ, and the Church of Idolaters. For they which sit at the Lord's Table, eating of Idol Meats, do make no difference at all between the Lord's Supper, and the Supper of the Devils; which be they whom Paul saith not to judge the Body of our Lord, that is, which make no difference, nor give any more regard to Christ's Church, than to the Church of Devils. Whereas if we would judge our selves, that is, if we would thoroughly search and examine our own Conscience as we should, in coming to the Table of the Lord, we finding any Faith in us, would never go to the Table, or make thereof the Feast of Devils: wherefore your judgment herein is not anis in expounding the Word of judging in St. Paul, to signify as much as considering, depending and inquiring.

To your second Question, I answer, That Jesus took Bread, and brake, &c. Also he took the Cup, &c. Uta verba sunt peculiariter agentis, non hospitaliter invitantis; that is, These words declare the action of one which properly doth a thing, and not the hospitality of one which inviteth another to eat.

Touching your third Question, out of the 6th Chap. of John, Dost this offend you? Herein I do fully agree with you.

As for this word Oltren, which is your fourth Question, I understand thereby the time of the great Feast or Solemnity, which we keep in remembrance of the great deliverance of God's People from the thralldom now of Saiin, before from the thralldom of Pharaoh. Neither is it greatly material with what word we express the thing, so the thing it self be one, and the analogy and consonancy of the Scripture be kept: for both the Scripture calleth Christ the Lamb, and St. Paul calleth him our Easter or Passover. Now your word, Wanderfeldt, well pleaseth me, for the Passover, or Pedah.

To your fifth Interrogation, of Christ's descending into Hell; I suppose this Particle was infixed into the Creed by the Sentence of the Fathers, to declare how the Fathers, which died in the Faith, were redeemed by the death of Christ. For Christ led away Captivity, whereunto they were holden, with him up into Heaven: so that his going down into Hell, not sic intelligatur, quasi circumscriptive, sed potentialiter; that is, he not so understood, as circumscriptively, which is, when a thing is present by circumscription of any one place, but by power, which is by the operation of the Spirit, which is not comprehended in any certainty of place, but without prescription of certain place is diffused every where: so that the Article of Christ's descending into Hell importeth as much, as that his death redeemed them which were in Hell. Whereunto St. Peter also seemeth to have respect, where he saith, * The Gospel * 1 Pet. 3. also was preached to them which were dead; that is, That they also did feel the good tidings of the Gospel, their redemption by the Son of God: and that they which rose again with Christ in the Spirit, be now with him in Heaven, who nevertheless in flesh shall be judged, what time the Son of God and of Man shall come to judge both the quick, and the dead. Return to the places of Peter, the one in his first Epistle, the other in the later: and so be you contented with this present Answer raised up in haste. Fare ye heartily well. And comfort my William, the good aged Father, by the Grace of God which is in you. Commend me to John Eggenberge.

From Zurich, Septemb. 1. 1527.

From the first beginning of this whole Book and History hitherto, good Reader, thou hast heard of many and sundry troubles, and much business in the Church of Christ, concerning the Reformation of divers Abuses and great Errors crept into the same, namely in the Church of Rome, as appeareth by the doings of them, in divers and sundry places, whereof mention hath been made heretofore in this said History. For what godly Man hath there been, within the space of these five hundred years, either virtuously disposed, or excellently learned, which hath not disapproved the the misordered doings and corrupt examples of the See and Bishop of Rome from time to time, unto the coming of this Luther? wherein this appeareth to me, and may also appear no less to all godly disposed Men to be noted, not without great admiration, that seeing this aforelaid Romish Bishop hath had great Enemies and Gainfayers continually from time to time, both speaking and working, preaching and writing against him, yet notwithstanding never any could prevail before the coming of this Man. The cause whereof, altho it be secretly known unto God, and unknown unto Men, yet so far as Men by conjectures may suppose, it may thus not unlikely be thought: That whereas other Men before him, speaking against the pomp, pride, whoredom, and avarice of the Bishop of Rome, charged him only, or most especially, with examples and manners of Life; Luther went further with him, charging him not with Life, but with his Learning; not with his Doings, but with his Doctrine; not picking at the Rinde, but plucking up the Root; not seeking the Man, but shaking his Seat; yea, and charging him with plain Heresy, as prejudicial and resisting plainly against the Blood of Christ, contrary to the true sense and direct understanding of the sacred Testament of God's holy Word. For whereas the Foundation of our Faith, grounded upon the holy Scripture, teacheth and leadeth us to be justified only by the worthiness of Christ, and the only price of his Blood; the Pope proceeding with a contrary Doctrine, teacheth us otherwise to seek our Salvation, not by Christ alone, but by the way of Mens meriting and deserving by Works. Whereupon rose divers sorts of Orders and religious Sects among Men, some professing one thing, and some another, and every Man seeking his own Righteousness, but few seeking the Righteousness of him which is set up of God to be our Righteousness, Redemption, and Justification.

Martin Luther therefore, urging and reducing things to the foundation and touchstone of the Scripture, opened the eyes of many, which before were drowned in darkness. Whereupon it cannot be expressed what joy, comfort, and consolation came to the hearts of Men, some lying in darkness and ignorance, some wallowing in sin, some being in despair, some macerating themselves by works, and some presuming upon their own Righteousness, to behold that glorious benefit of the great liberty and free justification set up in Christ Jesus. And briefly to speak, the more glorious the benefit of this Doctrine appeared to the World after long ignorance, the greater perfection followed upon the same. And where the Elect of God took most occasion of comfort and of salvation, thereof the Adversaries took most matter of vexation and disturbance, as commonly we see the true Word of God to bring, with it ever dissention and perturbation; and therefore truly it was said of Christ, That he came not to send Peace on Earth, but the Sword. And this was the cause why that, after the Doctrine and Preaching of Luther, so great troubles and persecutions followed in all quarters of the World; whereby arose great dissention amongst the Prelates, and many Laws and Decrees were made to overthrow the same, by cruel handling of many good and Christian Men. Thus while Authority, armed with Laws and Rigor, did strive against simple verity; lamentable it was to hear how many poor Men were troubled, and went to wrack, some tost from place to place, some exiled out of the Land for fear, some caused to abjure, some driven to Caves in Woods, some wracked with torment, and some pursued to death with Faggot and Fire. Of whom we have now (Christ willing) in this History following to intreat, first beginning with certain that suffered in Germany, and then to return to our own Stories, and Martyrs here in England.

Henry Voes and John Elsch Friers Augustines.

IN the year of our Lord 1523, two young Men were burnt at Brussels, the one named Henry Voes, being of the age of 24 years; and the other John Elsch, which before had been of the Order of the Augustine Friers. They were degraded the first day of July, and spoiled of their Friers Weed, at the Suit of Egmondanus the Pope's Inquisitor; and the Divines of Lovaine; for that they would not retract and deny their Doctrine of the Gospel, which the Papists call Lutheranism. Their Examiners were Hochstratus, and others, who demanded of them, What they did believe? They said, The Books of the Old Testament and the New, wherein were contained the Articles of the Creed. Then were they asked, whether they believed the Decrees of the Councils, and of the Fathers? They said, Such as were agreeing to the Scripture they believed. After this they proceeded further, asking, Whether they thought it any deadly sin to transgress the Decrees of the Fathers, and of the Bishop of Rome? That (said they) is to be attributed only to the Precepts of God, to bind the Conscience of Man, or to loose it. Wherein when they constantly persecuted and would not turn, they were condemned and judged to be burned. Then they began to give thanks to God their Heavenly Father, which had delivered them through his great goodness, from that false and abominable Priesthood, and made them Priests of his holy Order, receiving them unto him as a Sacrifice of sweet Odour. Then there was a Bill written, which was delivered unto them to read openly before the People, to declare what Faith and Doctrine they held. The greatest Error that they were accused of, was, That Men ought to trust only in God, forasmuch as Men are liars and deceitful in all their Words and Deeds, and therefore there ought no trust or assistance to be put in them.

As they were led unto the place of Execution, which was the first of July, they went joyfully and merrily, making continual protestation that they died for the Glory of God, and the Doctrine of the Gospel, as true Christians, believing and following the Holy Church of the Son of God; saying also, that it was the day which they had long desired. After they were come to the place where they should be burned, and were disposed of their Garments, they tarried a great space in their Shirts, and joyfully embraced the Stake that they should be bound to, patiently and joyfully enduring whatsoever was done unto them, praising God with Te Deum laudamus, and singing Psalms, and rehearsing the Creed, in testimony of their Faith. A certain Doctor, beholding their jollity and mirth, said unto Henry, that he should take heed so foolishly to glorify himself. To whom he answered, God forbid that I should glory in any thing, but only in the Cross of my Lord Jesus Christ. Another counselled him to have God before his eyes: unto whom he answered, I trust that I carry him truly in my heart. One of them seeing that fire was kindled at his feet, said, Methinks ye do strew Roses under my feet. Finally, the smoke and the flame mounting up to their faces, choked them.

Henry being demanded amongst other things, whether Luther had seduced him or no: yea, said he, even as Christ seduced his Apostles. He said also, that it was contrary to God's Law, that the Clergy should be exempted from the Power and Jurisdiction of the Magistrate ordained of God; for such as were ordained in Office by the Bishops, have no power, but only to preach the Word of God, and to feed their Flock therewithal. After their death, their Monastery was dissolved at Antwerp. The President thereof, by the Papists called Jacobus Luberianus, after divers and sundry troubles and afflictions was forced to recant at Brussels; but afterward his mind being renewed by the Holy Ghost, embracing that again which before he had renounced, he fled unto Luther. Ex 6. Tomo M. Lutheri, fol. 397.

Henry Sutphen, Monk, put to death in Diethmar.

THE next year after the burning of those two Christian Martyrs at Brussels above mentioned, with like Tyranny also was martyred and burned without all order of Judgment or just Condemnation, about the City of Diethmar in the borders of Germany, one Henry Sutphen, Monk, Anno 1524. of whom mention is partly touched in the Commentaries of John Sleiden lib. 4. but his History is more amply described of Luther, of Paulus Eberus in his Calend. of Ludov. Rabus Crispinus, and others. This Sutphen had been before with Martin Luther, and afterward coming to Antwerp, was from thence excluded for the Gospel, and so came to Breme, not to the end there to preach, but for that he was minded to go to Wittenberg, being driven from Antwerp, as is above said. Who being at Breme, was there required by certain godly Citizens of Breme to make one or two brief Exhortations upon the Gospel. Whereunto, through the earnest Love and Zeal that was in him, he was easily assented and persuaded. He made his first Sermon unto the People the Sunday before St. Martins day. When the People heard him preach the Word of God so sincerely, they desired him again the second time, and were so in love with his Doctrine, that the whole Parish required him to tarry amongst them to preach the Gospel; which thing, for fear of danger, for a time he refused. When the Religious Rout had understanding thereof, especially the Canons, Monks, and Priests, they went about with all endeavour to oppress him, and thrust both him out of the City, and also the Gospel of Christ (for that was their chief seeking;) whereupon they went unto the Senate, declaring that such an Heretick might be banished the Town, which in his Doctrine preached against the Catholick Church. Upon the complaint of the Canons, the Senate sent for the Wardens and head Men of the Parish where Henry had preached; who being come together, the Senate declared unto them the Complaint of the Canons and all the other religious men. Whereunto the Citizens of Breme taking their Preachers part, answered, that they knew none other, but that they had hired a learned and honest man to preach unto them, which should teach them sincerely and truly the Word of God. Notwithstanding if the Chapter-house or any other man could bring Testimonial or witness, that the Preacher had taught any thing which either favoured of Heresie, or were repugnant to the Word of God, they were ready, they said, with the Chapter-house to persecute him: for God forbid that they should maintain an Heretick. But if contrariwise the Canons of the Chapter-house, and the other religious men will not declare and shew that the Preacher, whom they had hired, had taught any Error or Heresie, but were set only of malice by violence to drive him away, they might not (said they) by any means suffer the same. Whereupon they desired the Senate, with all humble obedience, that they would not require it of them, but grant them Equity and Justice, saying, that they were minded to assist their Preacher always, and to plead his Cause.

This Answer the Senate commanded to be declared to the Chapter-house. When as the religious sort understood that they could prevail little or nothing with their words, bursting out into a fury, they began to threaten, and therewithal went straight unto the Archbishop to certify him how that the Citizens of Breme were become Hereticks, and would no longer obey their religious sort, with many other like things in their Complaint, so that it was to be feared, lest the whole City shortly should be seduced.

When the Bishop heard tell of these things, straightway he sent two which were of his Council unto Breme, requiring that Henry should be sent unto him without delay. When they were demanded why they should have him sent, they answered, because he preached against the holy Church. Being again demanded in what Points or Articles they had nothing to lay. One of these Counsellors was the Bishop Suffragan, a naughty pernicious Hypocrite that fought by all means possible to carry away the said Henry captive. Finally they received this answer of the Senators. That forasmuch as the Preacher, being hired of the Churchwardens, had not hitherto been convict for any Heretick, and that no man had declared any erroneous or heretical Article that he had taught, they said they could by no means obtain of the Citizens that he should be carried away: wherefore they earnestly desired the Bishop, that he would speedily send his learned men unto Breme to dispute with him; and if he were convinced, they promised without any delay that he should be justly punished and sent away: if not, they would in no wise let him depart. Whereunto the Suffragan answered with a great Protestation, requiring that he might be delivered into his hands for the quietness of the whole Country, taking God to his witness, that in this behalf he fought for nothing else, but only the commodity of his Country. But for all this they could prevail nothing, for the Senate continued still in their former mind. Whereupon the Suffragan being moved with anger, departed from Breme, and would not confirm their Children.

When he came unto the Bishop, he declared the answer of the Senate, and what he had heard and learned of the Priests and Monks there. Afterward, when daily news came, that the Preacher did still more and more preach, and teach more heinous matter against the Religious Rout, they attempted another way, suborning great Men to admonish the Citizens of Breme into what jeopardy their Commonwealth might fall by means of their Preacher, preaching contrary to the Decree of the Pope and Emperor. Besides that, they said, that he was the Prisoner of the Lady Margaret; for which cause they had gotten Letters of the Lady Margaret, requiring to have her Prisoner sent unto her again.

All these crafts and subtilties did nothing at all prevail, for the Senate of Breme answered all things without blame. When as the Bishop saw this his enterprise all frustrate, he attempted another way, whereby he had certain hope, that both he, and also the Word of God with him should be wholly oppressed. Whereupon they decreed a Provincial vincial Council, not to be holden at Breme, as it was accustomed, but at Buchade, which place they thought most meet for their purpose.

To this Council were called the Prelates and learned Men of the Diocese, to determine what was to be believed, and whereunto to trust.

Alfo to the said Council was Henry called, notwithstanding that they had already decreed to proceed against him, as against a manifest Heretic, albeit he was not yet convicted, nor had pleaded his cause before them. Wherefore the Rulers of the City, together with the Commonalty, detained him at home, foreseeing and suspecting the malice of the Council. Then the said Henry gathered a Sum of his Doctrine into a few Articles, and sent it with his Letters unto the Archbishop: excusing his Innocency, offering himself to be ready, if he were convicted of any error by the Testimony of the holy Scripture, to recant the same: notwithstanding earnestly requiring, that his Errors might be convicted by the holy Scriptures, by the Testimony whereof he had hitherto approved his Doctrine, and doubted not hereafter to confirm the same: but this took no place amongst those anointed Prelates. What the determination of their Judgment was, it may hereupon well be gathered, in that shortly after they set upon the Church-porch the Bull of the Pope Leo the Xth, and Decree of the Emperor made at Worms. Whereupon Henry contemning their madness, proceeded daily in preaching the Gospel, adding always this Protestation, That he was ready willingly to give account touching his Faith and Doctrine to every man that would require the same. In the mean time the holy Catholics could not be idle, but sent their Chaplains unto every Sermon to trap him in his words. But God, whose Foot-paths are in the midst of the Floods, would have his marvellous power to be seen in them; for he converted many of them: inasmuch that the greater part of those that were sent to hearken, did openly witness his Doctrine to be God's Truth, against which no man could contend, and such as in all their lives before they had not heard; perfwading them likewise, that they forsaking all Impiety, should follow the Word of God, and believe the same, if they would be saved. But the chief Priests, Canons, and Monks were so indurate and blinded with Pharao's, that they became the worse for these Admonitions. When as God saw the time convenient that Henry should confirm the verity that he had preached, he sent him among the cruel Murderers appointed for that slaughter, by this occasion as followeth.

It hapned in the year of our Lord 1524, that this Henry was sent for by Letters, by Nicholas Bay Parish Priest, and other faithful Christians of the Parish of Meldorff, which is a Town in Dietsmar, to preach the Gospel unto them, and deliver them out of the Bondage of Antichrist, which in that place had full Dominion.

These Letters being received upon St. Katharine's Evening, calling together six Brethren, honest Citizens, he opened the matter unto them, how that he was sent for by them of Dietsmar, to preach the Gospel; adding moreover, that he was not only a Debtor unto them, but to all other which required his aid. Wherefore he thought good to go to Dietsmar, to see what God would work by him, requiring also that they would help him with their advice, by what means he might best take his Journey, that no man should know of it, that thereby he might not be letted or stopped; which thing without doubt had come to pass, if his purpose had been known to the People. Unto whom the Citizens answered, desiring him that he would not depart for a time, forasmuch as the Gospel had not yet taken so deep root in the People, but was as yet weak, and especially in the Villages thereabout, and that the Persecution was very great, willing him also to have respect unto this, that he was by them called to the Office of Preaching: and if they of Dietsmar desired a Preacher, he should send some other in his place, for they had before perceived the Disposition and Untrustfulness of them of Dietsmar: besides that, it was not in their power to give him free liberty to depart, without the consent of the whole Commonalty. Whereunto Henry made answer in this manner, That albeit he could not deny but that he was sent for by them, yet now there were many godly Men at Breme, whose labour they might use in his absence, in preaching of the Gospel. Besides that the Papists were for the most part vanquished and overthrown, and their Folly known, even unto Women and Children; adding therunto that he had now preached the Gospel by the space of two years at Breme, and that they of Dietsmar lived without a Pastor even in the midst of Wolves: wherefore he could not with a safe Confidence deny their request. And whereas they alleged that they could not licence him without the consent of the whole Congregation, that, said he, was but of small effect; forasmuch as he would not utterly forsake them, but determined only to remain with them of Dietsmar for a month or two, to lay a Foundation, and then to return again; desiring them, that after his departure they would declare unto the Congregation how he was sent for by them of Dietsmar, to whom he could not say nay: willing them also to excuse his sudden departure, for that he was forced to depart secretly, because of his Adversaries privately laying wait in every place for him; thinking that he should scarcely avoid them, which had always gone about to bring him to his death. Finally, they should promise to the Congregation in his name, that when he had performed his Enterprize, he would straight return again. They being perfwaded with these words, consented unto him, steadfastly hoping that they of Dietsmar should be converted to the true Faith: which people above all other have been always given to Idolatry.

Having prepared all things toward his setting forth, the two and twentieth day of October he took his Journey, and came to Meldorff whither he was sent for: where he was joyfully received of the Parish Priest and others, as soon as he was come thither. Albeit he had not yet preached, the Devil with his members by and began to fret and fume for anger. Above all other, one Augustine Tornborch, Prior of the Black Friars, began to fume, who went out of hand unto Mr. J. Swicken his companion, and Commissary to the official of Hamburg, to take counsel what was to be done, lest they should lose their Kingdom. Finally, it was decreed by them above all things to withstand the beginnings, that he should not have licence to preach: for if by any means it happened that he preached, and the people should hear him, it was to be feared that the wickedness and craft of the Priests and Monks should be opened; which being made manifest, they knew plainly that it would be but a Folly to resist, remembering what had happened lately before in Breme. This Determination had, the Prior the next day early in the Morning (for he had not slept well all night for cares) went with great speed unto Heyda, to speak with the eight and forty Presidents of the Country: unto whom with great complaints he shewed how that a feditious fellow, a Monk was come from Breme, which would seduce all the People of Dietsmar, as he had done the Bremers. There was moreover that did assist this Prior, Mr. Guntwin, Chancellor of the Country, and Petrus Hannus, both enemies unto the Gospel. These stoutly assisted the Prior, perfwading the other forty six, being simple and unlearned Men, that they should obtain great favour and good will of the Bishop of Breme, if they would put this Heretic Monk to death. When these poor and unlearned men heard these words, they decreed that this Monk should be put to death, neither heard, nor seen, much less convicted.

Furthermore, this Prior obtained Letters from the forty eight Presidents to the Parish Priest, commanding him under great penalty, that he should put the Monk out of his house, and command him to depart without preaching. With these Letters he came speedily to Meldorff, and delivered the Letters over-night unto the Parish Priest; trusting that by their Threatnings and Commandments, the said Henry should be feared from preaching, diligently watching whether he did preach or not.

When as the Parish Priest had read over the Letters, he marvelled not a little at that proud Commandment, for that it had not been heard of before that the forty eight Presidents should meddle with Ecclesiastical matters, and that it had been of long time used, that the ruling thereof should be in the hands of the Parish Priest: and long time before it was decreed by the whole Province, and customably used, that in every Church the Parish Priest should have free liberty to receive or put out the Preacher. These Letters the Parish Priest delivered unto Henry; which when he had diligently looked over, he answered, that forasmuch as he was come being sent for by the whole Congregation to preach the Gospel of Christ, he would forsake that Vocation, because he saw it would be acceptable table unto the whole Congregation, and that he ought rather to obey the Word of God, than Man. Also, that if it pleased God that he should lose his Life in Dischmar, there was as near a way to Heaven, as in any other place; for that he doubted nothing at all, that once he must suffer for the Gospel's sake. Upon this Courage and Boldness, the next day Henry went up into the Pulpit, and made a Sermon, expounding the place of Paul, which is, Rom. 1. Tota est mihi Domus, &c. that is, God is my Witness; and the Gospel of the day. After the Sermon was done, the whole Congregation being called together, the Prior delivered the Letters that were sent by the forty eight Presidents, the Tenor whereof was this: That they of Meldorf should be fined with a Fine of a thousand Gilderns, if they suffered the Monk to preach; and commanded moreover, that they should send Ambassadors unto Heida with full Power and Authority. When they heard these Letters read, they were much moved, because they were so charged contrary to the custom of the Country; forasmuch as every Parish Priest hath always had Authority, according to his Discretion, to chuse or put away the Preacher. Briefly, they all determined with one voice, to keep Henry for their Preacher, and to defend him: for when they had heard the Sermon, they were greatly offended with the Prior.

After Dinner Henry preached again, expounding the place of St. Paul, Rom. 15. Debetis nos qui potentes sumus, &c. We ought which are strong, &c. The next day the Citizens of Meldorf sent their Messengers unto Heida, offering to answer in all Causes before all Men, for their Preacher, whom they have received. Besides that, the Messengers declared what Christian and godly Sermons they heard him preach. The Parish Priest also wrote Letters by the said Legats unto the forty eight Rulers, wherein he excused himself, that it was never his mind, nor the intent of the said Henry to move Sedition, but only sincerely to preach the Word of God, and offer himself ready to answer for the said Henry to all men, whensoever he should be called; most earnestly desiring them not to give credit unto the Monks, which being blinded with hatred and avarice, had fully determined to oppress the Truth: saying moreover, that it was against all reason, that a man should be condemned, before the Truth be tried out, and his cause declared; and if, after due Inquisition had, he should be convicted, then he should suffer condign Punishment. This submission with the publick Testimonial was nothing esteemed or regarded, neither was there any answer given thereunto, but every man repined and murmured thereat. Last of all, one Peter Debleus, one of the Seignours, answered; That albeit there were divers Diffentions in every place about the Christian Faith, and that they as men ignorant could not redress the same, yet this their sentence should be holden and ratified; which was, that the Judgment of determining this Diffention should be referred to the next Council, which by the report of Master Chancellor was now in hand to be called and gathered. Also until all Difcord and Diffention should be appeased, whatsoever was received and believed by their Neighbours, he promised in the name of the rest, that they would willingly receive and believe the same. So that if the Word of God hath not hitherto been clearly and sincerely preached (as they said) unto the People, and that there be now some which can teach and preach the same more sincerely; it is not their mind or intent to withstand or resist their good doings, but that the Presidents would with this one thing diligently to be taken heed of, that there be no occasion given by any man to move Sedition, and in the mean time be commanded all men quietly to give over all matters until Easter next, and by that time it should be appeased, what should be received, and what left undone. With this Answer they were all very well contented; and the Messengers returned again to Meldorf with great joy and gladness, declaring to the whole Congregation what Answer was made, conceiving a sure hope that the matter would shortly come to pass.

Upon St. Nicholas day, this Henry preached twice, first upon the Gospel, Homo quidam nobilis, &c. A certain Noble man, &c. Secondly upon this Text, Plures facti sunt Sacerdotes, &c. There are many made Priests, &c. with such a spirit and grace, that all men had him in admiration, praying God most earnestly, that they might long have such a Preacher. Upon the day of the Conception of our Lady, he also made two Sermons upon the first Chapter of Matthew, expounding the Book of the Generation; wherein he rehearsed the Promises made by God unto our Forefathers; and under what Faith our Fathers, that then were, had lived; adding also, that all respect of Works being set apart, we must be justified by the same Faith. All these things were spoken with such boldness of Spirit, that all men greatly marvelled at him, giving thanks to God for his great Mercy, that had sent them such a Preacher, desiring him moreover, that he would tarry with them all Christmasts to preach; for they feared lest he should be sent for to some other place.

In the mean space, the Prior and Master John Schink were not idle: for when the Prior perceived that his malicious Enterprize took no good success, he adjoynted unto him a Companion, William a Doctor of the Jacobins, and so went up to Lundauum to the Monks Franciscans, and Minors, for help and counsel. For those kinds of Friars above all others are best instructed by their Hypocritie to deceive the poor and simple People. These Friars straightway sent for certain of the Rulers, which had all the Rule and Authority, and especially Peter Hannus, Peter Swine, and Nicholas Roden; unto whom they declared, after their accustomed manner, with great Complains; what an Heretick Monk had preached, and how he had obtained the Favour almost of all the simple people; which if they did not speedily provide for, and withstand the beginnings, and put the Heretick to death, it would come to pass, that shortly the honour of our Lady, and all Saints, together with the two Abbeyes, should utterly come to ruine and decay.

When these simple and ignorant men heard these words, they were greatly moved. Whereunto Peter Swine answered thus, That they had before written unto the Parish Priest and to Henry what was best to be done; notwithstanding, if they thought good, they would write again. No, said the Prior, this matter must be attempted another way: for if you write unto the Heretick, he will by and by answer you again. And it is to be feared, lest the contagion of his Heresie also do infect you, being unlearned men: for if you give him leave to speak, and to answer, there is no hope that you shall overcome him. Wherefore they finally determined to take this Henry by night, and burn him before the People should know it, or he come to his defence to answer. This device pleased all men, but especially the Franciscan Friars. Petrus Hannus the Priors chief Friend, willing to get the chief Praise and thanks of this matter, by the help of Master Gunter, did associate unto him certain other Rulers of the Towns near adjoining, whose names are here not to be hidden, because they too much affected Praise and Glory. The Names of the Presidents were these, Peter Hannus, Peter Swine's Son, Henricke Londane, John Holness, Lawrence Hannemannus, Nicholas Wislinghousius, Ambrose and John Brentiusius, Marquardus Krenmerius, Hofstedanus Ludewes, Joannes Wislingus, and Petrus Grysfus, President of Hemmingstade. All these Presidents, and all other that were of Counsel to this pretence, assembled together in the Parish of the new Church, in the House of M. Gunter, where also the Chancellor was consulting together with them how they might burn the said Henry secretly, coming upon him without any Judgment or Sentence. They concluded the next day after the Conception of our Lady, to meet at Henning, which is five Miles from Meldorf, with a great Band of Husbandmen. This Determination thus made, they layed Scouts in every place, that there should no news of their pretended Michiefs come to Meldorf; commanding that as soon as it began to wax dark, they should all gather together. There assembled above five hundred men of the Country, unto whom was declared the cause of their Assembly, and also they were instructed what was to be done; for before no man knew the cause of the Assembly, but only the Presidents. When the Husbandmen understood it, they would have returned back again, refusing such a detestable and horrible deed. The Presidents with most bitter threats kept them in obedience; and to the intent they should be the more courageous, they gave them three Barrels of Ham-A-drinken [Murther] borough Beer to drink.

About midnight they came in Armour to Meldorf, Hennegus the Jacobines and Monks prepared Torches for them, that Henry should not slip away suddenly in the dark. They had also with them a false Betrayer, named Hennegus, by whose whose Treason they had perfect knowledge of all things. With great violence they burst into the house of the Parish Priest, breaking and spoiling all things, as the manner of that drunken People is. If they found either Gold or Silver they took it away. When they had spoiled all things, they violently fell upon the Parish Priest, and with great noise cried out, Kill the Thief, Kill the Thief. Some of them took him by the hair of the Head, and pulled him out into the dirt, forcing him to go with them as Prisoner. Other some cried out, saying, that the Parish Priest was not to be medled withal, for they had no Committion to take him. After they had satisfied their Lust upon the Parish Priest, with great Rage and Fury they ran upon Henry, and drawing him naked out of his Bed, bound his hands hard behind him: whom being so bound, they drew to and fro so long, that Peter Hannus, which otherwise was unmerciful and a cruel Persecutor of the Word of God, willed them that they should let him alone; for that without doubt he would follow of his own mind. Then they committed the guiding of him to John Balce, who rather drew him by violence than led him: when he was brought to Hemmingsted, they asked of him how and for what intent he came to Dietsmar? unto whom he gently declared the whole cause of his coming: but they all in a rage cried out, Away with him, away with him; for if we hear him talk any longer, it is to be feared that he will make us all Hereticks. Then he, being marvellous weary and faint, required to be set on horse-back, for his Feet were all cut and hurt with the Ice, because he was led all night barefoot. When they heard him say so, they mocked and laughed at him, saying, Must we hire an Horse for an Heretic, he shall go a foot whether he will or no? Because it was night they carried him naked to Heide. Afterward they brought him to a certain man's House named Caldon, and bound him there with Chains in the Stocks. The Master of the house seeing the cruel deed, taking compassion upon Henry, would not suffer it to be done. Wherefore he was carried away to a Priests house, the Officials Servant of Hamburg, and that up in a Cupboard, and was kept by the rude People, which all the night mocked and scorned him. Amongst all other there came unto him, Simon in Alsenord, and Christian, Parish Priest of the new Church, both alike ignorant and wicked Persecutors of the Word of God, demanding of him why he had forsaken his holy Habit? unto whom he friendly answered by the Scriptures; but those ignorant Persons understood nothing what he said. Mr. Gunterus also came unto him, inquiring whether he had rather to be sent to the Bishop of Breme, or receive his Punishment in Dietsmar? unto whom Henry answered, If I have preached any thing contrary to God's Word, or done any wicked Act, it is in their hands to punish me therefore. Gunterus answered, Hark, I pray you good Friends, hark, he desireth to suffer in Dietsmar. The common People all the night continued in immoderate drinking and swilling.

In the Morning about eight of the clock, they gathered together in the Market-place to consult what they should do: Where the rusticall People boiling with drink, cried out, Burn him, Burn him, to the Fire with the Heretic. Without doubt, if we do it, we shall this day obtain great Glory and Praise both of God and Man; for the longer he liveth, the more he will seduce with his Heresie. What need many words? Sure he was to die; for they had condemned this good Henry without any Judgment (his Cause not being heard) to be burned. At last they commanded the Crier to proclaim, That every man that was at the taking of him, should be ready in Armour to bring him forth to the Fire. Amongst all other the Friars Franciscans were present, encouraging the drunken rude People, saying, Now you go the right way to work. Then they bound the said Henry, Hands, Feet, and Neck, and with great noise brought him forth to the Fire. As he passed by, a certain Woman standing in her door, beholding that pitiful sight, wept abundantly. Unto whom Henry turning himself, said, I pray you weep not for me. When he came to the Fire, for very weakness he fainted down upon the ground. By and by there was present one of the Presidents named May, which was evidently known to be corrupted and bribed with money to this purpose, he condemned the said Henry to be burned, pronouncing this Sentence upon him.

Forasmuch as this Thief hath wickedly preached against the worship of our blessed Lady, by the Commandment and Sufferance of our Reverend Father in Christ, the Bishop of Breme, and my Lord, I condemn him here to be burned and consumed with Fire. Unto whom Henry answered, I have done no such thing; and, lifting up his Hands towards Heaven, he said, O Lord forgive them, for they offend ignorantly, not knowing what they do: thy Name, O Almighty God, is holy.

In the mean time a certain Woman, the Wife of one Jungar, Sister of Peter Hannus, offered her self to suffer a thousand stripes, and to give them much money, so that they would pacifie the matter, and keep him in Prison, until that he might plead his matter before the whole Convocation of the Country. When they had heard these words, they waxed more mad, and threw the Woman down under feet, and trod upon her, and beat the said Henry unmercifully. One of the furious foot struck him behind on the head with a sharp Dagger. John Holmes of the new Church struck him with a Mace. Other some thrust him in the Back, and in the Arms. And this was not done once or twice, but as often as he began to speak. Master Gunter cried out, encouraging them, saying, Go to boldly good Fellows, truly God is with us present.

After this, he brought a Franciscan Frier unto Henry, that he should be confessed. Whom Henry demanded in this manner; Brother, when have I done you injury, either by word or deed, or when did I ever provoke you to anger? Never said the Frier. What should I then confess unto you, said he, that you think you might forgive me? The Frier, being moved at these words, departed. The fire as often as it was kindled, would not burn. Notwithstanding they satisfied their minds upon him, striking and pricking him with all kind of Weapons. The said Henry standing in the mean time in his Shirt before all this rude people; at the last they having gotten a great Ladder, bound him hard thereunto, and cast him into the fire. And when he began to pray, and to repeat his Creed, one struck him upon the Face with his Fist, saying, Thou shalt first be burnt, and afterward pray and prate as much as thou wilt. Then another treading upon his Breast, bound his Neck so hard to a step of the Ladder, that the Blood gushed out of his Mouth and Nose. This was done to strangle him withal, for they saw that for all his sore Wounds he would not die.

After he was bound to the Ladder, he was set upright. Then one running unto him, let his Halbert for the Ladder to lean against (for those Countrymen use no common Hangman, but every man exerciseth the Office without difference) but the Ladder, slipping away from the point of the Halbert, caused that the Halbert struck him through the Body. Then they cast this good man, Ladder and all upon the Wood, which tumbling down light upon the one side. Then John Holmes ran unto him, and struck him with a Mace upon the Breast, till he was dead and stired no more. Afterward they roasted him upon the Coals; for the Wood, as often as it was set on fire, would not burn out. And thus this godly Preacher finished his Martyrdom, which was Anno 1524. Ex Epist. Mart. Lut.

About the same time many other godly persons, and such as feared God, for the Testimony of the Gospel, were thrown into the River of Rhene, and into other Rivers, where their Bodies afterward were found, and taken up. Also in the said Town of Dietsmar another faithful Saint of God, named John, suffered the like Martyrdom. Thus these two blessed and constant Martyrs, as two shining Lights set up of God, in Testimony of his Truth, offered up the Sacrifice of their Confession sealed with their Blood, in a sweet favour unto God.

At the Town of Hala likewise, another Preacher named M. George, for ministering in both kinds, was martyred and slain of a like sort of Cut-throats set up by the Monks and Friars to murder him, near to the Town called Hafschenburg. Ex Crisp. & Pant.

At Prague also in Bohemia another, for changing his Monastery into Matrimony, did suffer in the like manner. Ex Lud. Rab.

Furthermore, in the same year of our Lord above-mentioned 1524, and the two and twentieth of October, the Town of Miltenberg in Germany, was taken and ransacked, and divers of the Inhabitants were slain, and many imprisoned for Melden is a City in France, ten miles distant from Paris, where John Clerk was first apprehended and taken, Anno. 1523, for setting up upon the Church-door a certain Bill against the Pope's Pardons lately sent thither from Rome, in which Bill he named the Pope to be Antichrist.

For the which his Punishment was this, That three several days he should be whipped, and afterward have a Mark imprinted in his Forehead, as a note of Infamy. His Mother being a Christian Woman, altho her Husband was an Adversary, when he beheld her Son thus pitiously scourged, and ignominiously deformed in the Face, constantly and boldly did encourage her Son, crying with a loud voice, Blessed be Christ, and welcome be these Prints and Marks.

John Clerk

After this Execution and Punishment sustained, the said John departed that Town, and went to Rosie in Bry, and from thence removed to Metz in Lotharing, where he remained a certain space, applying his Vocation, being a Wool-carder by his Occupation. Whereas he the day before that the People of that City should go out to the Suburbs to worship certain blind Idols near by (after an old use and custom amongst them received) being inflamed with the zeal of God, went out of the City to the place where the Images were, and bratt them all down in pieces. The next morrow after when the Canons, Priests, and Monks, keeping their old Custom, had brought with them the people out of the City to the place of Idolatry, to worship as they were wont they found all their Blocks and Stocks almighty ly broken upon the ground. At the sight whereof they being mightily offended in their minds, let all the City on a Cogs to search out the Author thereof, who was not hard to be found; forasmuch as this forefard Clerk, betides that he was noted of them to be a man much addicted that way, he was also seen somewhat late in the Evening before to come from the fause place into the City. Whereupon he being suspected and examined upon the same, at first confessed the Fact, rendering also the cause which moved him so to do, The People hearing this, and being not yet acquainted with that kind of Doctrine, were moved marvellously against him, crying out upon him in a great rage. Thus his cause being informed to the Judges, wherein he defended the pure Doctrine of the Son of God, he was condemned, and led to the place of Execution, where he sustained extreme Torments. For first his Hand was cut off from his right Arm, then his Nose with flarp Pinns was violently plucked from his Face; after that both his Arms and his Paps were likewise plucked and drawn with the same Instrument. To all them that stood looking on, it was an horror to behold the grievous and doleful sight of his Pains: again to behold his patience, or rather the Grace of God giving him the gift to suffer, it was a wonder.
Thus quietly and constantly he endured in his Torments, pronouncing, or in a manner singing the Verses of the hundred and fiftenth Psalm: Simulacra eorum sunt argentum & aurum, &c. Their Images are Silver and Gold, the work only of man's hand, &c. The residue of his life that remained in his rent Body, was committed to the fire, and therewith consumed; which was about the year of our Lord,

Doctor and Martyr.

The year next ensuing, which was 1525, Master John Cas- tellane born at Toureny, a Dr. of Divinity, after that he was called to the knowledge of God, and became a true Preacher of his Word, and had preached in France, in a place called Barleduc, also at Vitry in Paroisse, at Chalon in Champaine, and in the Town of Vike, which is the Chamber and Episcopal Seat of the Bishop of Metz in Lo- rain, after he had laid some Foundation of the Doctrine of the Gospel in the Town of Metz, intretuning from thence he was taken Prisoner by the Cardinal of Lorain's Servants, by whom he was carried from Gorge to the Castle of Nonnenie; whereupon the Citizens of Metz took no little displeasure and grievance; who being grievously offended to have their Preacher so to be apprehended and imprisoned, within short space after took certain of the Cardinals Subjects, and kept them Prisoners so long, until the Abbat of St. Antonies in Viennois, called Theodore de Chaumont, Vicar General, as well in Causes Spiritual as Temporal, through the Jurisdiction both of the Cardinal, and Bishoprick of Metz, Toulouze and Verdune, being furnished with an Officer and Commission from the See of Rome, came to the said Town of Metz; and after divers Declarations made to the Provost; and to the other Justices and Counsellors of the City, he so wrought and brought to pass, that immediately the said Subjects of the Cardinal were set at liberty: but John Castellane was kept still Prisoner in the Castle of Nonnenie, and was most cruelly handled from the time of the fourth day of May, until the twelfth day of January: during all which he persevered constant in the Doctrine of the Son of God. Whereupon he was carried from Non- menie to the Town and Castle of Vike, always persevering constantly in the profession of the same Doctrine; so that they did proceed unto the Sentence of his Degradation, that he might be delivered over unto the secular Power, according to the custom and manner. And forsomuch as the form and manner of the Sentence and Process of degrading is notable, and hath been reported unto us word for word, we have thought good here to annex the same, to declare the horrible Blasphemies joyed with gross and brutish subtilty, in those high Mysteries which the Enemies of the Truth do use in their Process against the Children of God; whereby every man, even the most ignorant, may evidently perceive the horrible Blindness that these unthamefard Catholics are blinded withal.

Concerning the Process inquisitory, formed and given in form of an Accusation against thee John Cas- tellane, Priest, and Religious Man of the Friars Remiter of the Order of St. Austin; understanding likewise thy Confession which thou hast made of thine own good Will, maintaining false and erroneous Doctrine; and marking also besides this the godly Admonitions, and charitable Exhortations which we made unto thee in the Town of Metz, and given thee like unto the Serpent Aspis, hast refused and willed no ear unto: Also considering thine Answers made and resolute unto Interrogatories, by means of thine Oath, in the which devilishly thou hast hidden and kept back, not only the Truth, but also, following the example of Cain, hast denied to confess thy sins and mischievous offence: And finally, hearing the great number of Witnesses sworn and examined against thee, their Persons and Depositions diligently considered, and all other things worthy of consideration being justly examined, the Reverend Master Nicolas Savin, Doctor of Divinity, and Inquisitor of the Faith, Assistants unto us, hast entered Process against thee, and given full Information thereof; this our purpose and intent being also communicated unto divers Masters and Doctors both of the Civil and Canon Laws here present, which have subscribed and signed there-unto, whereby it appears, that thou John Castellane hast often times, and in divers places openly and manifestly spread abroad, and taught many erroneous Propositions, full of the Hersey of Luther, contrary and against the Catholic Faith, and the Verity of the Gospel, and the holy Apostolick See, and so accursedly looked back and turned thy face, that thou art found to be a Lye: before Almighty God. It is ordained by the sacred Rules of the Canon-Law, that such as through the sharp Darts of their venomous Tongue do pervert the Scriptures, and go about with all their power to corrupt and infect the Souls of the Faithful, should be punished and corrected with most sharp Correction, to the end that others should be as fraid to attempt the like, and apply themselves the better to the study of Christian Concord, through the example set before their eyes, as well of Severity, as of Clemency. For these Causes and others rising upon the said Process, by the Apostolick Authority, and also the Authority of our said Reverend Lord the Cardinal, which we do use in this our Sentence definitive, which we sitting in our Judgment-seat declare in these Writings, having God only before our eyes, and surely considering, that what Measure we do meet unto others, the same shall be measured to us again: We pronounce and declare sententially and definitively thee John Castellane, being here present before us, and judge thee, because of thy Desert, to be excommunicate with the most great Excommunication, and therewithal to be culpable of Treason against the Divine Majesty, and a mortal Enemy of the Catholick Faith, and Verity of the Gospel; also to be a manifest Heretic, and a Follower and Partaker of the execrable *cruelty of Martin Luther, a stirrer up of old Heresies already condemned: and therefore as thou oughtest to be deposed and deprived of all Priestly Honour and Dignity, of all thy Orders, of thy Stating and religious Habit, also of thy Ecclesiastical Benefices, if thou hast any, and from all Privilege of the Clergy: So we here presently do depose, deprive, and separate thee, as a rotten Member, from the Communion and Company of all the faithful: And being so deprived, we judge that thou oughtest to be actually degraded: that done, we leave thee unto the secular Powers, committing the Degradation and actual Execution of this our Sentence unto the Reverend Lord and Bishop here present, with the Authority and Commandment aforesaid.

This Sentence being thus ended with their Catholick Sermon also, the said Bishop of Nisopolis sitting in his Pontificalibus in the Judgment-seat, being Suffragan of Metz, with the Clergy, Nobles and People about him, proceeded to the degrading (as they call it) of the said Mr. John Castellane. Thus the said Master John Castellane being prepared and made ready to his Degradation by the Officers of the said Bishop, was apparelled in his Priestly Attire, and afterward brought forth of the Chapel by the Priests which were therunto appointed, with all his Priestly Ornaments upon him, and holding his hands together, he knelt down before the Bishop. Then the Officers gave him the Chalice in his hands, with Wine and Water, the Parine, and the Host; all which things the said Bishop which degraded him, took from him, saying; We take away from thee, or command to be taken from thee, all Power to offer Sacrifice unto God, and to lay Mats, as well for the quick as the dead.

Moreover, the Bishop scraped the Nails of both his Hands with a piece of Glass, saying, By this scraping we take away from thee all power to sacrifice to consecrate, and to bless, which thou hast received by the anointing of thy Hands. Then he took away from him the Chafin, saying; By good right we do dispoil thee of this Priestly Ornament, which signifieth Charity: for certainly thou hast forsaken the same, and all Innocency. Then taking away the Stole, he said: Thou hast villainously rejected and despised the sign of our Lord, which is represented by this Stole: wherefore we take it away from thee, and make thee unable to exercise and use the Office of Priesthood, and all other things appertaining to Priesthood, The Degradation of the order of Priesthood being thus ended, they proceeded to the order of Deacon. Then the Ministers gave him the Book of the Gospels, which the Bishop took away, saying; We take away from thee all power to read the Gospels in the Church of God, for it appertaineth only to such as are worthy. After this he spoiled him of the Dalmatike, which is the Vesture that the Deacons use, saying; We deprive thee of this Levitical Order: forasmuch as thou hast not fulfilled thy Ministry and Office. After this the Bishop took away the Stole from behind his back, saying; We justly take away from thee the white Stole which thou hast received undoubtedly, which also thou oughtest to have born in the presence of our Lord: and to the end that the People dedicate unto the name of Christ, may take by thee example, we prohibit thee any more to exercise or use the Office of Deaconship. Then they proceeded to the degrading of Subdeaconship, and taking away from him the Book of the Epistles, and his Subdeacon's Vesture, deposed him from reading of the Epistles in the Church of God: and so orderly proceeding unto all the other Orders, degraded him from the Order of Benet and Collet, from the Order of Exorcist, from the Lecturship, and last of all, from the Office of Door-keeper, taking from him the Keys, and commanding him hereafter not to open or shut the Reveltry, nor to ring any more Bells in the Church. That done, the Bishop went forward to degrade him from his first shaving, and taking away his Surplice, said unto him; By the Authority of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and by our Authority we take away from thee all Clerkly Habit, and depolish thee of all Ornament of Religion: Alas we do depolish and degrade thee of all Order, Benefit and Privilege of the Clergy, and as one unworthy of that Profession, we commit thee to the servitude and ignominy of the secular State. Then the Bishop took the Sheers and began to clip his head, saying in this manner. We cast thee out as an unthankful Child of the Lord's Heritage, wherunto thou wast called, and take away from thy head the Crown, which is the Royal sign of Priesthood, through thine own wickedness and malice. The Bishop also added these words: That which thou hast sung with thy mouth, thou hast not believed with thy heart, nor accomplished in work, wherefore we take from thee the Office of singing in the Church of God.

Truly you say, for your measure is death definitive, and therefore look you for the same measure again at Gods hand.

The degrading thus ended, the Procurator Fiscal of the Court and City of Metz, required of the Notary an Instrument or Copy of the degrading: then the Ministers of the Bishop turned him out of his clerical Habit, and put upon him the Apparel of a secular Man. That done, inasmuch as he which is degraded, according to the institution of Pope Innocent the third, ought to be delivered unto the secular Court, the Bishop that degraded him proceeded no further, but said in this manner: We pronounce that the secular Court shall receive thee into their charge, being thus degraded of all clerical honour and privilege.

Note here these Persecutors, how they will from outwardly to be Lambs, but inwardly are roaring Wolves.

This done, the Bishop, after a certain manner, intreated the secular Judge for him, saying, My Lord Judge, we pray you as heartily as we can, for the love of God, and the contemplation of tender pity and mercy, and for the respect of our Prayers, that you will not in any point do any thing that shall be hurtful to this miserable Man, or tending to his death, or maiming of his Body. These things thus done, the secular Judge of the Town of Vike, condemning the foresaid Sentence, condemned the foresaid Mr. John Castellane to be burned quick: which death he suffered the twelfth day of January, 1525, with such a constancy, that not only a great company of ignorant people were thereby drawn to the knowledge of the Verity, but also a great number, which had already some taste thereof, were greatly confirmed by that his constant and valiant death.

Joannes Diazius, a Spaniard, Martyr, killed of his own Brother at Neoberge in Germany, Anno 1546.

The cruel murdering of John Diazius.

OF this John Diazius, the full Process and Historie is set forth in Latin, wherein the whole circumstance is debated at large, whereof the brief sum is this; John Diazius, a Spaniard born, first being at Paris thirteen years, from thence returned to Geneva, then to Basel, and after to Strasburg: from whence he was sent Embassador with Bucer and others, to the Council at Ratisbone; where he talking with Peter Malvenda his Country-man, the Pope's Factor, declared his Religion unto him, that Malvenda wrote to the Friar, which was the Emperor's Confessor, touching the said John Diazius: at the opening and reading of which Letters, one Marquina another Spaniard was present. Upon this it followed, whether by this Confessor, or by Marquina, that Alphonsus Diazius, Brother to John Diazius, which was one of the Pope's Lawyers in Rome, had knowledge given him of his Brother John.

The Emperor's Confessor.

Alphonsus Diazius came from Rome to kill his Brother.

When the communication of Ratisbone was dissolved and broken up, John Diazius from Ratisbone, went to the City of Neoberge, within the Dominion of Otto Henry Palatine, about the expedition of Bucer's Book there to be printed. As John Diazius was there occupied, it was not long but Alphonsus his Brother was come from Rome to Ratisbone, where Malvenda was, bringing with him a pestilent Cut-throat, a notorious Ruffian or Homicide, belonging to the City of Rome. Malvenda and Alphonsus, consulting together about the dispatch of their devilish purpose, first laboured to hunt out by the Friends of Diazius, where Diazius was; whereof Alphonsus and the Homicide having knowledge by certain of his secret Friends, pretending great matters of importance, came to Neoberge, where Diazius was printing of Bucer's Book: where after long debating of Matters of Religion between the two Brethren, Alphonsus seeing the heart of his Brother John to be so constantly planted on the sure Rock of God's Truth, that by no wise he could either be removed from his Opinion, or persuaded to ride in his Company (being otherwise counselled by Bucer and his Friends) fained himself friendly to take his leave of his Brother and to depart: But shortly after, secretly with his ruffianly murderer he returned again, and by the way they bought a certain Hatchet of a Carpenter.

This done, Alphonsus sendeth his Man, being disguised, with Letters unto his Brother, he himself following after. As John Diazius in the morning was risen out of his Bed to read the Letters, the wretched Hangman with his Hatchet, clove his Head unto the Brains, leaving the Hatchet in his Head; and so he with Alphonsus took them to their Houses, which stood without the City Gate, with as much speed as they might. They of Neoberge, hearing of the horrible Act, sent out certain Horsemen, making great journeys after them. Who coming to Augusta, and hearing the Murderers to be passed before, were out of hope to overtake them, and so returned. One in the Company, more zealous than the rest, would not return, but pursued them still, and in the City of Onipont, caused them to be stayed and put in Prison.

God will have murder known.

Otto Palatine, hearing of their taking, writeth to the Magistrates of Onipont for Judgment. Which Magistrates at first seemed very willing thereto: But in conclusion, through the practice of Papists, and crafty Lawyers, the Sentence judicial was so delayed, from day to day, then from hour to hour, that the Emperor's Letters came in post-haste, requiring the Matter to be flaid, and referred to his hearing. And thus the terrible murder of Cain and his Fellow, was boultured out by the Papists. The like whereof, from the memory of Men, was never heard of, since the first example of Cain; which for Religion slew his own Brother Abel. But altho true Judgment in this World be perverted, yet such bloody Cains, with their wilful murder, shall not escape the hands of him, who shall judge truly both the Committers, and the Bolsterers also of all mischievous wickedness. Ex Claud. Senec.

Cain still kills Abel.

Anno 1546, Charles the Emperor held an armed-Council at Augusta, after his Victory gotten in Germany. Where Julius Pfug, Michael Sidorius, and John Iffelin, going about to concord together the Gospel of Christ, with the Traditions of the Pope, that is, to make a hodge-potch of them both, drew and framed out a new form of Religion, called Interim. Whereupon began a new matter of Persecution in Germany. For the Emperor proceeded finally against them which would not receive his Interim, intending thereby to have wrought some great mastery against the Gospellers, but the Lord disappointed his purpose.

Interim.

Among them which withstood this Spanish Interim, besides others, were also the Citizens of Constantia. For the which three thousand Spaniards, privily by night, came against the Town of Constance, where they killed three of the Watchmen of the Town, which watching in the Suburbs, went forth to view the noise which they heard in the Woods. The device of the Spaniards was, in the morning when the Citizens were at the Sermon, suddenly to set upon the City and take it; so, no doubt, intending to have gone further. But, as the Lord would, something began to be suspected in the Night, by the Watchmen on the Suburbs on the other side the Water, whereby the Council and Citizens had intelligence to be in readiness. When the morning came, the Spaniards were ready at the Gate to break into the City. But being driven from thence, and their Captain Alphonsus slain, they went to the Bridge which goeth over the Rhine. But being beaten also from thence with shot, and great Pieces from the Walls, and a great number of them drowned in the River, the Spaniards breaking down the hinder part of the Bridge, because the Citizens should not pursue them, they recoiled back into the Suburbs, and burned them with the dead Bodies also that were slain, so that the number of the Spaniards that were killed could not be known: Only an hundred of honest Citizens were missing. Ex Joan. Sleid. Lib. 21.

The assault of the Spaniards against the City of Constance.

At the same time many godly Ministers of the Churches in Germany, were in great danger, especially such as refused to receive the Interim: of whom some were cast into Prison. In which number of Prisoners, was Martin Frelius, Superintendent of Ulm, with four other Preachers more: also his Brother George, for coming but to his house to comfort him. For the which cause Malvenda the same time, with other Preachers more, went from Aurburg, Brentius from Hala, Blawern from Constance, Bucer from Strasburg.

It would had another Volume, to comprehend the Acts and Stories of all them, which in other Countries, at the rising of the Gospel, suffered for the same. But praised be the Lord, every Region almost hath his own History-writer, which sufficiently hath discharged that part of duty, as every one in matters of his own Country is best acquainted: wherefore I shall the less need to overtrain my travel, or to overcharge this Volume therewith. Only it shall suffice me to collect three or four Histories, recorded by Oecolampadius and the rest, to bring into a brief Table, and so return to occupy my self with our own Domestical Matters here done at home.

The History of a good Pastor, murdered for preaching of the Gospel: Written by John Oecolampadius.

A good Priest murdered for evil will.

IN the year of our Lord 1525, there was a certain good and godly Minister, who had committed something in the commotion there raised by the rusticall Clowns of the Country, which, they said that knew him, was but of small importance. He because he had offended his Prince before, not with any fact or crime but with some word something sharply spoken, was therefore condemned to be hang'd.

Ungentle-ness in a Gentleman.

After Sentence was given, there was a Gentleman of a cruel heart sent with a certain troop of Men to apprehend the said Priest, and to hang him. Who, coming into his house, saluted him friendly, pretending as tho their coming had been to make good cheer; for he was a good House-keeper, and the Gentlemen of the Country therabouts used oft-times to resort unto his house familiarly. This Priest made ready for them in short space a very sumptuous Banquet, whereof they did eat and drink very cheerfully. After Dinner was ended, and that the Priest was yet at the Table thinking no hurt, the Gentleman said to his Servants, take you this Priest our Host and hang him, and that without delay; for he hath well deserved to be hanged for the great offence he hath committed against his Prince. The Servants were marvellously astonished with his words, and abhorring to do the deed, said unto their Master, God forbid that we should commit any such crime, to hang a Man that hath intreated us so gently: for the meat, which he hath given us, is yet in our stomachs undigested. It were a wicked act for a Nobleman to render so great an evil for a good turn; but especially to murder an innocent. Briefly, the Servants sought no other occasion, but only to give him way to fly, that they might also avoid the execution of that wicked purpose.

As the Gentleman and his Servants were thus contending, the Priest said unto them, I beseech you shew no such cruelty upon me, rather lead me away captive unto my Prince, where I may purge my self. I am falsely accused, and I trust to pacify his anger which he hath conceived against me. At least remember the hospitality which I have ever shewed to you, and all Noblemen at all times resorting to my house. But principally speaking to the Gentleman, he advertised him of the perpetual sting which would follow upon an evil Conscience: protesting that he had faithfully and truly taught them the Doctrine of the Gospel, and that was the principal cause why he had such evil will: which long time before he had foreseen would come to pass, for so much as he had oftentimes in the Pulpit reproved sharply and openly the horrible Vices of the Gentlemen, which maintained their people in their vicious living, and they themselves were given unto blasphemy and drunkenness, whereas they should shew example of Faith, true Religion, and Sobriety, but they had oftentimes resisted him, saying, that it was not his part to reprove them, for so much as they were his Lords, and might put him to death if they would: that all things which they did were allowable, and that no Man ought to gainsay it: also that he went about some things in his Sermons, that would come to an evil end.

Many things may be pretended, but Religion is ever the cause why
go to wrack.

This good Man, whatsoever he could say, could not make his matter seem good; for the Gentleman continued in his wicked enterprise, and pricked forth his Servants still to accomplish their purpose: for it was resolved by the Prince, that he should be put to death, and turning himself unto the Priest, he said, that he could gain nothing by preaching in such sort, but that he should fully determine himself to die, for the Prince had given express commandment to hang him, whose favour he would not lose to save his life.

At last the Servants, after great sorrow and lamentation, bound their Host, and hanged him upon a Beam in his own house, the Gentleman standing by and looking upon.

This good Man, seeing no remedy, spake none other words but only, Jesus have mercy upon me; Jesus save me. This is the truth of this most cruel act, which a Turk would scarcely have committed against his mortal Enemy. Now let every Man judge with himself, which of them have the greatest advantage, either they which commit the cruelty against the good, or the good Men which do suffer the same unjustly. The first sort have a continual gnawing in their Conscience, and the other obtain an immortal Crown.

The like History of the death of a certain Minister, named M. Pet. Spengler, which was drowned in the year of our Lord 1525; collected by Oecolampadius.

IN a certain Village named Schlat, in the Country of A descript- on of a good Minister of Cura.
Brigoi, there was a vigilant Minister, a Man very well learned in the Scriptures, of a good name, for that he lived a godly and a blameless life, having long time faithfully done his Office and Duty, being also courteous and gentle, and well-beloved of Men, but especially of the Bishop of Constance with whom he was in great Authority, peaceable and quiet with all Men that he had to do withal. He quieted Discords and Contentions with a marvelous prudence, exhorting all Men to mutual charity and love. In all Assemblies whereof he came, he greatly commended honest life and amendment of manners. When the purity of the Gospel began to shine abroad, he began to read with great affection the Holy Scriptures, which long time before he had read, but without any understanding. When he had recovered a little judgment, and came to more understanding by continual reading, being also further grown in age, he began to consider with himself, in how great darkness and errors the whole Order of Priests had been a long time drowned. O good God, said he, who would have thought it, that so many learned and holy Men have wandered out of the right way, and could have so long time been wrapped in so great Errors, or that the Holy Scripture could have been so deformed with such horrible abuses: for he never well understood before, he said, that the Gospel was the Verity of God, in that order, wherein it is written, seeing it containeth so much touching the Cross, Persecution, and Ignominious death; and yet the Priests lived in great prosperity, and no Man durst maintain any quarrel against them without danger. He also saw that the hour was come that the Gospel should be display'd, that Persecution was at hand, that the Enemies of the Truth began now to rage, that the wicked and proud lifted up their heads on high, and feared not to enterprize and take in hand all kind of mischief and wickedness against the Faithful, that the Bishops, which ought by their virtue and power to defend the Word, were more barbarous and cruel than any Tyrants had been before. He, thus considering the present estate of the World, put all doubt from his heart, and saw presently before his eyes, that Jesus Christ had taught the Truth, seeing so many Bodies of the Faithful were daily so tormented, beaten, exiled, banished, drowned, and burned. For who can report the great torments, which the innocent have endured these years passed, even by those which call themselves Christians, and for no other cause, but only for the true confession of Jesus Christ? This good Pastor considering with himself the Laws and Doctrine of the Church of Rome to sever from the truth of Christ, especially in restraining Marriage: to the end that he would not defile himself with Fornication, he married a Maid of his, such an one as feared God, by whom afterward he had many fair Children.

1 Tim. 3

About this time the People of the Country had raised a great Commotion, who in their rage went to Monasteries, and Priests houses, as if they had taken in hand some Pilgrimage, and spared nothing that they could find to eat. That which they could not eat, they either cast under feet, or carried it away with them. One Company of this rusticall sort lodged themselves in the house of this good Priest: for they made no difference between the good and the bad. These Rotters took from him all that they could find, leaving nothing behind them, inasmuch as they took Critely and Edition never cometh to good end. As they were departing out of the house, the good Priest could not refrain himself from weeping, saying unto them, I tell you before, these your inordinate doings will redound to some great mischief to your selves. For what madnes is this? what meaneth this rage and tumult, wherein you keep no order or equity, neither have any respect between Friend and Foe? Who thus stirreth you up? what counsel do you follow, or to what end do you this? Like Thieves you spoil whatsoever you can lay hands upon. And think you not but these things which you now rob, raven, and steal, you shall be compelled hereafter to restore again to your great detriment. What sedition did ever come to good end? You pretend the Gospel, and have no peace of the Gospel either in your mouths or in your hearts. These excesses, said he, y never learned of me, who ever have taught you the true Word of God. This your Gospel, said he, is rather the Gospel of the Devil than of God, which vexeth all the World with violence and wrong, spoiling and robbing without regard. The true Gospel of Jesus Christ teacheth you to do good unto all Men, to avoid diffentions and perjury. This I say unto you, that in these your doings you offend God, and provoke his just vengeance to plague you, which will never suffer these Evils to escape unpunished. You find written in the Gospel, That which thou wouldst not have done to thee, do not to other. You offend also the Nobility, and your lawful Magistrates, whom you are sworn and bound unto. It is no small matter, I tell you, to raise up Sedition, to stir up other, and to disturb the state of the Common-wealth: and when this tumult shall be ceased, what then shall your Noblemen do? Shall they not rise you as fast, and of your goods make themselves rich, and then shall one of you betray another. These with such other words he flood preaching unto them, almost naked; but all this would not prevail with those Men, who, after all these gentle admonitions and fair words, departed out of his house, giving him foul language, and calling him old Dotard. Amongst all other, one more wicked than the residue said unto him in this manner: O Master Curate, we have been long deceived by your selling of Masses, by fearing us with Purgatory, by your Dirges and Trentals, and so have we been spoiled: wherefore we do nothing now, but require again the Money which you robbed us of. And so mocking and scolding him, they departed.

Critely and Edition never cometh to good end.

The Gospel teacheth no rebellion.

After that this Sedition of the Peasants was partly appeased, their Armor being laid away, and they taken unto grace; after that also divers of the principals of that Conspiracy were taken here and there in the Villages, and executed: this good Pastor, fearing no such thing, for the true and sincere preaching of the Gospel, whereat many took great indignation, was taken in the night by certain Souldiers, which bound him hand and foot with a great Rope, before his Wife and Children, and so fet him upon a Horse, and led him away to Friburg. What grievous lights, tears, sorrow, and lamentation was there! It would have moved any heart, (were it as hard as Flint) to a doleful compassion, especially to see the barbarous and despiteful rebukes, taunts, and extreme cruelty shewed by these proud Popish Souldiers against the innocent Priest. Such beastly Tyrants the World is never without. Such godly Ministers we have had but a few.

The People, hearing this pitiful noise and lamentation in the night, came running out, not the Men, but only the Women, whom the Souldiers willed to go home again, and that their Men should come forth and keep the Town, but their Men durst not appear. Then from Friburg shortly after they conveyed him to Enfheim.

After they had long kept this Man in Prison, and that he had endured most terrible Torments, as well by the Privy-members, as in other parts, they judged him to death. If you will know the cause what they had to lay to his charge, it was only this, That he had married a Wife secretly in his own House with a few Witnesses. Other Crimes they had none to object against him, neither that he was a seditious and wicked Man, nor that he had committed any other offence, albeit they had gathered divers wicked Persons out of sundry places, to pick out of his Sermons the order and manner of his behaviour. When he was led unto the place of Execution, he answered gently and quietly unto all Men that came to comfort him. But there were divers Monks and Priests which troubled him very fure with their foolish babbling, as he was striving in his spirit against the horror of death, and making his prayer unto Almighty God, seeking nothing else but to turn him away from his hearty and earnest contemplation. But he desired them that they would hold their peace, saying, that he had already confessed his sins unto the Lord Jesus, nothing at all doubting but that he had received absolution and forgiveness of them all. And I, said he, shall be an acceptable Sacrifice unto my Saviour Jesus Christ, for I have done no such thing wherefore I am now condemned, which might displease my Lord God, who in this behalf hath given me a good and quiet Conscience. Now therefore let them which thirst for innocent Blood, and shed the same, diligently advise themselves what they do, and know that they offend even him unto whom it pertaineth truly to judge the hearts of Men; for it is said, Vengeance is mine, and I will punish. And forasmuch as he was a very lean Man, he added this moreover, saying, It is all one, for shortly I must have forsaken this Skin which already scarcely hangeth to my Bones; I know well that I am a mortal and a corruptible Worm, and have nothing in me but corruption. I have long time desired my latter day, and have made my request that I might be delivered out of this mortal Body, to be joined with my Saviour Jesus Christ.

I have deserved, through my manifold Sins committed against my Saviour Christ, my Cross; and my Saviour Christ hath borne the Cross, and hath died for me, and for my part I will not glory in any other thing, but only in the Cross of Jesus Christ.

There were present by certain naughty Persons which could not endure to hear this godly Exhortation, but made a sign unto the Hangman to cast him down into the River. After he was thrown down, he moved by a certain space in the Water, in such sort that the River whereinto he was cast was red with blood. This was a certain sign and token that innocent Blood was that day shed. They which were there present, beholding that which had happened, were greatly amazed and astonished, considering with themselves what the staining of the water with the blood should signify. Every man returned home penive and sad, marvelling at the cruel deed that was done that day: notwithstanding, no Man durst open his mouth to speak one word, because that all things were exercised with such cruelty. This was done in the Town of Enfheim, An. 1525.

These things I did understand by one which did behold them with his eyes. The Lord of his great grace be merciful unto us, and forgive us our sins. Ex. Occulamp.

Such was the wickedness then of those days, and yet is still, that whosoever was perceived to favour the Gospel, or any thing to dislike the doctrine of the Pope's Church, he was hated and despised of the Rulers, Lawyers, and all other Papists through the whole Country about, but especially of Priests, Monks, and Friars. And tho the life of the Gospellers were never so found and upright, yet such was the hatred and malice of the Pope's Friends against them, that they never ceased to seek all occasions, and devise matters how to bring them to death.

It so happened a little before this present time, that there was a commotion of the rude and ruffical People of the Country rising in armour inordinately against their Rulers, to the great disturbance of the whole Country of Germany, and no less to their own destruction, of whom were slain above twenty thousand. At length when this Rebellion was appeased, and all things quiet, such as were the Pope's friends, to work their malice against the Gospel, took occasion thereby not long after to accuse and entangle such as they knew to be Gospellers and Protestants. And altho the said Gospellers were never so inculpable and clear from all rebellion, yet that sufficed not, for causes were made, false witness brought, corrupt Judges suborned to condemn the innocent, and many were put to death, their cause being neither heard nor known. By reason whereof a great number of good and innocent Christians were miserably brought to their end and martyrdom: in the number of whom was this poor Man also, whose Story by Occulampad. is thus described,

Rom. 12.

The water in the river collected with blood where he was drowned.

Another History of a certain Man of the Country, wrongfully put to death, collected by the said John Occolampadius.

Ex Ja. Occol.

There was, faith he, a certain Man of the Country, which in my judgment was a good Man, and a lover of Justice, and a mortal Enemy of all the cruel Exactions of the Gentlemen, which oppressed the poor People. This Man, after the Tumult and Commotion of the Country was appeased, was grievously vexed and tormented because he had cried an Alarm, when as a great number of Horsemen ranged about the Country to seek out those which had been the Authors of that Sedition. This poor Man was taken by Policy, and so upholden with fair Promises, that they made him confesse whatsoever they required. He, thinking that they would not have put him to death, was cast into Prison, whereas he was long time detained, and well cherished, to take away all suspicion from him: but after he had tarried a long time in prison, they put him to the Pinbail, laying divers and many grievous Offences to his charge, where they kept him hanging in the Truſs of the Cord the space of six hours, hanging a great Stone fastened at his feet.

The truft of the cord is a certain hanging up by the hands he find, having a weighty stone fastened at their feet.

The Sweat that dropped from his Body for very pain and anguish, was almost Blood. In this distress he cried out pitifully, but all that could not once move the Tormentors Hearts. When as all the power and strength in his body began to fail him, with great violence they let him fall down. There this poor Man lay even as a Stock, not moving any part or member of his Body, but a little drawing his breath, which was a token that there was some life in him. Here the Tormentors were in great doubt what to do with the Man, whom they fought by all means to destroy, in what place they might put him, that he should not die of that torment.

Amongst them there was one which brought Vinegar and Rose-water, and rubbing him therewithal, they did somewhat recover him. After that they had cauled him to eat and drink such as they provided for him, they let him down into a deep Dungeon, where he could see neither Sun nor Moon. All this was done to the intent to put him to more torment, when he had somewhat recovered his strength again. There they let him continue eighteen days, after which time they brought him again to examination, propounding certain Articles unto him, which he constantly denied. They devised divers and sundry kinds of Torments, to the intent they might even of force extort something of this poor Man, which might seem worthy of death; yet for all that they were, fain to depart without their purpose. The twentieth day after these Tyrants hired a Hangman, (a Man sure worthy of his Office) which left no kind of Cruelty unpractised. Yet did he mis of his purpose also, and was constrained to leave his Cruelty, and to pronounce even with his own mouth, that the Man was innocent, in that he had so constantly endured so many horrible and grievous Torments. But these Tyrants came again the fourth time, and suborned two Witnesses against him, this concluding, that he was worthy of death because he had cried Alarm after the Truce was taken, and would have moved a new Sedition. The day was appointed when he should suffer, and they brought unto him the Hangman and a Friar into the Prison.

The innocent Man again tormented.

Fals Wit-ness.

In the mean time this poor Man thought with himself, that they would have shewed him the like cruelty as they had done the night before. They called him out of the Dungeon where they had let him down, certifying him that they had things to tell him for his profit. This they did because he should not die in prison.

He believed the word in Prison to come in the Papists hands.

Then they let down a Cord and a Staff, but they could not persuade him to sit thereupon, saying, that he would rather chuse to die there, than he would endure any more such cruel Torments; if they would promise not to put him any more to the Truſs of the Cord, nor to put him to death, but to bring him before just Judges, on that condition he would come out, altho he had fully determined never to have removed from thence, but to have ended his Life in that Dungeon. There were present certain Counsellors which promised to perform his Request; and thereupon he was taken out of the Dungeon. As soon as he saw the Friar, he cried out with a loud voice, saying,

The false promises of the Papists put in he trusted.

O miserable and wretched Man that I am! now am I betrayed and deceived, for my latter hour is at hand: I see well the Dream which I have dreamed this night will come to effect, for they do handle me tyrannously, and condemn me not being heard. The Friar brake him off from his purpose, and pulling a wooden Croſs out of his Sleeve, presented it unto him, declaring that he must be quiet, because they had already given sentence against him, and that he should gain nothing by so much talk. Poor Man (said the Friar) thou hast had good and gentle Judges, at the least thou shalt go to God, therefore confesse thy Sins in my ear, and after thou shalt receive absolution at my hands, doubt not but this day thou shalt go forth to the kingdom of Heaven. The poor Man answered, Thou wicked Friar, get thee away from me, for I have long since bewailed my Sins and Offences, and that before the face of my Lord Jesus, who hath already forgiven me all that which I have committed against his Majesty; wherefore I have no need of thy Absolution, which thou thyself dost not understand. This is most certain, that long time since thou shouldst have amended thine own wicked and hypocritical Life. I know well enough what thou art, thou playest the Ape with me, but thou hast a subtil and a crafty Heart, which hath deceived much simple People. If thou hast any Comfort or Consolation out of the Gospel to comfort me withal, let me have it; if not, get thee away from me with thy Portius. The Friar was so confounded and amazed with these words, that he knew not what to do or say. The Hangman, being wiser than the Friar, bad him read unto the poor Man something of the Passion, wherein the poor Man would take great pleasure. This foolish Friar had no other consolation to comfort him withal, but to hold the Crucifix of Wood before him, saying, Behold thy Saviour which died for thee, look upon him, and thou shalt be comforted. Then said the poor Man, I have another Saviour, this is none of my Saviour; get thou away from me, thou naughty Person, with thy Marmoset of Wood; My Saviour dwelleth in Heaven, in whom I trust that he will not deliver my Soul to eternal death. The Friar crossed himself, shewing the semblance of a Man that was very sorry and aggrieved, thinking with himself that this poor Man was fallen into desperation. Then was he led forth into the Market-place, where according to the custom, openly before all the People, his Confession was read with a loud voice; which contained no other thing, but only that the Man had been a seditious Person, and that in the time of Truce he had cried Alarm, even in the night, when all Men were at rest.

The innocent Man was damned for ill will.

When he was come to the place where he should suffer, being compassed in with Gieves and Halberds hired for the purpose, after he had said the Lord's Prayer, the Hangman bid him kneel down, but he refused so to do, declaring that he had yet something more to say before the People, thinking that he should not be denied to speak in that place, as he was before the wicked Judges. Those (said he) which know me, shall be sufficient good Witnesses on my behalf, that from my youth upward I have always lived in good name, fame, and honesty, being never before accused for any offence, sedition, or perjury.

In an evil time have I happened into these cursed days, when as all ways both of God and Man are turned topsy turvy. I was adherent to the Tumult and Sedition of the Men of the Country, as many other were which dwell thereabout; but what then? Are not there also many Gentlemen which followed the Peasants Army, and many strong Towns which went also with them? I was not the Author of any sedition, which always I have mortally hated. I never gave counsel unto any Man to move any Broil or Tumult in any place. We asked counsel of our Gentlemen what we should do, when the Bands of the Peasants were assembled in the Fields; but they gave us neither counsel nor comfort. And to speak of my self, I did never understand or know what the Articles were that were published, neither was there ever any Man that told me wherefore they were published; neither did I know wherefore the Bands of the Countrymen were risen, neither wherefore every Man moved his Neighbour to put on Armour. Wherefore then have ye taken me as a seditious Man, and made me to endure so great Torments? He continued a long time in declaring his Innocency; but, notwithstanding all his excuses and defences, the Hangman drew his Sword, and and at the commandment of the Judge struck off his head, as he had made an end of his Prayers. His tongue moved a long time after in his head, by means of the force of the words which he had before spoken.

Thus this good Man of the Country ended his days, against whom the false Judges could find no crime or offence to object, albeit they had diligently sought by witnesses to have information of all his life and living. Wolfgangus Schuch a German in Lotharing, Martyr.

The Story and Martyrdom of Wolfgangus Schuch.

Wolfgangus Schuch, coming to a certain Town in Lotharing, bearing the name of St. Hippolytus, and being received in the said Town to be their Pastor, laboured by all means how to extirpate out of the hearts of the People Idolatry and Superstition. Which, through the grace of Christ working with him, he in short time had brought prosperously to pass according to his desire: inasmuch that the observation of Lent, Images, and all Idols, with the abomination also of the Mass, in the same Town was utterly abolished: so reformatory God made the Hearts of the People there, and such affection had they to their Minister. It was not long but the rumor thereof came to the hearing of Duke Anthony, Prince of Lorain, (under whose dominion they were) through the swift report of the Adversaries, falsely belying these Hippolytians to the Duke; as tho they, in relinquishing the Doctrine and Faction of the Pope, went about to reject and shake off all Authority and Power of Princes, and all superior Governors. By the means of which sinister report they incensed the Prince to such displeasure and indignation, that he threatened to subvert and utterly to destroy the Town with Sword and Fire. Wolfgangus, having word of this, wrote unto the Duke his Uncle in most humble and obedient wife, in defence both of his Ministry, of his Doctrine which he taught, and of the whole cause of the Gospel.

The Letter of
to the Duke.

In which Epistle first he excused the People to be innocent and blameless, and said that those slanderous reporters were rather worthy to be blamed and also punished for their false rumors and forged slanders raised up against them. And that he opened and explained the cause and state of the Gospel, and of our Salvation, consisting only in the free Grace of God, through Faith in Christ his Son, comparing also the same Doctrine of the Gospel with the confused Doctrine of the Church of Rome.

That done, thirdly, he proceeded to our obedience, honour and worship, which first we owe to God and to Christ, next under him to Princes here and Potestates, whom God hath placed in his room, and endued with authority here in Earth; unto whom they offered themselves now and at all times prest and most ready to obey with all service and duty, &c.

But with this Epistle Wolfgangus did nothing prevail, either for that it was intercepted by the way, or else for that the false accusations and wicked tongues of the adversary part took more effect to win credit with the Duke, than could the simple defence of verity. Whereupon Wolfgangus, when he saw no other remedy, rather than the Town should come in any danger for his cause, the good Man, I say, of his own accord came to the City of Nancy, (which is the head-Town of Lorain) there to render a Confession of his Doctrine, and also to deliver the Town of St. Hippolytus out of peril, deriving all the danger upon himself.

As soon as he was come thither, incontinently hands were laid upon him, and he laid fast in a stait and stinking Prison, where he was sharply and bitterly handled under custody of the churlish and cruel Keepers. All this notwithstanding, Wolfgangus, continuing in that Prison the space of a whole year, yet would not be moved from his constancy, neither with the straitness of the Prison, nor with the hardness of his Keepers, nor yet with the compassion of his Wife and Children, which he had about six or seven. Then was he had to the House of the Gray-Friars, to profess there his Faith, where he both wittily and learnedly confuted all them that stood against him.

The constancy of Wolfgangus unmovable.

Wolfgangus had to the Gray-Friars, Wolfgangus' confutation his Adversaries. A right description of a fiery Stephen or Cydops.

There was a Friar named Bonaventure, Provincial of that Order, of face, body, and belly monstrous, but much more gross in blind Ignorance, and a Man utterly rude, a contemner of all civility and honesty; who being long Confessor to the Duke, and of great authority in Lorain, as he was an Enemy to Virtue and Learning, so was he ever persuading the Duke to banish out of the Court and Country of Lorain all learned Men; neither could he abide any Person which seemed to know more than his Elders knew before. The sum of all his Divinity was this, That it was sufficient to Salvation only to know the Pater noster and Ave Maria. And thus was the Duke brought up and trained, and in nothing else, as the Duke himself oft-times in talk with his familiars would confels. This Bonaventure being chief Judge and Moderator where Wolfgangus disputed, or was examined, had nothing else in his mouth, but Thou Heretick, Judas, Beelzebub, &c. Wolfgangus bearing patiently those private Injuries which pertained to himself, proceeded mightily in his disputation by the Scriptures, confuting or rather confounding his Adversaries; who being not otherwise able to make their party good, yet for very shame, because they would not seem to do nothing, took his Bible with his notes in the Margin into their Monastery, and burned it. At the last disputation Duke Anthony himself was said to be there, altering his apparel because he would not be known, who, albeit he understood not the speech of Wolfgangus speaking in Latin, yet perceiving him to be bold and constant in his doctrine, departing from the disputation, gave sentence that he should be burned, because he denied the Church, and Sacrament of the Mass. Whereupon it followed shortly after that Wolfgangus was condemned to be burned, who, hearing the sentence of his condemnation, began to sing the 122 Psalm, Letatus sum in his que dicta sunt mihi, in domum Domini ibimus, &c.

As he was led to the place of Execution, passing by the Houle of the Gray-Friars, Bonaventure the great Cyclops sitting at the door, cried out to him, Thou Heretick, do thy reverence here to God, and to our Lady, and to his holy Saints; shewing to him the Idols standing at the Friars Gate. To whom Wolfgangus answered again, Thou Hypocrite, thou painted Wall, the Lord shall destroy thee, and bring all thy false dissimulation unto light. When they were come to the place of his Martyrdom, first his Books before him were thrown into the fire. Then they asked him, whether he would have his pain minished and shortned? to whom he said, No, bidding them to do their will; for (said he) as God hath been with me hitherto, so I trust now he will not leave me when I should have most need of him, concluding his words thus, that they should put the sentence in execution: and so beginning to sing the one and fiftieth Psalm, he entred into the place heaped up with Faggots and Wood, continuing in his Psalm, and singing till the Smeoke and the Flame took from him both voice and life.

The singular vertue, constancy and leaming of this blessed Man, as it refreshed and greatly edified the hearts of many good Men, so it astonied as much the minds of his Adversaries, and wrought to their confusion. For shortly after his death, the Commendator of St. Anthony of Vienna, who fate as spiritual Judge over him, and gave sentence of his condemnation, fell suddenly down and died. Also his Fellow, which was Abbot of Claricous, and Suffragan to the Bishop of Mentz, suddenly at the coming of the Dutcheffs of Denmark into the City of Nancy, stricken with sudden fear at the crack of Guns, fell down and died, as they which were present and saw it, have made faithful relation of the same. John Huglein, Martyr.

OF John Huglein, Priest, mention is made in the Commentaries of John Sleid. in lib. 6. who the next year following, Anno 1526, was burned at Merspurg by the Bishop of Constance, for that he did not hold the Bishop of Rome's Doctrine in all points.

Moreover, besides other matters in this year occurrent, here is also a Memorandum to be made to all posterity, that in this present year 1526, unto John Frederick, Son and Heir to the Prince and Elector of Saxony, was promised the Lady Katherine, the Emperor's younger Sister in marriage and Writings were made of the same. But when the alteration of Religion was sent by God's providence into Saxony, they twerced from their Covenants; and Hannart, which was then the Emperor's Ambassador in Germany, said plainly that there was no promise to be kept with Hereticks; wherein they seemed to follow well the footsteps of the Council of Constance; as before you have partly heard in the story of John Huz, and of the Emperor Sigmund.

THE 8th day of February, in the year of our Salvation 1527, there happened a rare and marvellous example and spectacle in the Town of Munchen in Bavaria, which was this: A certain Man named George Carpenter of Emmering was there burnt. When he was let out of the Prison called Falken-Tower, and led before the Council, divers Friars and Monks followed him, to instruct and teach him, whom he willed to tarry at home, and not to follow him. When he came before the Council, his offences were read, contained in four Articles.

First, That he did not believe that a Priest could forgive a Man's Sins.

Secondly, That he did not believe that a Man could call God out of Heaven.

Thirdly, That he did not believe that God was in the Bread which the Priest hangeeth over the Altar, but that it was the Bread of the Lord.

Fourthly, That he did not believe that the very Element of the Water it self in Baptism doth give grace.

Which four Articles he utterly refused to recant. Then came unto him a certain Schoolmaster of St. Peter in the Town of Munchen in Bavaria, saying unto him, My Friend

George, dost thou not fear the death and punishment which thou must suffer? If thou wert let go, wouldest thou return to thy Wife and Children? Whereunto he answered, If I were set at liberty, whether should I rather go, than to my Wife and well-beloved Children? Then said the Schoolmaster, Revolve your former sentence and opinion, and you shall be set at liberty. Whereunto George answered: My Wife and my Children are so dearly beloved unto me, that they cannot be bought from me for all the riches and possessions of the Duke of Bavaria; but for the love of my Lord God I will willingly forsake them.

When he was led to the place of execution, the Schoolmaster spake unto him again in the midst of the Marketplace, saying, Good George, believe in the Sacrament of the Altar; do not affirm it to be only a sign. Whereunto he answered, I believe this Sacrament to be a sign of the Body of Jesus Christ offered upon the Cross for us. Then said the Schoolmaster moreover, What dost thou mean, that thou dost so little esteem Baptism, knowing that Christ suffered himself to be baptized in Jordan? Whereunto he answered, and shewed what was the true use of Baptism, and what was the end why Christ was baptized in Jordan, and how necessary it was that Christ should die and suffer upon the Cross, wherein only standeth our Salvation. The same Christ (said he) will I confess this day before the whole World; for he is my Saviour, and in him do I believe.

After this came unto him one Master Conrade Scheter, the Vicar of the Cathedral Church of our Lady in Munchen, a Preacher, saying: George, if thou wilt not believe the Sacrament, yet put all thy trust in God, and say, I trust my cause to be good and true, * but if I should err, truly I would be sorry and repent. Whereunto George Carpenter answered, God suffer me not to err, I beseech him. Then said the Schoolmaster unto him, Do not put the matter in that hazard, but chuse unto you some good Christian Brother, Master Conrade, or some other, unto whom thou mayest reveal thy Heart; not to confess thy self, but to take some godly counsel of him. Whereunto he answered, Nay not so, for it would be too long. Then Master Conrade began the Lord's Prayer: Our Father which art in Heaven; whereunto Carpenter answered, Truly thou art our Father, and no other, this day I trust to be with thee. Then Master Conrade went forward with the Prayer, saying, Hallowed be thy Name. Carpenter answered, O my God, how little is thy Name hallowed in this World? Then said Conrade, Thy Kingdom come. Carpenter answered, Let thy Kingdom come this day unto me, that I also may come unto thy Kingdom. Then said Conrade, Thy Will be done in Earth as it is in Heaven. Carpenter answered, For this cause, O Father, am I novv here that thy will might be fulfilled and not mine. Then said Conrade, Give us this day our daily Bread. Carpenter answered, the only living Bread Jesus Christ shall be my food. Then said Conrade, And forgive us our Trespases; as we forgive them that trespass against us. Carpenter answered,

With a willing mind do I forgive all Men, both my Friends and Adversaries. Then said Master Conrade, And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from all evil. Whereunto Carpenter answered, O my Lord, without doubt thou shalt deliver me; for upon thee only have I laid all my Hope. Then he began to rehearse the Belief, saying, I believe in God the Father Almighty. Carpenter answered, O my God, in thee alone do I trust, in thee only is all my confidence, and upon no other Creature, albeit they have gone about to force me otherwise. In this manner he answered to every word: which his Answerers, if they should be described at length, would be too long. This Prayer ended, the Schoolmaster said unto him, Dost thou believe so truly and constantly in thy Lord and God with thy heart, as thou dost cheerfully seem to confess him with thy Mouth? Hereunto he answered, It were a very hard matter for me, if that I which am ready here to suffer death, should not believe that with my Heart, which I openly profess with my Mouth: For I knew before that I must suffer Persecution, if I would cleave unto Christ who saith, Where thy Heart is, there is also thy Treasure; and whatsoever thing a Man doth fix in his Heart to love above God, that he maketh his Idol. Then said Master Conrade unto him, George, dost thou think it necessary after thy death, that any Man should pray for thee, or say Mass for thee? He answered; So long as the Soul is joined to the Body, pray God for me, that he will give me Grace and Patience, with all humility, to suffer the pains of death with a true Christian Faith: but when the Soul is separate from the Body, then have I no more need of your Prayers. When as the Hangman should bind him to the Ladder, he preached much unto the People. Then he was desired by certain Christian Brethren, that as soon as he was cast into the fire, he should give some Sign or Token what his Faith or Belief was. To whom he answered, This shall be my Sign and Token; that so long as I can open my Mouth, I will not cease to call upon the Name of Jesus.

Behold (good Reader) what an incredible constancy was in this godly Man, such as lightly hath not been seen in any Man before. His Face and Countenance never changed colour, but cheerfully he went upon the fire. In the midst faith he, of the Town this day will I confess my God before the whole World. When he was laid upon the Ladder, and the Hangman put a bag of Gunpowder about his Neck, he said, let it be so, in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. And whenas the two Hangmen lifted him up upon the Ladder, smiling, he had a certain Christian farewell, requiring forgiveness of him. That done, the Hangman thrust him into the Fire. He with a loud voice cried out, Jesus, Jesus. Then the Hangman turned him over; and he again for a certain space cried, Jesus, Jesus, and so joyfully yielded up his Spirit.

Leonard Keyser.

Here also is not to be passed over the marvellous constancy of Mr. Leonard Keyser of the Country of Bavaria, who was burned for the Gospel. This Keyser was of the Town of Rambs, four miles from Passau, of a famous house. This Man, being at his study in Wittenberg, was sent for by his Brethren, which certified him, that if ever he would see his Father alive, he should come with speed; which thing he did. He was scarcely come thither, when as by the commandment of the Bishop of Passau, he was taken by his Mother and his Brethren. The Articles which he was accused of, for the which also he was most cruelly put to death, and shed his Blood for the testimony of the Truth, were these:

That Faith only justifieth.

That Works are the Fruits of Faith.

That the Mass is no Sacrifice or Oblation.

Item, For Confession, Satisfaction, the Vow of Chastity, Purgatory, difference of Days, for affirming only two Sacraments, and Invocation of Saints.

He also maintained three kinds of Confession.

The first to be of Faith, which is always necessary.

The second of Charity, which serveth when any Man hath offended his Neighbour, so whom he ought to reconcile himself again, as a Man may see by that which is written in Mat. 18.

The third, which is not to be despised, is to ask counsel of the ancient Ministers of the Church.

And notwithstanding that all this was contrary to the Bull of Pope Leo, and the Emperor's Decree made at Worms, sentence was given against him, that he should be degraded, and put into the hands of the secular Power. The Persecutors which sat in Judgment upon him, were the Bishop of Passau; the Suffragans of Ratisbon, and of Passau; also Dr. Eckius, being garded about with armed Men. His Brethren and Kinsfolks made great intercession to have his Judgment deferred and put off, that the matter might be more exactly known. Also John Frederick Duke of Saxony, and the Earls of Schneiburg and of Shunartzen, wrote to the Bishop for him, but could not prevail. After the Sentence was given, he was carried by a company of harnessed Men out of the City again, to Scharfingham, the thirtieth of August. Where Christopher Freyinger the civil Judge receiving him, had Letters sent him from Duke William of Bavaria, that forthwith tarrying for no other judgment, he should be burned alive. Whereupon the good and blessed Martyr early in the morning, being rounded and shaven, and clothed in a short Gown, and a black Cap set upon his head, all out and jagged, so was delivered unto the Officer. As he was led out of the Town to the place where he should suffer, he boldly and hardly spake in the Almain Tongue, turning his head first on the one side, and then on the other, saying, O Lord Jesus remain with me, sustain and help me, and give me force and power.

Then the Wood was made ready to be set on fire, and he began to cry with a loud voice, O Jesus, I am thine have mercy upon me, and save me; and therewithal he felt the fire begin sharply under his feet, his hands, and about his head: and because the fire was not great enough the Hangman plucked the Body, half burnt, with a long hook from underneath the Wood. Then he made a great hole in the Body, through the which he thrust a stake, and cast him again into the fire, and so made an end of burning. This was the blessed end of that good Man, which suffered for the testimony of the Truth, August 16, in the year of our Lord 1526. Ex 6. Tomo operum Lutheri.

Wendelmuta Widow and Mariye.

In Holland also the same year 1527, was martyred a good and virtuous Widow, named Wendelmuta a Daughter of Nicholas of Munchendam. This Widow receiving to her heart the brightness of God's Grace, by the appearing of the Gospel, was therefore apprehended and committed to custody in the Castle of Warden, and shortly after from thence was brought to the Hague the 15th day of November, there to appear at the general Sessions of that Country. Where was present Hochstratus, Lord President of the said Country, who also sat upon her the 17th day of the foresaid month. Divers Monks were appointed there to talk with her, to the end they might convince her, and win her to recant; but she, constantly persisting in that Truth wherein she was plighted, would not be removed. Many also of her kindred and other honest Women, were suffered to persuade with her. Among whom there was a certain noble Matron, who loved and favoured dearly the said Widow being in Prison. This Matron coming, and communing with her, in her talk said; My Wendelmuta, why dost thou not keep silence, and think secretly in thine heart these things which thou believest, that thou mayest prolong here thy days and life? To whom she answered again: Ah (said she) you know not what you say: It is written, With the heart we believe to Righteousness. Rom. 10. With the tongue we confess to Salvation. &c. And thus the remaining firm and steadfast in her Belief and Confession, the 20th day of November, was condemned by Sentence given as against an Heretic, to be burned to Ashes, and her goods to be confiscate; the taking the sentence of her Condemnation mildly and quietly.

After she came to the place where she should be executed, and a Monk there had brought out a blind Cross, willing her many times to kiss and worship her God; I worship, said she, no wooden God, but only that God which is in Heaven: and so with a merry and joyful countenance she went to the Stake, desiring the Executioner to tie the Stake to be fast, that it fall not: then taking the Powder, and laying it to her breast, she gave her Neck willingly to be bound, with an ardent Prayer comprehending her self to the hands of God. When the time came that she should be strangled, modestly she closed her eyes, and bowed down her head as one that would take a sleep: which done the Fire then was put to the Wood, and she being strangled, was burned afterward to Ashes, instead of this Life, to get the immortal Crown in Heaven, *Anna 1527. Petrus Flisledius, and Adolphus Clarebachus Martyrs.

IN the number of these German-Martyrs, are also to be comprehended Peter Flisledius and Adolph Clarebach, two Men of singular learning, and having ripe knowledge of God's holy Word. Which two, in the year of our Lord 1529, for that they did dissent from the Papists in divers Points, and especially touching the Supper of the Lord, and other the Pope's Traditions and Ceremonies, after they had endured imprisonment a year and a half by the commandment of the Archbishop and Senate, were put to death and burned in Coleu, not without the great grief and lamentation of many good Christians, all the Fault being put upon certain Divines, which at that time preached, that the punishment and death of certain wicked Persons should pacify the Wrath of God, which then plagued Germany grievously with a new and strange kind of Disease: for at that season the sweating Sickness did mortally rage and reign throughout all Germany. *Ex com. A Preface to the Table following.

IF thou well remember in reading this Book of Stories, (loving Reader) it was before mentioned and declared, how in the year of Grace 1501, certain prodigious marks and prints of the Lord's Passion, as the Crown, Crofs, Nails, Scourges, and Spear, were seen in Germany upon the Garments of Men and Women. Which miraculous ostent, passing the ordinary course of natural Causes, as it was sent of God, no doubt, to forehew the great and terrible Persecution, which afterward fell in the Country of Germany, and other Regions besides, for the testimony of Christ; so if the number and names of all those good Men and Women, which suffered in the same Persecution, with their acts and doings should be gathered and compiled together, it would ask a long time, and a large volume. Notwithstanding, partly to satisfy the History which we have in hand; partly also to avoid tedious prolixity, I thought briefly to contract the discourse thereof, drawing, as in a compendious Table, the names of the Persecutors, and of the Martyrs which suffered, and the causes wherefore, with as much shortness as I may; relating the full tractation of their lives and doings to those Writers of their own Country, where they are to be read more at large. And to keep an Order in the same Table as much as in such a confused heap of matters I may, according to the order and distinction of the Countries in which these blessed Saints of Christ did suffer; I have so divided the order of the Table in such sort, as first to begin with them that suffered in Germany, then in France, also in Spain, with other foreign Countries more; shewing only the names, with the principal matters of them; referring the rest to the further explication of their own Story-writers, from whence they be collected. The which Table being finished, my purpose is, Christ willing, to return to the full History of our own Matters and Martyrs which suffered here in England.

At Rastat,
by Salze-

1538.

After that this George had instructed the People in knowledge of the Gospel in Rastat, ten miles distant from Saltzburg, he was accused of his Adversaries and put in Prison, where he wrote a confession of his Faith, which Matthias Iliricus hath set out with his whole Story. He was condemned to be burned alive: but means was made, that first his head should be cut off, and his body afterwards be cast into the fire. Going towards his death, he said, crying aloud, That you may know, said he, that I die a true Christian, I will give you a manifest sign; and so he did by the power of the Lord: For when his head was taken off from his shoulders, the body, falling upon his belly, so continued the space while one might eat an Egg. After that, softly it turned it self upon the back, and crossed the right foot over the left: At the sight whereof, they which saw it were in a great marvel. The Magistrates, which before had appointed to have burned the body after his beheading; seeing this Miracle, would not burn it, but buried it with other Christian mens bodies; and many by that example were moved to believe the Gospel. Thus God is able to manifest the truth of his Gospel in the midst of persecution, who is to be blessed for ever. Amen.

A good Priest dwelling not far from Basil, 1539.
There was a certain wicked Priest, a notorious Adulterer, a Dicer, and a vile Drunkard, given to all wickedness and ungraciousness, without all fear, regarding nothing what mischief he did: moreover, a Man fit and ready to serve the affection of the Papists at all turns. It chanced that this Priest was received and lodged in the house of another Priest dwelling not far from Basil, which was a good Man, and a sincere favourer of the Gospel.

This drunken Priest, sitting at supper, was so drunk, that he could not tell what he did, or else fained himself so drunk of purpose, the better to accomplish his intended mischief. So it followed, that this Wretch after his lust sleep roste out of his Bed, and brake all the glass Windows in his Chamber, threw down the Stone, and rent all his Host's Books that he found. The Host, awaking with the noise thereof, came to him, asking him how he did? whether there were any Thieves or Enemies that he was in fear of? desiring him to shew what he ailed. But as soon as the good Host had opened his Chamber door, the wicked Cut-throat ran at him with his Sword, and slew him. The Host, after the Wound received, fell down and died. Upon this a clamour was made through all the street, and the Neighbours came in, the Murderer was taken and bound: and yet all the Friends and Kinsfolks that the good Priest had, could not make that miserable Cause, that was the Murderer, to be executed; the superior Powers did so take his part, saying, That he should be sent to his Bishop. The Townsmen did grievously cry out and complain at the bolstering out so manifest Villany: So did the Noblemen, that was the Lord of the Place, saying, That so many good Men and married Priests were drowned and beheaded for such small trifles, without any regard had by the Bishop; but a Murderer might escape unpunished. It was answered to them again, That what the superior Powers would do, they had nothing to do withal: the time was otherwise now, than it was in the commotion of the rustical People. The superior Powers had authority to govern as they would, say they; it was their parts only to obey. And so was he sent bound to the Bishop, and shortly after dismissed, having also a greater Beneice given him for his worthy act; for he so avanted himself, that he had slain a Lutheran Priest. 	Twenty eight Christian Men and Women of Louvane. Paul a Priest. Two aged Women. At Antonia. Two Men at Louvane. 1543. When certain of the City of Louvain, were suspected of Lutheranism, the Emperors Procurator came from Brussels thither to make Inquisition. After which Inquisition made, certain Bands of armed men came and beset their houses in the night, where many were taken in their Beds, pluckt from their Wives and Children, and divided into divers Prisons. Through the terror whereof, many Citizens revolted from the Doctrine of the Gospel, and returned again to Idolatry. But twenty eight there were which remained constant in that Persecution. Unto whom the Doctors of Lovane, Encensatus especially the Inquisitor, and Latomus sometimes, with other, came and disputed, thinking no less, but either to confound them, or to convert them. But so strongly the spirit of the Lord wrought with his Saints, that the other went rather confounded away themselves. When no Disputation could serve, that which lacked in cunning, they supplied with Torments, by enforcing and afflicting them severally every one by himself. Among the rest there was one Paulus a Priest, upon the Age of sixty years; whom the Rectors of the University, with their Collegues, accompanied with a great number of Bills and Gloves, brought out of Prison to the Austin Friars, where, after many foul Words of the Rector, he was degraded. But at length for fear of death he began to stagger in some Points of his Confession, and so was had out of Lovane, and condemned to perpetual Prison, which was a dark and stinking Dungeon; where he was suffered neither to read nor write, nor any Man to come at him, commanded only to be fed with Bread and Water. After that, other two were there, which because they had revoked before, were put to the fire and burnt, constantly taking their Martyrdom. Then was there an old Man, and two aged Women brought forth: of whom the one was called Antonia, born of an ancient stock in that City. These also were condemned, the Man to be beheaded, the two Women to be buried quick, which death they received likewise very cheerfully. Certain of the other Prisoners, which were not condemned to death, were deprived of their Goods, commanded in a white sheet to come to the Church, and there kneeling with a Taper in their hand, to ask forgiveness: and they which refused so to do, and to abjure the Doctrine of Luther, were put to the fire. Ex Fran. Thus is the Providence of the Lord never lacking to his Saints in time of necessity. Shortly after came the Doctors and Masters of Lovane, to examine him of certain Articles touching Religion, as of the Pope's Supremacy, Sacrifice of the Mass, Purgatory, and of the Sacrament. But no force would serve. Wherefore upon the two and twentieth of January he was condemned to the Fire, but privily, contrary to the use of the Country; for openly they durst not condemn him for fear of the People, so well was he beloved. Standing at the stake the Hangman was ready to strangle him before; but he would not, saying, That there was no such need that his Pain should be mitigated, for I fear not, said he, the fire; do thou therefore as thou art commanded. And thus the blessed Martyr, lifting up his Eyes to Heaven in all that dle of the flame, died, to the great Lamentation of all that stood by. The Martyrdom of Giles Tilleman.

At Gaunt, Anno 1543, 1544.

As Charles the Emperor did lie in Gaunt, the Friars and Doctors there obtained, that the Edict made against the Lutherans, might be read openly twice a year. Which being obtained, great Persecution followed; so that there was no City nor Town in all Flanders, wherein some either were not expelled, or beheaded, or condemned to perpetual Prison, or had not their Goods confiscated: neither was there any respect of Age or Sex. At Gaunt especially many there were of the head Men, which for Religion sake were burned.

Afterward the Emperor coming to Brussels, there was terrible slaughter, and Persecution of God's People, namely in Brabant, Hungary, and Artois; the Horor and Cruelty whereof is almost incredible: inasmuch that at one time as good as two hundred Men and Women together were brought out of the Country about into the City, of whom some were drowned, some buried quick, some privily made away, others sent to perpetual Prison: whereby the Prisons and Towers thereabout were replenished with Prisoners and Captives, and the Hands of the Hangman tired with slaying and killing, to the great sorrow of all them which knew the Gospel, being now compelled either to deny the same, or to confirm it with their Blood. The Story hereof is at large set forth by Franc. Encens, a notable learned Man, who also himself was Prisoner the same time at Brussels: whose Book written in Latin I my self have seen and read, remaining in the hands of John Operine at Basil.

Martinus Hecurbloek, Fishmonger at Gaunt, Anno 1545.

This Martin ever almost to his later Age, was a Man much given to all Wickedness and fleshly Life so long as he continued a follower of the Pope's Superstition and Idolatry. Afterward (as God hath always his calling) through the occasion of a Sermon of his Parish Priest, beginning to taste some workings of Grace and Repentance of his former Life, he went out of Gaunt for the space of three Months, seeking the Company of godly Christians, such as he heard to use the reading of the Scriptures: by whom he being more groundedly instructed returned again to the City of Gaunt, where all his Neighbours first began to marvel at the sudden change of this Man. The Franciscans which knew him before so beneficial unto them, now seeing him so altered from their ways and Superstition, and seeing him to visit the Captives in Prison, to comfort them in Persecution, and to confirm them in the Word of God, which went to the fire, conspired against him: whereby he was detected and had in Bands. After that with sharp and greivous Torments they would have constrained him to utter other of the same Religion. To whom thus he answered; that if they could prove by the Scripture that his detecting and accusing of his Brethren, whom they would afflict with the like Torments, were not against the second Table of God's Law, then he would not refuse to prefer the Honour of God before the safeguard of his Brethren. Then the Friers examined him in the Sacrament, asking him why he was so earnest to have it in both kinds, seeing (said they) it is but a naked Sacrament, as you say? To whom he answered, That the Elements thereof were naked, but the Sacrament was not naked, forasmuch as the said Elements of Bread and Wine being received after the Institution of		Then they exhorted Ursula to turn, or if she would not, at least that she should require to be beheaded. To whom she said, That she was guilty of no Error, nor defended anything, but what was consonant to the Scripture, in which she trusted to persevere unto the end. And as touching the kind of punishment, she said, she feared not the fire, but rather would follow the Example of her dear Sister that went before. This was marvellous, that the Executioners could in no wise confine their Bodies with fire, but left them whole lying upon the ground white: which certain good Christians privily took up in the night and buried. And as touching the receiving in both kinds, because it is the Institution of the Lord, who is he (said Martin) that dare alter the same? Then was he brought before the Council of Flanders. The Causes laid against him were the Sacrament, Purgatory, and praying for the Dead: and for which he was condemned and burned at Gaunt in Verle place, all his Goods being confiscate. As he stood at the Stake, a Franciscan Frier said to him, Martin, unless thou dost turn, thou shalt go from this fire to everlasting fire. It is not in you, said Martin again, to judge: For this the Friers after were so hated, that many Bills and Rhymes were set forth in divers places against them. Ex Pantal. Andrew Thiesse, Citizen of Mechlin, of his Wife Katharine had three Sons and a Daughter, whom he instructed diligently in the Doctrine of the Gospel, and despised the doings of Popery. Wherefore being hated and persecuted of the Friers and Priests there, he went into England and there died. Francis and Nicholas his two Sons went to Germany to study: and returning again to their Mother, and Sister, and younger Brother, by diligent instruction brought them to the right Knowledge of God's Gospel: which being not unknown to the Parson there of St. Katharine, he called to them Dr. Rapardus, Tappin, and other Masters and Friers, who taking Counsel together with William de Clerk, the head Magistrate of the Town of Mechlin, agreed, That the Mother with her four Children should be sent to Prison, separate one from another: where great labour was employed to reclaim them home unto their Church, that is, from light to darkness again. The two younger, to wit, the Daughter with the younger Brother, being yet not seled neither in years nor Doctrine, something inclined to them, and were delivered. The Mother which would not consent, was condemned to perpetual Prison. The other two, Francis and Nicholas, standing firmly to their Confession, defended, That the Catholick Church was not the Church of Rome; that the Sacrament was to be minitred in both kinds; that Auricular Confession was to no purpose; that Invocation of Saints was to be left; that there was no Purgatory. The Friers they called Hypocrites, and contemned their threatnings. The Magistrates, after Disputations, fell to Torments, to know of them who was their Master, and what fellows they had. Their Master, they said, was Christ which bare his Cross before. Fellows, they said, they had innumerable, dispersed in all places. At last they were brought to the Judges: their	William de Clerk, Ruler of Mechlin.	Articles were read, and they condemned to be burned. Comming to the place of Execution, as they began to exhort the People, Gags or Balls of Wood were thrust into their Mouthes which they through vehemency in speaking thrust out again, desiring for the Lord's sake that they might have leave to speak. And so singing with a loud voice, Credo in unum Deum &c. they went, and were fastned to the stake, praying for their Persecutors, and exhorting the one the other, they did abide the fire patiently. The one feeling the flame to come to his Beard, Ah! said he, what a small pain is this, to be compared to the Glory to come? The cause of their trouble, as also of the others, was the Emperor's Decree made in the Council of Wormes against the Lutherans mentioned before. Adrian, not so strong as a Man, for fear gave back from the Truth, and was but only beheaded. The Wife, stronger than a Woman, did withstand their threats, and abide the uttermost; and being inclosed in an Iron Grate formed in shape of a Pastie was laid in the Earth and buried quick, after the usual Punishment of that Country, for Women. When the Adversaries first told her, that her Husband had relented, he believed them not: and therefore, as she went to her death, passing by the Tower where he was, she called to him to take her leave; but he was gone before. Ex Pant. lib. 4.	Dr. Ha. Brulius , a Gray Friar.	Peter Bruly? Yea, said he, for that it is consonant both to the Old Testament and to the New: and for this he was let down into a deep Dungeon under the Castle-ditch, full of Toads and filthy Vermin. Shortly after the Senate, with certain Friers, came again to examin him, to see whether they could convert him. To whom he answered and said, That when he before had lived such an ungodly life, they never spake a word against him: but now, for favouring and favouring the Word of God, they were so infest against him, that they sought his Blood. Among whom was one Dr. Hufardus, which asked him if he did not seem to himself more wicked now than ever he was before? But he setting the Frier at Light, bad him, Avant Frier; saying, that he had to talk with the Senate, and not with him. The Senate then began to examine him of certain Articles of Religion. Then, said he, if ye will not suffer me to answer for my self in matters of such Importance, then send me to my Prison again among my Toads and Frogs, which will not interrupt me while I talk with my Lord my God. Who at the earnest request of faithful Brethren came down to visit the lower Countries about Ariots and Dornick in Flanders; where he most diligently preached the Word of God unto the People in houses, the doors standing open. Whereupon when the Magistrates of Dornick had shut the Gates of the Town, and had made search for him three days, he was privily let down the Wall in the night by a Basket: and as he was let down to the Ditch ready to take his way, one of them which let him down, leaning over the Wall to bid him farewell, caused unawares a stone to slip out of the Wall, which falling upon him brake his Leg by reason whereof he was heard of the Watchmen complaining of his Wound, and so was taken, giving thanks to God by whose Providence he was there staid to serve the Lord in that place. So long as he remained in Prison, he ceased not to supply the part of a diligent Preacher, teaching, and confirming all them that came to him in the word of Grace. Being in Prison he wrote his own Confession and Examination, and sent it to the Brethren. He wrote also another Epistle unto them that were in Persecution: another also to all the faithful: also another Letter to his Wife the same day that he was burned. He remained in Prison four Months. His Sentence was given by the Emperor's Commissioners at Bruxels. That he should be burned to Ashes, and his Ashes thrown into the River. Although the Priests and Friers made the fire but small, to multiply his pain, yet he the more cheerfully and constantly took his Martyrdom, and suffered it. The Magistrates came to seek me, said he, and now I am come to know what they would. Whereupon the Ruler, being sorry of his coming, yet notwithstanding committed him to Prison, where he remained constant a certain while. But after the Commissioners had threatened him with cruel Torments, and horror of death, he began by little and little to waver, and shrink from the Truth. At the fair words of the false Friers and Priests, to have his punishment changed, and to be beheaded, he was fain to grant unto their biddings and Requests: whereupon the Adversaries taking their Advantage, came to Miscius; and told him of Bergiban's Retraction, willing him to do the like. But he stoutly persisting in the Truth, indured to the Fire, where he, having Powder put to his Breast, was so put to death and dispatched. Then he was brought forth to be beheaded, after a barbarous and tyrannous manner. First, they shave the crown of his Head, then rubbed it hard with Salt, that the Blood came running down his shoulders. A godly Priest in Hungary.

In Hungary a certain godly Priest preached, that the eating of Flesh is not prohibited in the Scripture: for the which the cruel Bishop, after he had imprisoned him certain Weeks, caused him to be brought out, and his body to be tied over with Hares, Geese, and Hens hanging round about him: and so the beastly Bishop made Dogs to be set upon him, which cruelly rent and tore whatsoever they could catch: And thus the good Minister of Christ, being driven about the City with the barking of Dogs, died, and was martyred. The sight whereof as it was lamentable to the godly, so it seemed ridiculous to the wicked. But within few days after, the impious Bishop by the stroke of God's just hand, fell sick and became horn-mad, and so raving without sense or wit, miserably died. Ex Tom. 2. Convivialium Sermonum Johann. Gaffii.

John Frederick of Saxony, Elector,
A. 1547.

Among these godly and constant Saints of Christ, may well be recounted John Frederick, Duke of Saxony: who when he had recovered again all his Dominions (which Duke Maurice had taken from him before, being in Suevia with his Army) and at last was taken Prisoner of the Emperor of Albia, the four and twentieth of April, A. 1547, yet could never be induced to yield to the Emperor in revoking his Faith and Doctrine of the Gospel wherein he stood: For the which he was detained from his Wife and Children, and bereaved of all his Goods, and carried about with the Emperor the space of five years. This admirable constancy of the Duke, was a Wonder to all his Adversaries. At last, in the year of our Lord, 1552, through the Benefit of Almighty God, he was set again at liberty, and returning home to his Wife and Children, continued in his Religion till the hour of his death. Ex Sleid. lib. 19.

Much like was the cause also of Philip Langrave of Hesse, who likewise being taken and spoiled of the Emperor, continued the space of five years in the cruel Custody of the Spaniards; and albeit he had fined unto the Emperor, and was promised to be set free out of Prison, the Emperor and his Council dallying with their Promise, expounded his Imprisonment not to be perpetual. And though great Labour and Intercession was made for him, yet all would not help. For when the Emperor sent him away, finding Cavillations against him: whereby he was again committed into the hands of the Spaniards, till at length, through the disposing of God's Mercy, first the Duke of Saxony, and then fix days after the Langrave also, were both freed out of long captivity and sent home. Ex Com. Sleid. lib. 19, 24.

Hermannus Archbishop of Colen, A. 1547.

With these holy Martyrs above recited, may also be numbred Hermannus Archbishop of Colen, who, a little before the Emperor had War against the Protestants, had reformed his Church from certain Papistical Superstitions, using therein the Aid and Advice of Martin Bucer. Wherefore Charles the Emperor sent word to Colen, that he should be deposed; which he patiently did suffer. In his room was set Adolphus Earl of Scawenburg. Ex Sleid. lib. 18.

Master Nicholas Finchman.
Marion, Wife of Augustinus, A. 1549.

Master Nicholas and Barbara his Wife; also Augustinus a Barbar, and Marion his Wife, born about Hennegrow, after they had been at Geneva a space, came into Germany, thinking that way to pass over into England. By the way coming to Hennegrow, Augustine desired Master Nicholas (because he was learned) to come to Bergis to visit and comfort certain Brethren there; which he willingly did. From thence passing by Dornick (or Tornay) they held on their Journey toward England. But in the way Augustine and his Wife, being known, were detected to the Lieutenant of Dornick, who, in all speedy haste following after them, overtook them four miles beyond Dornick, Augustine (how I cannot tell) escaped that time out of their hands, and could not be found. The Soldiers then laying hands upon Nicholas and the two Women, brought them back again unto Dornick. In returning by the way, when Master Nicholas at the Table gave thanks (as the manner is of the faithful) the wicked Ruler, scornng them, and swearing like a Tyrant, said, Now let us see thou lewd Heretic, whether thy God can deliver thee out of my hand. To whom Nicholas answering again modestly, asked, what had Christ ever offended him, that he with his blasphemous Swearing did so tear him in pieces? desiring him, that if he had any thing against Christ, rather he would wreak his anger upon his poor Body, and let the Lord alone. Thus they being bound hands and feet, were brought to Bergis, and there laid in the Dungeon. Then Duke Arifontus, accompanied with a great number of Priests, and Franciscan Friars, and with a Doctor which was their Warden, came to talk with them. Nicholas standing in the midst of them, being asked what he was, and whether he would? answered them perfectly to all their Questions: and moreover so confounded the Friars, that they went away ashamed, saying, That he had a Devil, and crying, To the fire with him, Lutheran.

As they continued still looking for the day of their Execution, it came to the Rulers minds to ask of Nicholas in what house he was lodged when he came to Bergis? Nicholas said, He had never been there before, and therefore being a stranger he could not tell the name of the house. When Nicholas would confess nothing, Duke Arifontus came to Barbara, Nicholas his Wife, to know where they were lodged at Bergis, promising many fair words of delivery, if she would tell. She being a weak and timorous Woman, uttered all. By the occasion whereof great Persecution followed, and many were apprehended. Where this is to be noted, that shortly, even upon the same, the Son of the said Duke Arifontus was slain, and buried the same day when Augustinus was burned. To be short, Nicholas shortly after was brought before the Judges, and there condemned to be burned to ashes. At which sentence giving, Nicholas blessed the Lord, which had counted him worthy to be a Witness in the cause of his dear and well-beloved Son. Going to the place of Execution he was commanded to speak nothing unto the people, or else he should have a Ball of Wood thrust into his mouth. Being at the stake, and seeing a great multitude about him, forgetting his silence promised, he cried with a loud voice; O Charles, Charles, how long shall thy heart be hardened? O Charles, that one of the Soldiers gave him a blow. Then said Nicholas again; Ah miserable people! thou art not worthy to whom the Word of God should be preached. And thus he spake as they were binding him to the stake. The Friars came out with their old Song, crying, That he had a Devil; to whom Nicholas spake the Verse of the Psalm: Depart from me, all ye wicked, for the Lord hath heard the voice of my weeping. And thus this holy Martyr, patiently taking his death, commended up his Spirit unto God in the midst of the fire. Ex Lud. Rab. Pant. & alius.

The Watchmen or Souldiers of Bellimont.
Augustine again taken.	Wherein here is to be noted and marvelled to see the Work of the Lord, how this Man being before of nature so timorous, now was so strengthened with God's Grace, that he nothing feared the force of all his Enemies. Among others came to him the Warden of the gray Friers, with a long Oration, perswading him to relent, or else he should be damned in Hell fire perpetually. To whom Austen answering again, said, Prove that which you said by the Authority of God's Word, that a Man may believe you: you say much, but you prove nothing, rather like a Doctor of Lies, than of Truth, &c. At last, he being there condemned to be burned at Bellimont, was brought to the Inn where he should take Horse: where was a certain Gentleman, a stranger, who, drinking to him in a cup of Wine, desired him to have pity upon himself: and if he would not favour his Life, yet that he would favour his own Soul. To whom said Austen, after he had thanked him for his good will, What care I have, said he, of my Soul, you may see by this, that I had rather give my Body to be burned, than to do that thing that were against my Conscience. When he was come to the Town of Bellimont, where he should be burned, the same day there was a great burial of the Duke Arisconus his Son, which was slain a little before (as is before touched) by the occasion whereof many Nobles and Gentlemen were there present, which hearing of this Austen, came to him and talked with him. When the day came of his martyrdom, the people being offended at his constancy, cried out to have him drawn at an Horse	The names of their persecutors appear not in the story.	The Christian City of Magdeburge, Anno 1551.
Example of Gods goodness in strengthening the weak-hearted.			When Charles the Emperor had almost got all his Purpose in Germany, in obtruding his Religion of Interim into all Places, which was received of the most part of all the chief Princes and Cities; only the City of Magdeburge, continuing in the constancy of their Doctrine reformed, refused to admit the same. Wherefore War was raised against them, their City besieged, and great violence used: so that many honest and religious Citizens for the Gospel's Cause sustained great perils and danger of death. At last, when they had manfully and constantly endured such great distress and calamity, the space of a whole year, through the blessed Providence of Almighty God, (who about the same time sent War between the French King and the Emperor) honest reconciliation was made between them and the Emperor, whereby they were received into favour, and suffered to enjoy their former Religion quietly. he heard that there was a black Friar, which used to preach good Doctrine to the People. Wherefore he, being desirous to hear, came to his Sermon; where the Friar, contrary to his expectation, preached in defence of Transubstantiation. At the hearing whereof his heart was so full, that he had much ado to refrain, while the Sermon was finished. As soon as the Friar was come down, he burst out and charged him with false Doctrine, persuading the People, as well as he could be heard, by the Scriptures, that the Bread was but a Sacrament only of the Lord's Body. The Friar, not willing to hear him, made signs unto him to depart. Also the throng of the People was such, that it carried him out of the doors. He had not gone far, but Hessius the Chamberlain overtook him and carried him to Prison. Then were Doctors and other Friars, as Pistorius, and Bunderius, brought to reason with him, of the Sacrament, of Invocation of Saints, and Purgatory. He ever stood to the trial only of the Scripture: which they refused. Then was it agreed that he should declare his mind in writing: which he did. He wrote also to his Wife at Emden: comforting her, and requiring her to take care for Samuel and Sarah his Children. When he was condemned, he was commanded not to speak to the People. Hessius the Officer made great haste to have him dispatched. Wherefore he, mildly like a Lamb, praying for his Enemies, gave himself to be bound, patiently taking what they would do against him; whom first they strangled, and then consumed his Body being dead with fire.

And this was the Martyrdom of Hessius. Ex Lnd. Rab. lib. 6.

Joannes Frisius Abbat in Bavaria,
Anno 1534.

Joannes Sleidan. lib. 25. maketh record of one Johanne Frisius, Abbat of Newstad, within the Dioceses of the Bishop Hirpsolensis in Bavaria: Who, being suspected of Lutheranism, was called to account of his Faith: and strongly persisting in his Assertions, and defending the same by the Scriptures, he was therefore displaced and removed from all his Jurisdications, the five and twentieth of June, Anno 1555. Ex Sleid.

Bertrand de Blas, at Dornick, An. 1555.

The story of Bertrand is lamentable, his Torments incredible, the Tyranny shewed unto him horrible, the Constancy of the Martyr admirable. This Bertrand, being a silk Weaver, went to Wesell for the Cause of Religion. Who being desirous to draw his Wife and Children from Dornick to Wesell, came thence from thence to persuade her to go with him thither. When she in no wise could be intreated, he, remaining a few days at home, set his house in order, and desired his Wife and Brother to pray that God would establish him in his enterprise that he went about. That done, he went upon Christmasts-day to the high Church of Dornick, where he took the Cake out of the Priests hand, as he would have lifted it over his head at Mass, and stamp'd it under his feet, saying, That he did it to shew the Glory of that God, and what little power he hath: with other words more to the people, to persuade them that the Cake or Fragment of Bread was not Jesus their Saviour.

At the sight hereof the People, being stricken with a marvellous damp, stood all amazed. At length such a stirring thereupon followed, that Bertrand could hardly escape with life. It was not long but the noise of this was carried to the Bailiff of Hennegow, and Governor of the Castle of Dornick, which lay sick the same time of the Gout at Biesle. Who like a mad Man cried out, that ever God would or could be so patient, to suffer that Contumely, so to be troden under the foot by such a Miser: adding moreover, that he would revenge his Cause in such sort, as it should be an example for ever to all Posterity; and forthwith the furious Tyrant commanded himself to be carried to the Castle of Dornick, Bertrand being brought before him, was asked whether he repented of his Fact, or whether he would do so, if it were to be done again? Who answered, that if it were an hundred times to be done, he would do it; and if he had an hundred lives, he would give them in that quarrel. Then was he thrice put to the Pinbank, tormented most miserably, to utter his fetters on, which he would never do. Then proceeded they to the Sentence, more like Tyrants than Christians. By the tenour of which Sentence, this was his punishment:

First, He was drawn from the Castle of Dornick to the Market-place, having a Ball of Iron put in his mouth. Then he was set upon a Stage, where his right hand where-with he took the Host, was crushed and pressed between two hot Irons, with sharp iron edges fiery red, till the form and fashion of his hand was murthered. In like manner they brought other-like Irons for his right foot, made fire-hot, whereunto of his own accord he put his foot, to suffer as his hand had done before, with marvellous constancy and firmness of mind. That done, they took the ball of Iron out of his mouth, and cut off his tongue, who notwithstanding, with continual crying, ceased not to call upon God; whereby the hearts of the People were greatly moved: Whereupon the tormentors thrust the Iron ball into his mouth again. From thence they brought him down to the lower Stage, he going to the same no less cheerfully and quietly, than if no part of his body had been hurt. There his legs and his hands were bound behind him with an Iron Chain going about his body, and so he was let down flat upon the fire: whom the foresaid Governor, there standing by and looking upon, caused to be let up again, and so down and up again, till at last the whole body was spent to ashes, which he commanded to be cast into the River: when this was done, the Chappel where this Mass-god was so intreated, was lockt up, and the Board whereupon the Priest stood was burnt, the marble Stone whereupon the Host did light, was broken in pieces. And finally, forasmuch as the said Bertrand had received his Doctrine at Wesell, commandment was given, That no Person out of that Country should go to Wesell, or there occupy, under incurring the danger of the Emperor's Placard, Ex Crispi. Francis Warlus, Alexander Dayken, at Dornick, Anno 1562.

After these two good Men, being born in the lower parts of Germany, had been conversant in divers reformed Churches in other Countries: at last, for Conscience-sake they returned home again to do good in their own Country of Dornick, and thereabout.

So upon a time, as the people there reformed to a back-Field or Wood without the City, with a certain Preacher, to hear the Word of God, and to pray, the Adversaries, having thereof some intelligence, so pursued them, that they took of them above thirty, of whom these two among the rest were apprehended; and thinking no less but that they should be burned, they began to sing Psalms. At length being brought forth, first one, then the other, they were both beheaded. And where the Judges had intended to quarter their Bodies, and to set them up by the high Ways, yet was it so provided, God working in the hearts of the People, that they were both committed to Sepulture. *Ex Lud. James Pavane Martyr.	James Pavane Schoolmaster at Paris, 1524. This James, first being taken by the Bishop of Melden, or Meux, was compelled to recant by Dr. Marial. Afterward returning again to his Confession, he was burned at Paris, in the year 1525. Ex Jo. Crisp.	Alex. Canus Priest, otherwise called Laurentius Crucius, at Paris, An. 1533.	Alex. Canus Martyr.
Dr. Marial of Paris.	Dionisius de Rieux, at Melda, or Meux, 1528. This Denis was one of them which was first burned at Melda, for saying, That the Mass is a plain denial of the Death and Passion of Christ. He was always wont to have in his mouth, the words of Christ; He that denieth me before Men, him also will I deny before my Father; and to muse upon the same earnestly. He was burnt with a slow fire, and did abide much torment. Ex Crisp. & alii.	John Pointer a Surgeon, at Paris, An. 1533.	John Pointer Martyr.
Dionisius de Rieux Martyr.	Johannes de Cadurco, Bachelor of the Civil Law, Anno 1533. This John, first for making a Sermon or Exhortation to his Countrymen of Limosine in France, upon Abstinence-day; and after sitting at a Feast where it was propounded, That every one should bring forth some sentence; for that he brought forth this, Christ reign in our hearts; and did prosecute the same by the Scriptures in much length of words; was thereupon accused, taken and degraded, and after burned. At his Degradation, one of the Black Friars of Paris preached, taking for his Theme the words of St. Paul, 1 Tim. 4. The Spirit speaketh, that in the later days, Men shall depart from the Faith, giving heed to lying Spirits, and Doctrine of Error, &c. And in handling that place, either he could not, or would not proceed further in the Text. Cadurco cried out to him to proceed, and read further. The Friar stood dumb, and could not speak a word. Then Cadurco, taking the Text, did prosecute the same, as followeth: Teaching false Doctrine in hypocrisie, having their Conscience marked with a hot Iron, forbidding to Marry, and to eat Meats, created of God to be eaten with thanksgiving, &c. J. Cadurco Martyr.	Bartholomew Myler, a lame Cripple. John Burges Merchant, the Receiver of Nants. Henry Hoille of Couberon. Catella a School-mistress. Steven de la Forge Merchant. Anno 1533. These five here specified, for certain Bills cast abroad and set up, founding against the abomination of the Mass, and other superstitious Absurdities of the Pope, were condemned and burned in the City of Paris. Henry of Couberon had his tongue bored through, and with an Iron Wire tied fast to one of his Cheeks: who likewise with the other was burned as is aforesaid. Ex Jo. Crisp.	Nicholas a Scrivener. Five Martyrs burned.	Mary Becandella, at Fountains, An. 1534. This Mary being virtuously instructed of her Master where she lived; and being afterward at a Sermon, where a Friar preached, after the Sermon, found fault with his Doctrine, and refuted the same by the Scriptures. Whereat he disdaining, procured her to be burned at Fountains. Ibidem.	Quoquillard, Anno 1534. Wherefore beseeching them to move him no more therein, he told them, that he feared not to yield up both Body and Soul in the quarrel of that Truth which he had taught; saying, with St. Paul , That he was ready, not only to be bound for the testimony of Christ, in the City of Bourdeaux, but also to die.
Claudian Painter, a Goldsmith, Martyr.	Claudian Painter, a Goldsmith, at Paris, 1540. Claudian going about to convert his Friends and Kinsfolks in his Doctrine, was by them committed to Morinks , a chief Captain, who condemned him to be burned: but the high Parliament of Paris, correcting that Sentence, added moreover, That he should have his tongue cut out before, and so be burned. Ex Jo. Crisp.	Riverack and his servant.	To contract the long story hereof to a brief Narration, the Summer came, and was in the City three days: during which time, Aymondus preached three Sermons. The People, in defence of their Preacher, flew upon the Summer, to deliver him out of his hands. But Aymond desired them not to stop his Martyrdom; seeing it was the Will of God that he should suffer for him, he would not, said he, resist. Then the Consuls suffered the Summer, and so Aymond was carried to Bourdeaux. Where many Witnesses, the most part being Priests, came in against him, with Mr. Riverack also, and his Servant: which Riverack had said oftentimes before, that it should cost him a thousand Crowns, but he would burn him. Many exceptions he made against his false Witnesses, but that would not be taken. All their Accusation was only for denying Purgatory.
Steph. Brune Martyr.	Stephen Brune a Husbandman, at Rutiers, Anno 1540. Stephen Brune was persecuted of Angerius , who after his Confession given of his Faith, was adjudged to be burned. Which punishment he took so constantly, that it was to them a wonder. His Adversaries commanded after his death to be cried, That none should make any more mention of him, under pain of Heresy.		About nine months he remained in Prison with great misery, bewailing exceedingly his former life, albeit there was no Man that could charge him outwardly with any Crime. Then came down Letters, whereupon the Judges began to proceed to his condemnation, and he had greater Fetters put upon him; which he took for a token of his death shortly to follow. After that, he was examined with Torments. One of the head Presidents came to him, and shaking him by the Beard, bad him tell what Fellows he had of his Religion. To whom he answered, saying, That he had no other Fellows, but such as knew and did the Will of God his Father, whether they were Nobles, Merchants, or Husbandmen, or of what degree soever they were. In these Torments he endured two or three hours, being but of a weak body, with these words comforting himself; This Body, said he, once must die, but the Spirit shall live: the Kingdom of God abideth for ever. In the time of his tormenting, he fainted. Afterward, coming to himself again, he said, O Lord, how hast thou forsaken me? To whom the President, Nay, wicked Lutheran , said he, thou hast forsaken God. Then said Aymondus , Alas, good Masters, why do you thus miserably torment me? O Lord, I beseech thee forgive them, they know not what they do. See (said the President) this Caitiff, how he prayeth for us: nevertheless so constant was he in his pains, that they could not force him to utter one Man's Name: saying unto them, that he thought to have found more mercy with Men; wherefore he prayed God that he might find mercy with him.
Daniel, a Franciscan, and an Inquisitor.	Pantation addeth moreover, That, at the place of his burning, called Planwall , the Wind rose and blew the fire so from him, as he stood exhorting the People, that he continued there the space of an hour, in a manner not harmed, or scarce touched with any flame: so that, all the Wood being wasted away, they were compelled to begin the fire again with new Fagots, and vessels of Oil, and such other matter: and yet neither could he with all this be burned, but		That he had no other Fellows, but such as knew and did the Will of God his Father, whether they were Nobles, Merchants, or Husbandmen, or of what degree soever they were. The Martyr not harmed with the fire.	Then the Hangman took a staff, and let drive at his head. To whom the holy Martyr being yet alive, said, When I am judged to the fire, do ye beat me with slaves like a Dog? With that the Hangman with his Pike thrust him through the belly and the gus, and so threw him down into the fire, and burned his body to ashes, throwing away his ashes afterward with the wind. Ex Jo. Crisp.		On the next Saturday following, sentence of Condemnation was given against him. Then certain Friers were appointed to hear his Confession, whom he refused, chusing to him one of his own Order, the Parish-Priest of St. Christophers , bidding the Friers depart from him, for he would confess his sins to the Lord. Do you not see, said he, how I am troubled enough with Men, will ye yet trouble me more? Others have had my Body, will ye also take from me my Soul? Away from me I pray you. At last, when he could not be suffered to have the Parish Priest, he then took a certain Carmelite , bidding the rest to depart; with whom he having long talk, at last did convert him to the Truth. Shortly after that came unto him the Judges, Cassinger , and Longa , with other Counsellors more; unto whom the said Aymondus began to preach and declare his mind touching the Lord's Supper: But Longa , interrupting him, demanded of him thus.

This Aymond preached the Gospel at Saint Faiths in Angou, where he was accused by the Parish Priest there, and by other Priests more, to have taught false Doctrine, to the great decay of their Gains. Whereupon, when the Magistrates of Bourdeaux had given commandment, and had sent out their Apparitions to apprehend him, he having intelligence thereof, was willed by his Friends to fly and hide himself: but he would not, saying, He had rather never have been born, than to do. Notwithstanding, Aymund putting his trust in God, was full of comfort, saying with St. Paul, Who shall separate me from the Love of God? Shall the Sword, Hunger, or Nakedness? No, nothing shall pluck me from him. But rather I have pity of you, said he, and so they departed. Not long after he was brought to the place of execution, singing by the way the Psalms, In exitu Israel de Agypto, &c. And as he passed by the place where he had before been imprisoned, he called to his Prison-fellows, exhorting them to put their confidence in the Lord, and told them that he had spoken for them, and declared their miseries unto the President. He thanked moreover the Keeper, and desired him to be good to his poor Prisoners. And so taking his leave of them, and desiring them to pray for him; also giving thanks to the Mistress-keeper for her gentleness shewed to him, he proceeded forward toward his Execution. As he came against the Church of St. Andrew, they willed him to ask mercy of God, and of blessed St. Mary, and of St. Justice. I ask mercy, said he, of God, and his Justice, but the Virgin, blessed St. Mary, I never offended, nor did that thing for the which I should ask her mercy. From thence he passed forward to the Church of St. Legia, preaching still as he went. Then spake one of the Souldiers to the Driver or Carter, willing him to drive apace, for here is preaching, said he, enough. To whom said Aymund, He that is of God, beareth the Word of God, &c. In passing by a certain Image of our Lady, great offence was taken against him, because he always called upon Christ Jesus only, and made no mention of her. Whereupon he lifted up his Voice to God, praying, that he would never suffer him to invoke any other, saving him alone. Coming to the place where he should suffer, he was tumbled out of the Cart upon the ground, testifying to the Magistrates and to the People standing by, that he died for the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and for his Word. More he would have spoken, but he could not be suffered, by the tumultuous vexing of the Officers, crying, Dispatch him, dispatch him, let him not speak. Then he speaking a few words softly in the ear of a little Carmelite whom he had converted, was bid to step up to the Stage. Where the People beginning to give a little audience, thus he said; O Lord, make haste to help me, tarry not, do not despise the Works of thy Hands: And you, my Brethren, that be Students and Scholars, I exhort you to study and learn the Gospel: for the Word of God abideth for ever: labour to know the Will of God, and fear not them that kill the Body, but have no power upon your Souls: And after that, my Flesh, said he, repugneth marvellously against the Spirit, but shortly I shall cast it away. My good Masters, I beseech ye pray for me. O Lord my God, into thy hands I commend my Soul. As he was off repeating the same, the Marignan took and haled him upon the steps in such sort, that he strangled him. And thus that blessed Saint gave up his life: whose Body afterward was with fire consumed.	The Pope, what he is. PGI. 174. Aymund speaketh for his Prison-fellows. John 8. A Weaver of Conberon.	These fourteen dwelt at Melda a City in France, ten miles from Paris, where William Briconatus being their Bishop, did much good, brought to them the light of the Gospel, and reformed the Church. Who, being finally examined for the same, relented: but yet their with many other remained constant; who after the burning of James Pansane before-mentioned, and seeing Superstition to grow more and more, began to congregate in Mangin's house, and to set up a Church to themselves, after the Example of the French Church in Strasbourg. For their Minister they chose Peter Clerk; First, they beginning with twenty or thirty, did grow in short time to three or four hundred. Whereupon the matter being known to the Senate of Paris, the Chamber was beset where they were, and they taken. Of whom sixty two Men and Women were bound and brought to Paris, singing Psalms, especially the Psalm seventy and nung. To these it was chiefly objected, that they being Lay-men would minister the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of the Lord.
The high Court of Roan.	Whereat the Council was so moved, that they commanded all the Gates of the City to be locked and diligent search to made in all Inns and Houses, to find out the Author. Then the Widow told of the party which was there, and asked of the rising of the Council, and shortly upon the same took his horse and rode away. Then were Posts set out through all quarters, so that the said William was taken by the way riding to Diepe, and brought again to Roan. Who being there examined, declared his Faith holdly, and how he came of purpose to disperse those Books in Roan, and went to do the like at Diepe.	The Doctors of Sorbon, and others.	Of these sixty two, fourteen chiefly did stand fast, which were condemned, and racked to confess more of their Fellows: but they uttered none: the rest were scourged and banished the Country. These fourteen were sent to sundry Monasteries to be converted: but that would not be. Then they being sent in a Cart to Melda, or Moux to be burned; by the way, three miles from Paris, a certain Weaver of Conberon by chance meeting them, cried to them aloud, bidding them to be of good cheer, and to cleave fast unto the Lord: who also was taken, and bound with them in the Cart. Coming to the place of Execution, which was before Mangin's house, it was told them, That they which would be confessed, should not have their tongues cut out, the other should. Of whom seven there were, which to save their tongues, confessed; other seven would not. Of the first was Steven Mangin, who having his tongue first cut, notwithstanding spake so that he might be understood, saying thrice, The Lord's Name be blessed. As they were in burning, the people sung Psalms. The Priests seeing that would also sing their Songs; O salutaris hostia, and Salve Regina, while the Sacrifice of these holy Martyrs was finished. Their Wives being compelled to see their Husbands in torments, were after put in Prison; from whence they being promised to be let go, if they would say that their Husbands were damned, refused so to say.
A widow keeping a Victual-ling house in the Suburbs of Roan.	The Week ensuing he was condemned to be burnt alive. After the Sentence given, he was brought in a Cart, accompanied with a Doctor, a Carmelite Friar, before the great Church, who putting a Torch into his hand required him to do homage to the Image of our Lady, which because he refused to do, his Tongue was cut out. The Friar then making a Sermon, when he spake any thing of the Mercies of God, the said William hearkened to him, but when he spake of the merits of Saints, and other Dreams, he turned away his head. All the people there present were not a little astonished thereat, and were in divers opinions, some saying that he had a Devil; others maintained the contrary, saying, if he had a Devil, he should have fallen into despair. 			Peter Chapot first was a Corrector to a Printer in Paris. After he had been at Geneva, to do good to the Church of Christ, like a good Man he came with Books of the holy Scrip- ture into France, and dispersed them abroad unto the faithful. Which great Zeal of his caused him to be apprehended of John Andre, which was the common Promoter to Lister the President, and to the Sorbonists.
			This good Chapot being taken and brought, before the Commissaries, rendered promptly an account of his Faith: unto whom he exhibited a Supplication, or Writing, wherein he learnedly informed the Judges to do their Office uprightly. Then were three Doctors of Sorbone assigned, Nicholas Clerich, John Picard, and Nicolas Maillard, to dispute with him, who

Dr. Nicolas Maillard.	This done, the Judges consulting together upon his Condemnation could not agree: so that Chapot (as it seemed) might have escaped, had not a wicked person, the reporter of the Process fought and wrought his Condemnation, which Condemnation was at length concluded thus, That he should be burned quick, only the cutting off of his tongue was pardoned. The Doctor appointed to be at his Execution was Maillard, with whom he was greatly incumbered. For this Frier called upon him still not to speak to the People, but he desired him that he might pray. Then he bad him pray to our Lady, and confesse her to be his Advocate. He confessed that she was a blessed Virgin, and recited the Lord's Prayer and the Creed, and was about to speak of the Mass, but Maillard would not let him, making haste to his Execution, and said, unless he would say Ave Maria, he should be burnt quick. Then Chapot prayed, O Jesus Son of David, have mercy upon me. Maillard then bad him say, Jesus Maria, and so he should be strangled. Chapot again excused, that he was so weak that he could not speak. Say, said Maillard, Jesus Maria, or else thou shalt be burned quick. As Chapot was thus striving with the Frier, suddenly as it happened, Jesus Maria escaped out of his mouth, but he by and by repressing himself, O God, said he, what have I done! pardon me, O Lord, to thee only have I sinned. Then Maillard commanded the Cord to be plucked about his Neck to strangle him: notwithstanding yet he felt something the fire. After all things done, Maillard all full of anger, went to the Council-house, called La Chamber Ardante, declaring what an Uproar had there almost happened amongst the People; saying that he would complain upon the Judges, for suffering those Hereticks to have their tongues. Whereupon immediately a Decree was made, that all which were to be burned, unless they recanted at the fire, should have their tongues cut off. Which Law diligently afterward was observed. Ex Johanne Crispius lib. 6.	The names of his persecutors in the story be not expressed.	Stephen Polliot coming out of Normandy (where he was born) unto Meaux, tarried there not long, but was compelled to fly, and went to a Town called Fera, where he was apprehended and brought to Paris, and there cast into a foul and dark Prison. In which Prison he was kept in Bands and Fetters a long space, where he saw almost no light. At length being called for before the Senate, and his Sentence given to have his Tongue cut out, and to be burned alive, his Sachel of Books hanging about his Neck; O Lord, said he, is the World in blindness and darkness still? for he thought, being in Prison so long, that the World had been altered from its old darkness to better Knowledge. At last the worthy Martyr of Jesus Christ having his Books about his Neck, was put into the fire, where he with much Patience ended this transitory Life. Ex Hen. Pantal.	Stephen Polliot, Martyr.

Mr. Peter Lefte president of the Council of Paris.	After the burning of those fourteen, whose Names be described before, this Saintinus (which was a lame Cripple) with his Wife removed out of Meaux to Montbéliard, where when he had continued a while in safe liberty of Religion, and saw himself there to do no good, but to be a burden to the Church, cast in his mind to return home to Meaux again, and so did: where at last as he was selling certain small Wares in the Fair, he was there known and apprehended. Whereof when Information was given, he being examined, at the first confessed all, and more than they were willing to hear. In the time of this Inquisition, as they were examining him of certain Points of Religion, and asked him whether he would stand to that he said, or not? He gave this Answer again, worthy to be registered in all Men's hearts, saying, And I ask you again, Lord Judges, dare you be so bold to deny that is so plain and manifest by the open words of the Scripture? So little regard had he to save his own Life, that he desired the Judges both at Meaux, and at Paris, for God's sake, that they would rather take care of their own Lives and Souls, and to consider how much innocent Blood they spilled daily in fighting against Christ Jesus and his Gospel. Officer, Martyr.	This Octovien as he was a great Occupier in all Faires and Countries of France, and well known both in Court and elsewhere; so was he a singular honest Man of great integrity, and also a favourer of God's Word. Who being at his Hofs house at Lyon , rebuked the filthy Talk, and superstitious Behaviour, which there he heard and saw. Wherefore the Hof bearing to him a grudge, chanced to have certain Talk with Gabriel of Sacconex Presteur , concerning the Riches, and a sumptuous Coller set with rich Jewels of this Octovien .		She going to Géneva was taken and brought to Paris, and by the Council there adjudged to be burned at Orleans.
Gabriel of Sacconex presteur.	Thus these two consulting together, did submit a certain person to borrow of him a certain Sum of Crowns; which because Octovien refused to lend, the other caused him to be apprehended for Heresie, thinking thereby to make Attachment of his Goods. But such order was taken by Blondel's Friends, that they were frustrate of their purpose. Then Blondel being examined of his Faith, gave a plain and full Confession of that Doctrine, which he had learned: for the which he was committed to Prison, where he did much good to the Prisoners there. Notwithstanding the Presteur , not leaving so, appealed him up to the High Court of Paris. There Octovien being asked again touching his Faith, which of his two Confessions he would stick to? he being before admonished of his Fall, and of the Offence given thereby to the Faithful, said he would live and die in his first Confession, which he defended to be consonant to the Verity of God's Word. Which done, he was condemned to be burned, and so haste was made to his Execution, left his Friends in the Court might come between and save his Life, Ex Jo. 	Hubert Cheriet, alias Burre, a young man a Tailor, at Dyjon, An. 1549.	An Officer of the Kings ho. de.	Amongst many other godly Martyrs that suffered in France, the Story of this poor Tailor is not the least nor worst to be remembered. His Name is not yet fought out in the French Stories for lack of diligence in those Writers, more is the pity. The Story is this: Not long after the Coronation of Henry the second, the French King, at whose coming into Paris divers good Martyrs were there brought that, and burned for a spectacle, as is above said: A certain poor Taylor, who then dwelt not far from the King's Palace, in the Street bearing the Name of St. Anthony, was apprehended of a certain Officer in the King's house, for that upon a certain holy day he followed his Occupation, and did work for his living: Before he was had to Prison, the Officer asked him, why he did labour and work, giving no Observation to the Holy-day?
Hubert Cheriet, Martyr.	Hubert being a young man of the Age of nineteen years, was burned for the Gospel at Dyjon; who neither by any terrors of death, nor assurances of his Parents, could be otherwise persuaded, but constantly to remain in the Truth unto death. Ibid.	Petrus Castellanus, Bishop of Mascon.	To whom he answered, That he was a poor Man, living only upon his labour: and as for the day, he knew no other but only the Sunday, wherein he might not lawfully work for the necessity of his living. Then the Officer began to ask of him many Questions: whereunto the poor Tailor did so answer, that oftentimes he was clapt in Prison. After that, the Officer coming into the Court to shew what good Service he had done for the holy Church, declared to certain Estates, how he had taken a Lutheran working upon a Holy-day: shewing that he had such answers of him, that he commanded him to Prison. When the Rumor hereof was noised in the Kings Chamber, through the motion of them which were about the King, the poor Man was sent for to appear, that the King might have the hearing of him.
	Master Florent Vemote, Priest at Paris, An. 1549.		The Tailor imprisoned for breaking a piece of a Holy-day.
Florent Vemote, Martyr.	This Florent remained in Prison in Paris four years and nine hours. During which time there was no torment which he did not abide and overcome. Among all other kinds of torments, he was put in a narrow Prison or Brake so strait, that he could neither stand nor lie, which they call the Hofe or Boote, ad Nellar Hippocentis , because it is strait beneath, and wider above, like to the Instrument wherewith Apothecaries are wont to make their Hypocentis . In this he remained seven weeks, where the Tormentors affirm, that no Thief or Murderer could ever endure fifteen days, but was in danger of Life, or Madnes.		The Tailor brought before the Kings Highness.
Peter Listerus president of the Council of Paris, and other Sobonites.	At last, when there was a great thaw in Paris at the King's coming into the City, and divers other Martyrs in sundry places of the City were put to death, he having his Tongue cut off, was brought to see the Execution of them all; and last of all, in the place of Mant-		Whereupon the King's Chamber being voided, save only a few of the chiefest Peers remaining about the King, the simple Tailor was brought. The King sitting in his Chair, commanded Petrus Castellanus Bishop of Mascon , (a Man very fit for such Inquisitions) to question with him. The Tailor being entred, and nothing appalled at the King's Majesty, after his Reverence done unto the Prince, gave thanks to God, that he had so greatly dignified him being such a wretch, as to bring him where he might tell his Truth before such a mighty Prince. Then Castellanus entering talk, began to reason with him touching the greatest and chiefest matter of Religion. Whereunto the Tailor without fear, or any halting in his speech, with present Audacity, Wit, and Memory, so answered for the sincere Doctrine and simple truth of God's Gospel, as was both convenient to the purpose, and also to his Questions aptly and truly correspondent.
			Notwithstanding, the Nobles there present, with cruel Taunts and Rebukes, did what they could to dash him out of Countenance. Yet all this terrified not him; but with Boldness of heart, and free liberty of Speech, he defended

Whereat when the King seemed to muse with himself, as one somewhat amazed, and which might soon have been induced at that present to further Knowledge, the egregious Bishop and other Courtiers seeing the King in such a muse, said, he was an obstinate and stubborn person, obdurate in his own opinion, and therefore was not to be marvelled at, but to be sent to the Judges, and to be punished: and therefore left he should trouble the Ears of the said Henry the King, he was commanded again to the hands of the Officer, that his Cause might be informed: and so, within few days after, he was condemned by the high Steward of the King's House, to be burned alive. And left any deep consideration of that excellent Fortitude of that poor Man might further peradventure pierce the King's mind, the Cardinals and Bishops were ever in the King's Ear, telling him, That these Lutherans were nothing else, but such as carry vain smoke in their Mouths, which being put to the fire, would soon vanish. Wherefore the King was appointed himself to be present at his Execution, which was sharp and cruel, before the Church of Mary the Virgin; where it pleased God to give such strength and courage to his Servant, in suffering his Martyrdom, that the beholding thereof did more astonish the King, than all the other did before. Ex Johan. For the which cause he being suspected for a Lutheran, was followed and watched whither he went, and was taken and brought before the Council of Paris, and put in Prison, where he was racked, and miserably tormented, to the intent he should either change his opinion, or confess others of his Profession. His Torments and Rackings were so fore through the setting on of Maillard and other Sorbonists, that the night thereof made Aubertus one of the Council, a cruel and vehement Enemy against the Gospel, to turn his back and weep. The young Man, when he had made the Tormentors weary with racking, and yet would utter none, at last was had to Maubert place in Paris, to be burned; where he being in the fire, was plucked up again upon the Gibbet, and asked whether he would turn? To whom he said, that he was in his way towards God, and therefore desired them to let him go. Thus this glorious Martyr remaining inextinguishable, glorified the Lord with constant Confession of his Truth. Ibid.
The death and Martyr- dom of this Tailor.		Aubertus, Concilia- rius.	Maurice Scenate in Province, An. 1551. He first having Interrogations put to him by the Lieutenant of that place, made his Answers thereunto, so as no great Advantage could be taken thereof. But he being greatly compuncted and troubled in his Conscience for dissembling with the Truth, and called afterward before the Lord chief Judge, answered so directly, that he was condemned for the same, and burned in Province. Ex eodem.	Maurice Scenate, Martyr.
Claud. Thierry, Martyr.	Claudius Thierry at Orleans, An. 1549. The same year, and for the same Doctrine of the Gospel, one Claudius also was burned at the said Town of Orleans, being apprehended by the way coming from Geneva to his Country. Ex Johan. Crisp.
Leonard Galimard, Martyr.	Leonard Galimard, at Paris, An. 1549. This Leonard for the Confession likewise of Christ and his Gospel, was taken and brought to Paris, and there by the Sentence of the Council was judged to be burnt the same time that Florent Venere above-mentioned, did suffer at Paris. Ex Joh. Crisp.	A Citizen of Uzez.	Joannes Putte, or de Puteo, surnamed Medicus, at Uzez in Province, An. 1551. This Medicus being a Carpenter and unlettered, had a Controvercie about a certain Pit with a Citizen of the Town of Uzez, where he dwelled. He to cast this Medicus in the Law, from the Pit, accused him of Heresie, bringing for his Witnesses those Labourers whom Medicus had hired to work in his Vineyard: wherefore he being examined of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, was condemned and burned at Uzez in Province. Ex eodem.	Joan de Puteo, Martyr.
Macaeus Morecou, Martyr.	Macaeus Morecou, at Troyes, An. 1549. He was burned in Troyer in Champain (a Town in France) remaining constant to the end in the Gospel, for the which he was apprehended. Ex eodem.
John Godeau, Gabriel Beraudinus, Martyrs.	Joannes Godeau, Gabriel Beraudinus, Anno 1550. These two were of the Church of Geneva. Afterward for their friendly admonishing a certain Priest, which in his Sermon had abused the Name of God, they were taken at Chamberiase. Godeau standing to his Confession, was burned. Gabriel, though he began a little to shrink for fear of the Torments, yet being confirmed by the constant death of Godeau, recovered again, and standing likewise to his Confession, first had his Tongue cut out. Who notwithstanding, through God's might, did speak so as he might be understood: whereupon the Hangman being accused for not cutting off his Tongue, rightly, said that he could not stop him of his speech. And so these two, after they had confirmed many in God's Truth, gave their Life for Christ's Gospel. Ibid.	The Go- vernour of Lions. The Offi- cial of the Arch-dea- con of Li- on.	Claudius Monerius at Lions, An. 1551. This Man being well instructed in the Knowledge of God's Word, for the which he was also driven from Avenis, came to Lions, and there taught Children. He hearing of the Lord Presidents coming to the City, went to give warning to a certain familiar Friend of his, and so conducted him out of the Town. In returning again to comfort the Man's Wife and Children, he was taken in his house: and so he confessing that which he knew to be true, and standing to that which he confessed, after much Afflictions in Prisons and Dungeons, was condemned and burned at Lions. He was noted to be so gentle and mild of Conditions, and constant withal, and also learned, that certain of the Judges could not forbear weeping at his death. The said Monerius being in Prison wrote certain Letters, but one especially very comfortable to all the faithful, which, the Lord willing, in the end of these Histories shall be inserted. He wrote also the Questions and Interrogatories of the Official, with his Answers likewise to the same; which summarily we have here contracted, as followeth.	Claud. Monerius, Martyr.

And again, God hath appointed his Angels about us, to minister in our necessities. The Official. Is it not good to salute the blessed Virgin with Ave Maria? The Martyr. When she was on this Earth she had need of the Angels greeting; for then she had need of Salvation, as well as other: but now she is so blessed, that no more blessing can be wished unto her. The Official. Are not Images to be had? The Martyr. For that the Nature of Man is so prone to Idolatry, ever occupied and fixed in those things which lie before his Eyes, rather than upon those which are not seen; Images therefore are not to be set before Christians. You know nothing is to be adored, but that which is not seen with Eyes, that is, God alone, which is a Spirit, and him we must worship only in Spirit and Truth. The Official. What say you by the canonical or ordinary hours for prayer? The Martyr. To hours and times of Prayer we ought not to be tied. But whensoever God's Spirit doth move us, or when any necessity driveth us, then ought we to pray. Then the Official asked, What he thought of holy Oyl, Salt, with such other like? To whom the Martyr answered, That all these things were a meer * Maranismo; that is, favoured of the Law of Maranorum, and of the Superstition of the Jews.	they were brought to the Stake, the young Man first going up, began to weep. The Master fearing lest he would give over, ran to him, and he was comforted, and they began to sing. As they were in the fire: the Master standing upright to the Stake, shifted the fire from him to his Servant, being more careful for him than for himself: and when he saw him dead, he bowed down into the flame, and so expired. Ex Crisp. & alior. Hugonius Gravier, a Schoolmaster and Minister after of Cortillon, in the Country of New-castle. At Burg, Anno 1552. At Burg in Bresse, a days Journey from Lyons, this Gravier was burned. He coming from Geneva to New castle, there was elected to be Minister. So taking their Journey from Lausanna, first they came to Geneva, where they remained a while. From thence they went to Lions, where they, sitting at the Table of one that met them by the way, and desired them home to his house, were apprehended and led to Prison; where they continued a whole year, that is, from the first day of May to the sixteenth of the same Month again. As they were learned and well exercised in the Scriptures, so every one of them exhibited severally a learned Confession of his Faith; and with great dexterity, through the power of the Lord's Spirit, they confounded the Friars, with whom they disputed; especially Peter Scriba or Scripenn, and Seguin. They were examined humbly of the Sacrament of the Lord's Body, of Purgatory, of Confession and Invocation, of Free-will, and of the Supremacy, &c. Although they proved their cause by good Scripture, and refuted their Adversaries in reasoning, yet right being overcome by might, Sentence was given, and they burned in the said Town of Lions. Being set upon the Cart, they began to sing Psalms. As they passed by the Market-place, one of them with a loud voice saluted the People with the words of the last Chapter to the Hibrenes: The God of Peace which brought again from death the great Pastor of the Sheep in the Blood of the eternal Testament, &c. Which being granted, he went and kissed every one, saying, Farewel my Brother. Likewise the other four, following the like Example, bad each one, Farewel my Brother. With that, fire was commanded to be put unto them. The Hangman had tied a Rope about all their Necks, thinking first to strangle them; but their Faces being smeared with Fat and Brimstone, the Rope was burnt before they were strangled. So the blessed Martyrs, in the midst of the fire, spake one to another to be of good cheer, and so departed. Ex Crisp. Pant. &c.		The Martyr. I do arrogate no such Learning unto my self. But this I say, this Parable is not so to be expounded, but is set forth for example of the Lord, to commend to us Charity towards our Neighbour, how one should help another.
	The Examination briefly touched. The Frier. Thou saiest, Friend, in thy Confession, that the Pope is not Supreme head of the Church: I will prove the contrary. The Pope is Successor of St. Peter: Ergo, he is Supreme Head of the Church.		The Frier. Thou saiest in thy Confession, that we are justified only by Faith, I will prove that we are justified by Works. By our Works we do merit: Ergo, by Works we are justified.	Justification.
	The Martyr. I deny first your Antecedent.		The Martyr. I deny the Antecedent.
	The Frier. The Pope sitteth in the place of St. Peter: Ergo, he is the Successor of St. Peter.		The Frier. St. Paul, Hebrews the last, saith, Forget not to do good, and to distribute unto others: Talibus enim victimis promeretur Deus : That is, For by such Oblations God is merited.
Supremacy.	The Martyr. I will grant neither of both: first, because that he, which succeedeth in the room of Peter, ought to preach and teach as Peter did; which thing the Pope doth not. Secondly, altho he did so preach as Peter did, he might well follow the Example of Peter, yet should he not therefore be the Head of the Church, but a member only of the same. The Head of Men and Angels, whom God hath appointed, is Christ alone, saith St. Paul.		We merit God by our Works: Ergo, we are justified by our Works.
The head of the Church.	The Frier. Although Christ be the Head of the whole Church Militant and Triumphant, yet his Vicar here in Earth is left to supply his room.		The Martyr. The words of St. Paul in that place be otherwise, and are thus to be translated: Talibus enim victimis delectatur Deus : That is, With such Sacrifices God is delighted, or is well pleased.
Episc.	The Martyr. I will prove, that although Christ be King both of Heaven and Earth, yet he hath here in Earth many Vicars under him, to govern his People.		The Judge Vilard. Vilard the Judge turned the Book, and found the place even to be so as the Prisoner said: Here the Friars were marvellously appalled and troubled in their minds: of whom one asked them, What he thought of Confession?	Confession.
	The Frier. It is one thing to rule in the Civil State, another thing to rule spiritually. For in civil Regiment we have Kings and Princes ordained of God by the Scriptures, for the Observation of publick Society: In the Spiritual Regiment and Kingdom of the Church it is not so.		To whom the Martyr answered, That Confession only is to be made to God, and that those places which they alledg for Auricular Confession, out of St. James and other, are to be expounded of brotherly Reconciliation between one another, and not of Confession in the Priest's Ear. And here again the Friars stood, having nothing to say against it.
Reciment civil.	The Martyr. Thou saiest St. Peter is not the Head of the Church, I will prove he is.		A black Frier. Dost thou not believe the Body of Christ to be locally and corporally in the Sacrament? I will prove the same: Transubstantiation. Jesus Christ taking Bread, said, This is my Body. Ergo, it is truly his Body.
Reciment Spiritual.	The Martyr. Our Lord said to Peter, Thou shalt be called Cephas : which Cephas is as much to say in Latin, as Head: Ergo, Peter is Head of the Church.		The Martyr. The Verb (est) is not to be taken here Substantively in his own proper signification, as shewing the Nature of a thing in Substance, as in Philosophy it is wont to be taken; but as noting the property of a thing signifying, after the manner and Phrase of the Scripture; where one thing is wont to be called by the name of another, so as the Sign is called by the Name of the thing signified, &c. So is Circumcision called by the Name of the Covenant, and yet is not the Covenant. So the Lamb hath the Name of the Passover, yet is not the same. In which two Sacraments of the old Law, ye see the Verb (est) to be taken, not as shewing the substance of being, but the property of being in the thing that is spoken of: And so likewise in the Sacrament of the new Law.
John 1. Cephas.	The Martyr. Where find you that Interpretation? St. John in his first Chapter doth expound it otherwise: Thou shalt be called Cephas , that is as much (saith he) as Petrus , or Stone.		The Frier. The Sacraments of the old Law, and of the new do differ greatly; for these give Grace, so did not the other.	Sacraments give no Grace.
	The Martyr. Then the Judge Vilardur, calling for a New Testament, turned to the place, and found it to be so. Whereupon the Frier was utterly dashed and stood mute.		The Martyr. Neither the Sacraments of the old, nor of the new Law, do give Grace, but shew him unto us which giveth Grace indeed. The Minister giveth the Sacraments, but Jesus Christ giveth Grace by the operation of the Holy Ghost: of whom it is said, This is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost , &c.
Luke 10.	The Frier. Thou saiest in thy Confession, that a Man hath no Free-will, I will prove it. It is written in the Gospel, how a Man going from Jerusalem to Jericho fell among Thieves, and was spoiled, maimed, and left half dead, &c. Thomas of Aquine expoundeth this Parable to mean Free-will, which he saith, is maimed; yet not so, but that some power remaineth in Man to work.		The Frier. The Fathers of the Old Testament, were they not Partakers of the same Grace and Promises with us?	John's.
	The Martyr. This Interpretation I do refuse, and deny.		The Martyr. Yes, for St. Paul saith, that the Fathers of the Old Testament did eat the same spiritual Meat, and did drink of the same spiritual Drink with us.
	The Frier. What, thinkest thou thy self better learned than St. Thomas?		The Frier. Jesus Christ saith, John the sixth, Your Fathers did eat Manna in the Desert, and are dead. Ergo, they were not Partakers of the same Grace with us in the New Testament.	The

The true eating of Manna.

Perfectus. Martyrs, and the Causes of their Martyrdom.

The Martyr.

Christ here speaketh of them, which did not eat that Manna with Faith, which was a type and figure of that Bread of Life that came from Heaven: and not of them which did eat the same with Faith, as Moses, Aaron, Joshua, Caleb, and such others, who under the shadows of the Old Testament, did look for Christ to come. For so it is written of Abraham, That he saw the day of Christ, and rejoiced; not seeing it with his bodily eyes, but with the eyes of his Faith.

Here the doltish Doctor was at a stay, having nothing to say, but, Hear Friend, be not so hot, nor so hasty, tarry a while, tarry a while. At length, after his tarrying, this came out.

The Frier.

The Fathers of the Old Testament, how they were under the Law and how they were under Grace.

I will prove that they of the Old Testament were not partakers of the same Grace with us. The Law (saith St. Paul) worketh anger; And they that are under the Law, are under Malediction: Exge, they of the Old Law and Testament, were not partakers of the same Grace with us.

The Martyr.

St. Paul here proveth, That no Man by the Law can be justified, but that all Men are under the Anger and Curse of God thereby, forasmuch as no Man performeth that which in the Law is comprehended; and therefore, we have need every Man to run to Christ, to be saved by Faith, seeing no Man can be saved by the Law. For whosoever trusteth to the Law, hoping to find justification thereby, and not by Christ only, the same remaineth still under malediction: not because the Law is cursed, or the times thereof under the Curse; but because of the weakness of our natures, which are not able to perform the Law.

The Frier.

St. Paul, Rom. 7, declareth in the Old Testament to be nothing but Anger and Threatenings, and in the New Testament to be Grace and Mercy, in their words where he saith, Wretched Man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? The Grace of God by Jesus Christ.

The Martyr.

St. Paul in this place neither meaneth nor speaketh of the difference of times between the Old and the New Testament, but of the conflict between the flesh and the spirit; so that, whereas the flesh is ever rebelling against the spirit, yet the spiritual Man notwithstanding, through the Faith of Christ, hath the Victory. Furthermore, the true translation of that place hath not Gratia Dei, but Gratia ago Deo, per Jesum Christum, &c.

Primaicus the Official.

The Sacrament.

The Official, seeing the Frier almost here at a point, set in, and said, Thou lewd Heretick, dost thou deny the blessed Sacrament?

The Martyr.

No Sir, but I embrace and reverence the Sacrament, so as it was instituted of the Lord, and left by his Apostles.

The Official.

Thou deniest the Body of Christ to be in the Sacrament, and thou callest the Sacrament Bread.

The Martyr.

The Scripture teacheth us to seek the Body of Christ in Heaven, and not in Earth; where we read, Coloss. 3. If ye be risen with Christ, seek not for the things which are upon the Earth: But for the things which are in Heaven, where Christ is sitting at the right Hand of God, &c.

And whereas I affirm the Sacrament not to be the Body, but Bread, speaking of Bread remaining in its own Substance, herein I do no other but as St. Paul doth, who, 1 Cor. 11, doth call it Bread likewise four or five times together.

The Frier.

Jesus Christ said, that he was the Bread of Life.

The Official.

Thou naughty Heretick, Jesus Christ said that he was a Vine, and a Door, &c. Where he is to be expounded to speak figuratively. But the words of the Sacrament are not so to be expounded.

The Martyr.

Those Testimonies which you alledge, make more for me than for you.

Perfectus. Martyrs, and the Causes of their Martyrdom.

The Official.

What sayest thou, lewd Heretick, is the Bread of the Lord's Supper, and the Bread that we eat at home, all one, and is there no difference between them?

The Martyr.

In Nature and Substance there is no difference, in quality and in use there is much difference. For the Bread of the Lord's Table, tho it be of the same nature and substance with the Bread that we eat at home, yet when it is applied to be a Sacrament, it taketh another quality, and is set before us to seal the Promise of our Spiritual and Eternal Life. And thus was the effect of their Examinations.

Ex Crisp.

Petrus Bergerius, at Lions, Anno 1553.

The Name of his Persecutor appeared not in his story.

About the same time, when these five Students above specified were apprehended, this Bergerius also was taken at Lions, and with them examined, and made also the like Confession with them together, and shortly after them suffered the same Martyrdom. He had been before an Occupier or Merchant of Wines. He had Wife and Children at Geneva, to whom he wrote sweet and comfortable Letters. In the Dungeon with him was a certain Thief and Malefactor, which had lain there the space of 7 or 8 months. This Thief, for pain and torment, cried out of God, and cursed his Parents that begat him, being almost eaten up with Lice, miserably handled, and fed with such Bread as Dogs and Horses had refused to eat. So it pleased the goodness of Almighty God, that through the teaching and prayer of this Bergerius, he was brought to repentance of himself, and knowledge of God, learning much comfort and patience by the Word of the Gospel preached to him. Touching his Conversation, he wrote a sweet Letter to those five Students above mentioned, wherein he praiseth God for them, and especially for this Bergerius, declaring also in the same Letter, that the next day after that he had taken hold of the Gospel, and framed himself to patience; according to the same, his Lice (which he could pluck out before no less than twenty at once betwixt his fingers) now were gone from him, that he had not one. Furthermore, so the Alms of good Men was extended towards him, that he was fed with White-bread, and that which was very good: Such is the goodness of the Lord toward them that love and seek his Truth. The name of this Convert was John Chambone. Ex Epist. Joan. Chambone: Ex Crisp. Pantale, &c.

Dyonisius Pelloquinius, at Ville Franche about Lions.
Anno 1553.

Stephan Pelloquine, Brother to this Dyonisius, was taken about two or three years before, Stephan and Dyonisius Pelloquine, Brethren, & Martyrs. with Ann Audubert above mentioned, and also martyred for the testimony of the Gospel at the same time, with a small fire. After whom followed Dyonisius Pelloquine, in the same steps of martyrdom, which was his Brother. This Dyonisius had been sometime a Monk, and changing his Weed, took a Wife, with whom he lived a certain space at Geneva in godly Order and modestly of Life. Coming afterward to Ville Franche, six miles from Lions, from thence he was had to Lions, where he remained in Prison ten months. From thence he was reverted to Ville Franche, where he was condemned, degraded, and burned. The Articles whereupon he was condemned, were, for the Mass, the Sacrament, Auricular Confession, Purgatory, the Virgin Mary, and the Pope's Supremacy. He suffered in the year of our Lord 1553. Septemb. 11. In his Martyrdom, such patience and fortitude God gave, that when he was half burned, yet he never ceased holding up his hands to Heaven, and calling upon the Lord, to the great admiration of them that looked on. Item, The said Lieutenant said to Mr. Cope's Maid, speaking somewhat of the Law, Cursed be the God of that Law. When the Sentence of Condemnation was given against these three, they were so glad thereof, that they went out praising God, and singing Psalms. Which troubled the Judges sore, to see them so little to esteem their death: inasmuch that the Lieutenant caused them to be made to hold their peace, saying, Shall these vile Abjects so vaunt themselves against the whole State of the Realm? Then as Marficus was going in a Corner by to pray, one of the Soldiers would not suffer him. To whom he said, That little time which we have will you not give us to pray? With that the Soldier being astonished went his way. As they should be brought out of Prison to the Stake, the Hangman tied a Rope about the Necks of the other two. Marficus seeing himself to be spared because of his Order and Degree, called by the way to the Lieutenant, that he might also have one of the precious Chains about his Neck, in honour of his Lord; the which being granted, so were these three blessed Martyrs committed to the fire, where they with meek patience yielded up their lives to the hands of the Lord, in testimony of his Gospel. The Lieu- tenant of Lions.	This Merchant first lived a vicious and detestable life, full of much corruption and filthiness. He was also a secret Enemy, and searcher out of good Men, when and where they convened together. Who being called notwithstanding, by the grace of God, to the knowledge and favour of his Word, shortly after was taken by the Lieutenant, and Buathertius the Official, in his own house at Lions, and so after a little examination was sent to Prison. Being examined by the Inquisitor and the Officials, he refused to yield any answer to them, knowing no authority they had upon him, but only to the Lieutenant. His Answers were, that he believed all that the holy universal Church of Christ did truly believe, and all the Articles of the Creed. To the Article of the Holy Catholick Church, being		Simon Laloe a Spectaclemaker, coming from Geneva into France for certain business, was laid hand of by the Bailiff of Dyion. Three things were demanded of him. First, Where he dwelt. Secondly, What was his Faith. Thirdly, What Fellows he knew of his Religion. His dwelling, he said, was at Geneva. His Religion was such as was then used at Geneva. As for his Fellows, he said, he knew none, but only them of the same City of Geneva, where his dwelling was. When they could get of him no other answer but this, with all their racking and torments, they proceeded to his Sentence, and pursued the execution of the same, which was Nov. 21. 1553.
Primaries Official.			The Executioner, who was named James Silvesters, seeing the great faith and constancy of that heavenly Martyr, was so compuncted with repentance, and fell in such despair of himself, that they had much ado, with all the promises of the Gospel, to recover any comfort in him. At last, through the Mercy of Christ, he was comforted, and converted; and so he with all his Family removed to the Church at Geneva. Ex Jo. Crisp.	The Execu- tioner con- verted.
			This Nicholas, a Shoemaker, coming to Paris with certain fardels of Books, was there apprehended; who stoutly persisting in confessing the Truth, was tried with sundry torments, to utter what Fellows he had besides of his Profession, so cruelly, that his body was dissolved almost one joint from another; but so constant he was in his silence, that he would express none. As they brought him to the Stake, first they put a gag or piece of wood in his mouth, which they bound	Torments.

By the way they passed by an Hospital, where they willed him to worship the Picture of St. Mary standing at the Gate: but he turned his back as well as he could, and would not. For the which the blind People were so grieved, that they would have fallen upon him. After he was brought to the fire, they so smeared his body with fat and brimstone, that at the first taking of the fire, all his skin was parched, and the inward parts not touched. With that the cords burst which were about his mouth, whereby his voice was heard in the midst of the flame, praising the Lord, and so the blessed Martyr departed. Ex Jo. Crisp.	The Governor of Marches,	Stephen King, Petrus Denochus, at Chartres. Anno 1553. Stephen King, after he had been at Strasbourg a while, returned again into his Country, dwelling in a Town bearing the name of St. George, not far from Chauxfont; where he served in the place of a Notary, and had under him a Clerk named Peter Denoch, who also had been at Geneva, and was there zealous in instructing the ignorant, and rebuking blasphemous Swearers, and other Offenders. These two were not long together but they were suspected both of Lutheranism, and so were apprehended by the Governor of the Marches, or Marthal, and so were carried to Chartres: where after their constant confession, upon their examination made, they were enclosed in Prison, and there sustained long and tedious endurance. During the which mean time, Stephen King made many worthy Songs and Sonets in the praise of the Lord, whereby to recreate his Spirit in that doleful captivity. At length, when after long persuasions and fair promises of the Bishop, and of other, they could not be moved from the Doctrine of their Confession, they were condemned. From that condemnation, they appealed to the Court of Paris. But the Council there, confirming their former Sentence, returned them again to Chartres, from whence they came, where they were both executed with cruel punishment of fire. Ex Hist. Gallie. per Jo. Crisp.
Peter Serre, martyr.	Peter Serre, about Tolouse, Anno 1553. Peter Serre first was a Priest, then changing his Religion, he went to Geneva, and learned the Shoemakers Craft, and so lived. Afterward upon a singular love he came to his Brother at Tolouse, to the intent to do him good. His Brother had a Wife, which was not well pleased with his Religion and coming. She in secret counsel told another Woman, one of her Neighbours, of this. What doth she, but goeth to the Official, and maketh him privy of all. The Official thinking to foreclose no time, taking counsel with his Fellows, laid hands upon this Peter, and brought him before the Inquisitor. To whom he made such declaration of his Faith, that he seemed to reduce the Inquisitor to some feeling of Conscience, and began to instruct him in the Principles of true Religion. Notwithstanding, all this helped not but that he was condemned by the said Chancellor, to be degraded, and committed to the secular Judge. The Judge enquiring of what Occupation he was, he said, that of late he was a Shoemaker. Whereby the Judge, understanding that he had been of some other faculty before, required what it was. He said he had been of another faculty before, but he was ashamed to utter it, or to remember it, being the worst and vilest science of all other in the whole World besides. The Judge and the People, supposing that he had been some Thief or Cutpurse, enquired to know what it was; but he for shame and sorrow stopped his mouth, and would not declare it. At last, through their importunate clamour, he was constrained to declare the Truth, and said, That he had been a Priest. The Judge thereupon was so moved, that he condemned him; first, enjoining him in his condemnation, to ask the King forgiveness, then judged him to have his tongue cut out, and so to be burned. From this Sentence, he appealed to the Parliament of Tolouse: Nor for that he thought thereby to save his life, but because he was enjoined to ask the King forgiveness, whom he had never offended. Also because he was judged to have his tongue cut off, wherewith he would praise his God. Notwithstanding, by the Sentence of that Parliament, he was likewise condemned to be burned; only he was pardoned for asking forgiveness of the King, and the cutting off of his tongue, so that he would say nothing against their Religion.	Priests of Burges.	Antonius Magnus, or Magnus, at Paris. Anno 1554. Antonius Magnus, was sent by the five which were in Prison at Lions, above-mentioned, and by other also that were in in Captivity at Paris, unto Geneva, to commend them to their prayers unto God for them. Who, after certain business there dispatched returned again into France, and there within three hours of his coming, was betrayed and taken by certain Priests at Burges, and there delivered by the said Priests unto the Official, after a few days the King's Justices took him from the Official, & sent him to Paris; where after great rebukes and torments he suffered in the Prison, and firmly persisting in the profession of the Truth, by their capital Sentence he was adjudged to have his tongue cut out, and so was burned at Maulbert-place in Paris. Ex Jo. Priests cross, a vile and a filthy Art.	As he went to burning, he passed by the College of St. Martial, where he was bid to honour the Picture of the Virgin standing at the gate. Which because he refused, the Judge commanded his tongue to be cut off; and so being put to the fire, he stood so quiet, looking up to Heaven all the time of burning, as tho he had felt nothing, bringing such admiration to the people, that one of the Parliament said, that way not to be belied, to bring the Lutherans to the fire, for that would do more hurt than good. Ex Jo. Crisp.	False Brethren.	This Alencon did much good in the Provinces of France by carrying Books. Coming to Montpeliers, he was there circumvented by false Brethren, detected, and laid in Prison. In his Faith he was firm and constant, to the end of his martyrdom, being burned the 7th of January, 1554. There was the same time at Montpeliers a certain Shereman or Clothworker, who had been long in durance for Religion, but at length for fear and infirmity he revolted. To whom it was enjoined by the Judges to make publick recantation, and to be present also at the burning of Alencon afore said. At the beholding of whose death and constancy, it pleased God to strike into this Man such boldness, that he desired the Judges, that either he might burn with this Alencon, or else be brought again into Prison, saying, That he would make no other recantation, but so. Wherefore within three days after he was likewise condemned to the fire, and burned in the Town afore said. Ex Jo. Crisp.

Paris Panier Martyr.	Paris Panier, a Lawyer, at Dola, Anno 1554. At Dola was beheaded a good and godly Lawyer, named Paris Panier , for constant standing to the Gospel of Christ; Anno 1554. Ex Pantal.	there was nothing amended. Where behold the Judgment of God: In the mean time, while they were at Paris , the wretched persecutor, Giles le Pers , was suddenly stricken mad and died in a Frenzy: which made many Men to wonder, and especially the Martyrs to be more constant. At last, the Decree of the Sentence was read against them. 1. For speaking against the Sacrament; which they denied. 2. For speaking against Baptism; which also they de- nied. 3. For speaking contumely against the Saints; which they in like manner denied.	Note the just vengeance of God upon a wicked Per- secutor.
Peter du Val martyr.	Peter du Val Shoemaker, at Nismes, Anno 1554. At Newman in Delphinat , Peter du Val sustained fore and grievous rackings and tor- ments; where with his Body being broken, dis- solved, and maimed, yet he notwithstanding manfully abiding all their extremity, would name and utter none. Then was he had to the fire, and there consumed, Anno 1554. Ex Jo. Crisp.	After this, the Officer, to cause them to recant, threatned them with torments, which they sustained very extreme, the space from after dinner till three of the clock. When all that would not turn them, he sent to them a Friar Du- minick , a Man captious and sophistical, to press them in disputation. But as he could do no hurt unto them, so could they do no good upon him. When the time of their exe- cution did approach, the Officer aforesaid put into their hands, being tied, a wooden Cross, which they took with their teeth, and flung it away: for the which, the Officer commanded both their tongues to be cut off. Wherein ap- peared another marvellous Work of the Lord: For never- theless that their tongues were taken from them, to the in- tent they should not speak, yet God gave them utterance, their tongues being cut out, to speak at their death, say- ing, We bid Sin, the Flesh, the World, and the Devil, fare- wel for ever, with whom we shall never have to do hereaf- ter. Divers other words they spake besides, which the Peo- ple did hear and note. At last when the Tormenter came to linear them with Brimstone and Gunpowder: Go to, said Filiolus , salt on, salt on the stinking and rotten flesh. Fi- nally, as the flame came bursting up to their faces, they, per- sisting constant in the fire, gave up their lives, and finished their martyrdoms. Ex Jo. Crisp. & Hen. John Filol, Joh. le Ville martyr.	Joannes Filiculus, or Filiculus, Carpenter. Julianus le Ville, Point-maker, at Sancer- re, Anno 1554. These two blessed and constant Martyrs, as they were going toward Geneva , with one of their Sons and a Daughter, were apprehend- ed by Giles le Pers ; who in the way over- taking them, and most wickedly and judally pretending great favour to them, and to their Religion, which he (as he said) supported them to be of, with these and many other fair words circumvented and allured them, to con- fess what was their Faith; whither they went with their Children; and also that their Wives were at Geneva . When they had declared this, the wretched Traitor gave a sign to the Horre- men, and so were these simple Saints of Christ entrapped and brought to the Castle of Nivern . Being in Prison, they were examined of many things: Whereunto they answered uprightly, according to their Faith.
John Ber- geronius, another Inquisitor or Coun- sellor.	John Bergeronius, another Inquisitor or Coun- sellor.
Translu- scantion.	First, Touching the Sacrament, they affirmed the Tran- scantion of the Bishop of Rome to be against the Ar- ticle of the Creed, which saith that Christ is gone up to Heaven, and there sitteth at the right Hand of God: and therefore the Bread and Wine must needs remain in their Properties, being notwithstanding a Sacrament, or a holy sign of the Body and Blood of the Lord. For like as by Bread and Wine the heart of Man is comforted, so the Bo- dy of Christ crucified, and his Blood shed spiritually, hath the like operation in the Souls of the Believers.
A strife be- tween the Bread and the Body of Christ.	For the Mass, they said it was a thing most superstitious, and meer Idolatry. And if we put any part of Salvation therein, they said, it was utterly a robbing the Passion of Christ the Son of God, and that it was not once to be na- med out of a Christian mouth. Also, that they which say that Pater either was Pope, or Author of the said Mass, are far deceived. And as for turning Bread into the Body of Christ by the words of Consecration, it was an error, they said, more of mad-men than any sad-men: forasmuch as God is neither subject to Men, nor to the tongues or ex- orcisms of Men. Purgatory they denied to be any, save only the Blood of Jesus Christ.
The Mass.	Furthermore, as they would not bereave the Saints of God of their due honour, so neither the Saints themselves, said they, will be contented to rob God of his honour only due to him.
Honour to God, not to Saints.	As touching Confession, their opinion was, that the wounds and cafes of Conscience belong to no Man, but only to God. After these answers given and written, they were sent to the Monastery of Sainpeter , there to be disputed with. That done, the matter came to be debated among the Judges, what was to be done with them. Some would their goods to be taken by Inventory, and them to be banished. But Bergeronius at last caused to be determined, that they should be burned, and first to hear Mass. From that Court they appealed to the Court of Paris : but the matter

In the same year suffered at Roan , Denis Vayre , who, first leaving his popish Priesthood, went to Geneva , where he learned the Art of Bookbind- ing, and brought many times Books into France . After that, in the reign of King Edward the 6th, he came to Geneva , and there was Minister and preached. After the death of King Edward , the time not serving him to tarry, thinking to re- turn again to Geneva , he came into Normandy with his Books, into a Town called Fuaille : Whereas he going out to hire a Cart, William Langlois , with John Langlois his Brother, came in and stayed his Books, and him also which had the custody of them. Denis , albeit he might have escaped, yet hearing the keeper of his Books to be in trouble, came, and presenting himself, was committed, the other was delivered. First, after two months and a half im- prisonment, he was charged to be a Spy, because he came out of England . Then from that Prison he was removed to the Bishop's Prison, and then to Roan ; where Sentence was given, that he should be burned alive, and thrice lifted up, and let down again into the fire. After the Sentence gi- ven, they threatned him with many terrible torments, un- less he would disclose such as he knew of that side. To whom he answered, That the founder part of all France , and of the Senate, was of that Religion: Notwithstanding, he would utter no Man's Name unto them. And as for their torments, he said, he passed not; for if he were killed with racking, then he should not feel the burning of the fire. When they saw him so little to pass for their tor- ments, they left that, and proceeded to his burning: and first, they put a Cross in his hands, which he would not hold. Then because he coming by the Image of the Virgin Mary , would not adore the same, they cried, Cut out his tongue: and so they cast him into the fire, where he should be thrice taken up, but the flame went so high, that the Hangman, being not able to come near him, cried to the people standing by to help, and so did the Officers with their staves lay upon the People, to help their Tormentors, but never a Man would stir. K. Hen. 8. A Merchant famous for jesting against the Friars.	There was a rich Merchant of Paris , who said in jest to the Friars of St. Francis , You wear a rope about your bodies, because St. Francis once should have been hanged, and the Pope redeemed him upon this condition, that all his life after he should wear a rope. Upon this the Franciscan Friars of Paris caused him to be apprehended, and laid in prison, and so judgment passed upon him that he should be hanged: but he, to save his life, was contented to recant, and so did. The Friars hearing of his recantation, commended him, saying, if he continued so, he should be saved; and so calling upon the Officers, caused them to make haste to the Gallows, to hang him up while he was yet in a good way, said they, left he fall again. And so was this Merchant, notwithstanding his recantation, hanged for jesting against the Friars. Ex Pantal. lib. 7.	Inquisitor. Dost thou believe the Church of Rome ? This Thomas had copied out certain spiritual Songs out of a Book in Geneva , which he brought with him to Tourney , and lent the same to one of his fellows. This Book being espied, he was called for of the Justice, and examined of the Book, which he said contained nothing but that was agreeing to the Scripture, and that he would stand by.	Inquisitor. What Catholick Church is that?
Nicholas Paul, Martyr.	Then he was had to the Castle, and after nineteen days was brought to the Town-houle, and there adjudged to the fire; whereunto he went cheerfully, singing Psalms. Then he went to Geneva , where he remained nine or ten years. From thence returning to Lions , there he was apprehended and condemned. Then he appealed to the High-Court of Paris , through the motion of his friends. Where in the way as he was led to Paris , he was met by certain whom he knew not, and by them taken from his keepers, and so set at liberty, which was Anno 1551.	The Martyr. Where is the Congregation, or how is it known?
The Lieu- tenant.	After this, continuing at Geneva about the space of three years, he came upon business to the Province of Dolphins , and there as he found fault with the Grace said in Latin, he was detected, and taken in his Inn in the night, by the Under-marshal, or him which had the examination of Malefactors. The next day he was sent to the Justice, from him to the Bishop, who ridding their hands of him, then was he brought to the Lieutenant, who sent his Advocate with a Notary to him in Prison, to examine him of his Faith. The whole Proceeds of his Examinations, with his Adversaries and the Friars, in his Story described, is long, the principal contents come to this effect.	Inquisitor. It is consilient in the number of God's Elect, whom God hath chosen to be the members of his Son Jesus Christ, of whom he is also the head.	The Church.
The ex- amination of Richard Ferruss.		The Martyr. It is dispersed through the universal World, in divers Regions, and is known by the spiritual direction wherewith it is governed, that is to say, both by the Word of God, and by the right institution of Christ's Sacraments.
		Inquisitor. Do you think the Church that is at Geneva , Lausanne , Berne , and such other places, to be a more true Church than the holy Church of Rome ?
		The Martyr. Yea, verily, for these have the Notes of the true Church.
		Inquisitor. What difference then make you between those Churches and the Church of Rome ?
		The Martyr. Much; for the Church of Rome is governed only with Traditions of Men, but those are ruled only by the Word of God.	Difference between the Church of Rome , and the Church of Christ.

		The Martyr. About nine or ten years.
		Inquisitor. Dost thou not believe the Virgin Mary to be a Mediatrix and Advocate to God for Sinners?	The Virgin Mary so Advocate.
		The Martyr. I believe, as in the Word of God is testified, Jesus Christ to be the only Mediator and Advocate for all Sinners; albeit the Virgin Mary be a blessed Woman, yet the Office of an Advocate belongeth not unto her.
		Inquisitor. The Saints that be in Paradise, have they no power to pray for us?	Whether Saints do pray.
		The Martyr. No, but I judge them to be blessed, and to be contented with that grace and glory which they have, that is, that they be counted the members of the Son of God?
		Inquisitor. And what then judge you of them which follow the Religion of the Church of Rome ? think you them to be Christians?
		The Martyr. No, for that Church is not governed with the Spirit of God, but rather fighteth against the same.	The Church of Rome is not the Church of Christ.

not be said in Latin? Because, said he, by the Word of God Christians are commanded to pray with heart and with spirit, and with that tongue which is most understood, and (seventh best) to the edification of the hearers. Then the Friar bringing forth his Benedictus, Agimus tibi gratias, &c. Laus Deo, Pax vivis, Requies defunctis, &c. began thus to reason.

The Friar.

Praying in a strange tongue.

God understandeth all tongues, and the Church of Rome hath prescribed this form of praying, receiving the same from the ancient Church and the Fathers, which used then to pray in Latin. And if any tongue be to be observed in prayer, one more than another, why is it not as good to pray in the Latin tongue, as to pray in the French?

The Martyr.

My meaning is not to exclude any kind of language from prayer, whether it be Latin, Greek, Hebrew, or any other, so that the same be understood, and may edify the hearers.

The Friar.

When Christ entered the City of Jerusalem, the People cried, hailing him with Hosanna filio David, and yet understood they not what they said, as Jerome writeth.

The Martyr.

It may be that Jerome so writeth, that they understood not the prophetic meaning, or the accomplishment of these words upon Christ his coming; but that they understood the phrase of that Speech or Language which they spake, speaking in their own Language, Jerome doth not deny.

Then the Friar, declaring that he was no fit person to expound the Scriptures being in the Latin Tongue, inferred the authorities of Councils and Doctors, and testimonies of Men, which seemed to move the Officer not a little; who then charging him with many things, as with words spoken in contempt of the virgin Mary, and of the Saints, also with rebellion against Princes and Kings, came at last to the matter of the Sacrament, and demanded thus:

Inquisitor.

Doth thou believe the Holy Host which the Priest doth consecrate at the Mass or no?

The Martyr.

I believe neither the Host, nor any such Consecration.

Inquisitor.

Why? doth thou not believe the holy Sacrament of the Altar, ordained of Christ Jesus himself?

The Martyr.

Touching the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, I believe that whensoever we use the same according to the prescription of St. Paul, we are refreshed spiritually with the Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the true spiritual meat and drink of our Souls.

The Friar.

The Friar then inferred the words of St. John's Gospel, saying, My flesh is meat indeed, &c. and said, that the Doctors of the Church had decided that matter already, and had approved the Mass to be an holy memory of the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The Martyr.

The Sacrament of the Supper I believe to be ordained of the Lord for a memorial of his death, and for a stirring up of our thanksgiving to him. In which Sacrament we have nothing to offer up to him, but do receive with all thanksgiving the benefits offered of God to us most abundantly in Christ Jesus his Son.

And thus the Advocate with the Friar, bidding the Notary to write the words that he had spoken, departed. Who after eight days, being accompanied with the said Franciscan, and other Friars more of the Dominicks, sent for the said Richard Ferrus again to his house, and thus began to enquire:

Inquisitor.

Purgatory.

Doth thou believe any Purgatory?

The Martyr.

I believe that Christ with his precious Blood hath made an end of all Purgatory, and purgation of our Sins.

Perfectus. Martyrs, and the causes of their Martyrdom.

K.Hen.8.

Inquisitor.

And dost thou think then there is no place after this life, where Souls of Men departed remain so long till they have made satisfaction for their sins?

The Martyr.

No; but I acknowledge one satisfaction once made for the Sins of all Men, by the Blood and Sacrifice of Jesus Christ our Lord, which is the propitiation and purgation for the sins of the whole World.

The Friar.

In the eighteenth chapter of Matthew, Christ speaking by way of a parable or similitude, of a certain cruel Servant, who, because he would not forgive his fellow-servant, was cast into prison, saith, That he shall not come out from thence till he hath paid the uttermost farthing. By the which similitude is signified unto us a certain middle place, which is left for satisfaction to be made after this life for sins.

The Martyr.

First, the satisfaction for our Sins by the death of Christ is plain and evident in the Scriptures; as in these places: Come to me, all you that labour and be burdened, and I will refresh you. Mat. 11. I am the Door, he that entereth by me, shall be saved. John 10. I am the way, verity and life. John 13. Blessed be they that die in the Lord, for they rest from their labours. Apoc. 13. Also to the Thief which hanged with the Lord, it was said, This day thou shalt be with me in Paradise, &c. Secondly; As touching this similitude, it hath no other demonstration but to admonish us of our duty, in shewing charity, and forgiving one another, which unless we do, there is no mercy to be looked for at the hands of God.

The Friar.

If this be true that you say, then it should follow that there is neither Purgatory nor any Limbus, which were against our Christian Faith and our Creed, which saith, He descended into Hell, &c.

The Deputy.

Doth thou believe there is a Limbus?

The Martyr.

Neither do I believe to be any such place, neither doth the Scripture thereof make any mention.

The Friar.

Where were the old Fathers then before the death of Christ?

The Martyr.

In life (I say) eternal, which they looked for, being promised before to Adam, Abraham, and the Patriarchs in the seed to come.

The Deputy.

Then the Deputy: What (saith he) dost thou believe that the Pope hath any power?

The Martyr.

Yea verily.

The Deputy.

Doth thou believe that the Pope, as the Vicar of Jesus Christ, can here bind and loose?

The power of the Pope.

The Martyr.

That I do not believe.

The Deputy.

How then dost thou understand the power of the Pope?

The Martyr.

I understand the Power of the Pope so as St. Paul declareth, 2 Thess. saying, That because the World refused to receive the love of the truth unto salvation, therefore God hath given to Satan, and to his Ministers, power of illusions and errors, that Men should believe lies, and set up to themselves Pastors and Teachers such as they deserve.

The Friar.

Christ gave to Saint Peter power to bind and loose, whose Successor, and Vicar of Christ, is the Pope, for the government of the Church, that it might have one head in the World, as it hath in Heaven. And tho the Pastors do not live according to the Word which they preach, yet their Doctrine is not therefore to be refused, as Christ teacheth, Mat. 23.

The Martyr.

If the Pope and his adherents would preach the Word purely and sincerely, admixing no other inventions of their own,

Mar. 29.	And as touching the keys of binding and loosing, given to Peter , Christ therein assigned to Peter and other Apostles, the office of preaching the Word of the Gospel, which they did also well observe, in preaching nothing else but only the Word, in the which Word is all the power contained of binding and loosing. Neither is it to be granted, the Church to have two Heads, one in Heaven, another in Earth: the Head whereof is but one, which is Jesus Christ, whom the Father hath appointed to be Head alone both in Heaven and Earth, as St. Paul in many places of his Epistles doth teach. Ephes. 1. Coloss. 1. &c.	And as touching that any thing should be left for Doctors and Councils to be decided, without the express Word of God, that is not so; for that all things be expressed and prescribed by the Word, whatsoever is necessary either for government of the Church, or for the salvation of Men; so that there is no need for Doctors of the Church, or Councils, to decide any thing more than is decided already. And as touching the keys of binding and loosing, given to Peter , Christ therein assigned to Peter and other Apostles, the office of preaching the Word of the Gospel, which they did also well observe, in preaching nothing else but only the Word, in the which Word is all the power contained of binding and loosing. Gal. 2. Christ, calling himself the good Shepherd, saith them to be his Sheep which hear his voice, and not the voice of others. John 10. And St. Peter admonishing the Pastors of the Church, forewarns them to teach only the Word of God, without any feeling of Lordship or Dominion over the Flock. From the which moderation how far the form of the Pope's Church doth differ, the tyranny which they use, doth well declare.	The Church ought to be governed only by the Word of the Lord's word.
The keys of binding and loosing.	The Friar. You have no understanding how to expound the Scriptures, but the old Doctors have expounded the Scriptures, and holy Councils, whose judgments are to be followed. But what say you to auricular Confession?	The Friar. In the old Church Priests and Ministers of the Church were wont to assemble together for deciding of such things as pertained to the government and direction of the Church, whereas in Geneva no such thing is used, as I can prove by this your own Testament here in my hands, that you the better may understand what was then the true use and manner of the Church.	2 Pet. 5.
Epist. 1. Coloss. 1.	The Martyr. I know no other Confession but that which is to be made to God, and reconciliation towards our Neighbour, which Christ and his Apostles have commended to us.	The Martyr. What was the true order and manner that the Apostles did institute in the Church of Christ, I would gladly hear, and also would desire you to consider the same; and when you have well considered it, yet shall you find the institution and regiment of the Church of Geneva not to be without the publick counsel and advice of the Magistrates, Elders, and Ministers of that Church, with such care and diligence as Paul and Silas took in ordering the Church of Thessalonica , Berea , &c. wherein nothing was done without the authority of God's Word, as appeareth, Acts 17. As likewise also in establishing the Church of Antioch , when the Apostles were together in counsel for the same, there was no other Law nor Doctrine followed, but only the Word of God, as may appear by the words of the Council, And tentis Deum, jugum imponere? &c. And albeit the Ministers of the Church of Rome , and the Pope were not called to the institution of the foresaid Church of Geneva , yet it followeth not therefore, that there was no lawful order observed, either in establishing that Church or any other.
Articular Confession.	The Friar. Have you not read in the Gospel, how Christ doth bid us to confess to the Priest, where he commanded the Leper, being made whole, to shew himself to the Priest?	The Friar. You were first baptized in the Church of the Pope, were ye not?
	The Martyr. The true Church of the Lord Jesus Christ never observed this strange kind of confession, to carry our Sins to the Priest's ear. And tho the Church of Rome hath intruded this manner of confessing, it followeth not thereby that it is to be received. And as touching the Leper whom the Lord sent to the Priest, he was not sent therefore to whisper his sins in the Priest's ear, but only for a testimony of his health received according to the Law.	The Martyr. I grant I was, but yet that nothing hindreth the grace of God; he may renovate and call to further knowledge whom he pleaseth.
	Of the other confession which is to be made to God, we have both the examples and testimonies of the Prophet David full in the Psalms 32, 51, 106. where he saith, That he confessed his sins unto the Lord, and received forgiveness of the same.	A Confessor. I would wish you not to stick to your own wisdom and opinion. You see the Churches in Germany , how they dissent one from another. So that if you should not submit your judgment to the authority of the General Councils, every day you shall have a new Christianity.
	The Friar. After this, the Friar proceeding further to make comparison between the Church of Rome and the Church of Geneva , would prove that the Pope hath power to set Laws in the Church without any express word of God; for so it is written (saith he) That there were many other things beside, which are not written in this Book. John 21. Also, where Christ promiseth to his Disciples, to send unto them the Holy-Ghost, which should induce them into all truth. Moreover, such Decrees and Ordinances as are in the Church were decided (saith he) and appointed by the Doctors of the Church, and by all the Councils, directed (no doubt) by the Holy-Ghost. Furthermore he inferred, that the Church also of Geneva had their Ordinances and Constitutions made without any Word of God. And for example, he brought forth the Order of the Psalms and Service publicly observed and appointed upon Wednesday in the Church of Geneva , as tho that day were holier than another.	The Martyr. To mine own wisdom I do not stick, nor ever will, but only to that wisdom which is in Christ Jesus, altho the World doth count it foolishness. And the Churches of Germany dissent among themselves one from another; that is not so, for they accord in one agreement altogether, touching the foundation and principal grounds of Christian Faith. Neither is there any such fear that every day should rise up a new Christianity, unless the Church be ballanced with authority of the Councils, as you pretend. For so we read in the Prophet David , Psal. 33. and in other places of Scripture more: That the Councils of the Nations and People shall be overthrown and subverted of the Lord, &c. Wherefore the best is, that we follow the counsel of God and his Word, and prefer the authority thereof	Agreement in the principal points of Doctrine in the Churches reformed. Psal. 33.
	The Martyr. To this the Martyr answered again, declaring that the Ordinance of those publick Prayers and Psalms on Wednesday in the Church of Geneva , was not to bind Conscience, or for any superstitious observation, or for any necessity, which either should bind the Conscience, or could not be altered at their arbitrement; but only for an order or commodity for publick resort to hear the Word of God, according as ancient Kings and temporal Magistrates have used in old time to do, in congregating the People together; not to put any holiness in the day, or to bind the conscience to any observation, (as the Pope maketh his Laws) but thereof before all other counsels and judgments of Men; and thus doing, I for my part had rather dwell and settle my self in this little Christianity, be it never so small, than in that populous Papality, be it never so great in multitude.

And thus was this godly Ffeurus commanded again by the Deputy to the Bishop's Prison, and from thence shortly after removed to Lions, not by the open and beaten way, but by secret and privy Journeys, lest perhaps he should be taken from them again, as he was before.

Tig-natius,
D. Ffeurus, Sectonistis.

After he was come to Lions, he was brought before Tig-natius the Judge, and a Doctor of Sorbon, called Fumofus, who questioned with him touching sundry Articles of Religion. But in conclusion, when they neither with arguments could convict him, nor with promises allure him, nor with threatening terrors stir him, either to betray the truth which he knew, or to bewray them whom he knew not, which took him away before from his Keepers, they proceeded at last to the sentence, condemning him first to have his tongue cut out, and then to be burned. All which he received willingly and quietly for righteousness sake, thus finishing his Martyrdom, July 7. Anno 1554. Ex Crisp. Pant. & alii.

Nicholas

Martyr.

Nicholas du Chesne, at Gry by Bezanfon. Anno 1554.

The cause and occasion why this Nicholas came in trouble was, for that he going from Laufanna, (where he abode for his conscience) to fetch his Sister, and her Husband, and certain other of his friends, as he went from Bezanfon, toward the Town of Gry, did not homage to a certain Cross in the way, where a certain Monk, which was an Inquisitor, overtook him, and thereby suspected him. He was guided by the same Monk, craftily dissembling his Religion, to a Lodging in Gry: where the Justice of the place coming in incontinent took him. Nicholas seeing how he was by the Monk his Conductor betrayed; O false Traitor, said he, hast thou betrayed me? Then after examination he was condemned. Being carried to the place of Martyrdom, by the way he was promised, that if he would kneel down and hear a Mass, he should be let go as a Passenger. But Nicholas, armed with perseverance, said, he would rather die than commit such an act. Who, calling upon the name of the Lord, took his death patiently. Ex Crisp. lib. 6.

trand, Martyr.

At Bleys, Anno 1556.
For the Religion, and Gospel of Christ this John was apprehended by these persecutors here specified, and led bound to Bleys, where he was examined by Denis the Councillor, of divers points: as, Whether he had spoken at any time against God, against the Church, and the He-Saints, and the She-Saints of Paradise? Whereunto he said, No. Item, Whether at any time he had called the Mass abominable? Which he granted, for that he finding no Mass in all the Scripture, was commanded by St. Paul, That if an Angel from Heaven would bring any other Gospel besides that which was already received, he should account it accursed. After his condemnation they would have him to be confessed, and presented to him a Cross to kiss. But he bad the Priars with their Cross depart; that is not the Cross (said he) that I must carry. Entering into the Cart before the multitude, he gave thanks to God, that he was not there for murder, theft, or blasphemy, but only for the quarrel of our Saviour. Being tied to the post, he sung the five and twentieth Psalm. Of age he was young, his countenance was exceeding cheerful and amiable, his eyes looked up to Heaven. O the happy Journey, (said he, seeing the place where he should suffer,) and the fair place that is prepared for me! When the fire was kindled about him, O Lord, (cried he) give thy hand to thy servant; I commend my soul unto thee; and so meekly yielded up his spirit. Whose patient and joyful constancy so astonished the People, that of long time before nothing did seem to them so admirable. Ex Gallic. Hist. per Crisp. lib. 6.

Kilten. 8.	Peter Rouffean, Anno 1556. Peter Rouffean, coming from Geneva and Lausanne to his Country, partly to communicate with certain of his acquaintance in the Word of God, partly for other certain affairs, because he required his inheritance of his Brother-in-law, was by him betrayed. Then being constant in his Confession which he offered up, he was put to the Rack three times, which he suffered constantly with great torments. Afterward he had his tongue cut off, and a Ball of Iron put in his mouth. He was drawn upon a hurdle, all broken and maimed, to the fire, where he was lifted up into the air, and let down three times: and when he was half-burned, the ball fell from his mouth, and he with a loud voice called on the name of God, saying, Jesus Christ assist me. And so this blessed Martyr gave up his life to God. Ex Joan. Crisp.		the Preas in the Street called Potevin, in such sort that he was fain to be carried to Pichon's Houfe, a Widow, and there cried within, Hide me, save my life, I am dead; I see even the like matter as at the last commotion. My Friends, hide my Mole, that no man see her nor know her. Briefly, such was the fear which came upon them, that every Man shut up their Houses. After the fear was past, every Man asked what the matter was, but none could tell, neither could the Enemies of God's truth perceive who was he that put them so to flight and fear, without any semblance of any Adversary about them. This Story is testified, and to be found both in the Volume of the French Martyrs, printed by John Crispine, lib. 6. also in the Book of Dutch Martyrs, written by Adrianus.
A Brother in law of this Peter.	Arnold Moniere, John de Cases. At Bourdeaux, Anno 1556. After that Arnold Moniere was taken and examined of the Justice, and so was laid in prison, John de Cases resorting to the same Town of Bourdeaux, and hearing of him, and being admonished moreover, that if he went to him he should be appeached of Heresy, notwithstanding went to comfort him, and so was also imprisoned. After many examinations, sentence was given upon them to be burned. When the time came of their Martyrdom, they were drawn through the dirt upon an hurdle to the place, accompanied with a number of Bills, Glaves, Gunners, and Trumpeters. Moreover, albeit there was no such cause (they being two simple poor Men) yet the Magistrates commanded (upon what occasion I know not) all the Gates of the City to be shut, and guarded with keepers. When the blessed Martyrs were brought and bound to the Post, which was before the Palace, they much rejoicing that they were made worthy to suffer for Christ, made confession of their faith, and many exhortations unto the People. But to stop the hearing of these Saints, the Trumpeters were commanded to found, which during all the time of their suffering never ceased. The Hangman, preparing himself first to strangle Cases, chanced to fall down from the top of the Post to the Pavement, and brake his head in such sort, as the blood followed in great quantity. Notwithstanding he recovering himself, went to Moniere, and him he strangled, who patiently rendered up his life. Cases, who was the stronger of them both, being set on fire before the Hangman came, suffered the extremity of the fire with great pains, but greater patience: for as his Legs were almost half burnt, yet he endured, crying, My God, my Father, and so gave up his life. And further, to note the work of God that followed, when these two mild and martyred Saints were almost consumed in the fire to ashes, suddenly without matter or cause such a fear fell upon them at the execution, that the Justices and the People, notwithstanding that they had the Gates locked to them, and were defended with all manner of weapons about them, not knowing wherefore, took them to their legs, in such haste flying away, that they over-ran one another. The Prior of St. Antonie fell down, so that a great number went over him. The Judge Pontacke on his Mule, with his red Robe, flying as the other did, was overthrown with		Philip Cene, James his Fellow. At Dyion, Anno 1557. This Philip Cene was an Apothecary at Geneva. He was taken at Dyion, and there imprisoned, and in the same Town of Dyion he with one James his companion was burned. As this Philip went to his death singing Psalms, the Friar standing by stopped his mouth with his hand. The most part of the People wept bitterly, saying, Be of good courage, Brethren, be not afraid of this death. Which when one of the adversary part heard, he said to one of the Magistrates, Do you not see how almost the half part of the People is of their side, and doth comfort them. Ex Joan. Crisp. lib. 6.
Arnold Moniere, John de Cases, Martyrs.			Archambant Seraphon, M. Nicholas du Rousseau. At Dyion, Anno 1557. These two were in prison together with Philip and James above-said, at Dyion. Archambant going about with a packet of Pedlary-wares to get his living, and coming towards his Wife, heard of certain Prisoners at Dyion, to whom he wrote to comfort them with his Letters. The next day after he was searched at Amfione, and Letters of certain Scholars of Paris found about him. Then he was brought to Dyion, where he, with the other called Master Nicholas du Rousseau, constantly suffered. The same Archambant had been also condemned three years before at Tule, and as he was led to Bourdeaux he escaped. Trumpets brought in to stop the hearing of Gods Saints.			Philbert Hamlin, at Bourdeaux, Anno 1557. Philbert Hamlin first was a Priest, then he went to Geneva, where he exercised Printing, and sent Books abroad. After that he was made Minister at the Town of Allenart in Saintonge, in which and in other places more he did much good in edifying the People. At last he was apprehended at Saintes Ville, and with him his Host a Priest, whom he had instructed in the Gospel; and after confession made of his Faith, he with the said Priest was carried to Bourdeaux before the President. As he was in Prison on a Sunday a Priest came in with all his furniture, to say Mass in the Prison; whom Philbert seeing to be reverted, came and pluck'd his garments from his back with such zeal and vehemency, that the Mass-garments, with the Chalice and Candlesticks, fell down and were broken; saying, Is it not enough for you to blaspheme God in Churches, but you must also pollute

Philbert pro- phets.	the Prison with your Idolatry? The Jaylor hearing of this, in his fury laid upon him with his staff, and also complained of him: where- by he was removed to the common Prison, and laid in a low Pit, laden with great Irons, so that his Legs were swollen withal, and there continued eight days. A little before he, perceiv- ing the Priest his Host to decline from the Truth, did what he could to confirm him in the same: but when he knew he had flatly re- nounced Christ and his Word, he said unto him, O unhappy and more than miserable! is it pos- sible for you to be so foolish, as for saving of a few days which you have to live by the course of Nature, so to start away, and to deny the Truth? Know you therefore, that altho you have by your foolishness avoided the corporal fire, yet your life shall be never the longer: for you shall die before me, and God shall not give you the grace that it shall be for his cause, and you shall be an example to all Apostates. He had no sooner ended his talk, but the Priest go- ing out of prison, was slain by two Gentlemen which had a quarrel to him. Whereof when Master Philbert had heard, he affirmed that he knew of no such thing before, but spake as it pleased God to guide his tongue. Whereupon immediately he made an exhortation to the Providence of God, which by the occasion here- of moved the hearts of many, and converted them unto God.	The King's Procurator.	Receiver, with a Canon, did rack him with their own hands. Notwithstanding that the Lords of Berne wrote for him to the Town of Ost, requiring to have their own Subject deliv- ered unto them, they hastened the execution, and pronounced sentence that he should be burned. Which sentence he received with such constancy, that neither the King's Recei- ver, nor all the other enemies, could divert him from the truth of the Gospel, which he manfully maintained while any spirit remained in his body. Ex Jo. Crisp. lib. 6.
The miracu- lous judg- ment of God against Apo- states.	At last the foresaid Philbert, after his condem- nation, was had to the place of his Martyrdom before the Palace: and as he was exhorting the People, to the intent his words should not be heard, the Trumpets blew without ceas- ing. And so being fastened to the post, this holy Martyr, praying and exhorting the People, was strangled, and his body with fire consumed on Palm-Sunday-Eve. Ex Gallic. Hist. Crisp. lib. 6. Nicolaus Sartorius, of the age of six and twenty years, born in Piedmont, came to the parts of Chamberie in Lent, where a certain Warden of the Friars in the Town of Ost had preached on Good-Friday upon the passion. The report of which Sermon being recited to this Sartorius, by one that heard him, Sartori- us reprehended the error and blasphemies there- of, which were against the holy Scriptures. Shortly after the Party that told him went to a Secretary, named Ripet, who covertly came to entrap Nicolas, demanding him of the Friar's Sermon: And did not our Preacher, said he, preach well? No, said Nicolas, but he lied falsely. Ripet entring further with him, de- manded: And do you not believe the Body of the Lord to be in the Host? To whom Nicolas then answered again, That would be against our Creed, which saith, That he ascended up, and sitteth, &c. Incontinent Ripet went to the Friar and his companions, to cause him to be ap- prehended. The friends of Nicolas perceiv- ing the danger, willed him to avoid and save himself, and also accompanied him out of the Town about the space of three leagues. Then was great pursuit made after him to all quarters, who at length was taken at the Town of Saint Remy, at the foot of the mountain of great St. Bernard, where he was examined before Anthony Eschaux, Bayliff of the Town, and other Justices, before whom he answered with great boldness for his Faith. Then they brought him to the Rack, and when the Sergeant refused to draw the Cord, the Bayliff himself, and the	The Ac- cusers be not named in the ite- ry. The Broderer of Tours, as he was coming with five or six other out of a Wood, being at prayer, was taken, and thereupon examined. Before he should be examined, he desired the Judges that he might pray. Which being granted, after his prayer made, wherein he prayed for the Judges, for the King, and all Es- tates, and for the necessity of all Christ's Saints, he answered for himself with such grace and modesty, that the hearts of many were broken unto the shedding of tears, seeking (as it seemed) nothing else but his deliverance. Not- withstanding he at last was sent unto Tours, and there was crowned with martyrdom. The third, which was Nicolas, being but young of years, and newly come from Geneva to his Country, for certain Money, by means of a Lady there dwelling was caused to be ap- prehended. When he was condemned and set in the Cart, his Father, coming with a staff, would have beaten him, but the Officers not suffering it, would have smitten the old Man. The Son crying to the Officers, desired them to let his Father alone, saying, that his Father had power over him, to do with him what he would. And so going to the place where he should suffer, having a ball of Iron put in his mouth, he was brought at length to the fire, in the Town of Jenville, where he patiently took his death and martyrdom, Anno 1558. Upon this supposal, as upon a sure foundation, he grounding his matter, vaunted and triumphed as one having gotten a great Conquest, and made a long Antithe- sis or Comparison, by the which he would prove that Bells were the marks of the true Church. The Bells, said he, do sound; the Harquebusses do crack or thunder. The Bells do give a sweet tune and melodious; the signs of the Lutherans do make a foul noise and terrible. The Bells do open Heaven, the other do open Hell. Bells chase away Clouds and Thunder; the other engender Clouds and counterfeite Thunder: With many other properties more, which he brought out to prove that the Church of Rome is the true Church because it hath those Bells. Mark, good Reader, the profound reasons and arguments which these great Doctors had, either to defend their own Church, or to impugn the Apologies of the Christians.		Taurin Gravelle , a Lawyer at Paris. Anno 1558. Taurin Gravelle first was a Student of the Law at Tolose ; after that he was made an Advocate in the Court of Paris : Lastly, for his godliness he was ordained an Elder to the said Congregation, with Cline above-mentioned. This Taurin having in his hands the keeping of a certain House of one Master Barthomier his Kinsman, and seeing the Congregation destitute of room, received them into the said House. And when he perceived the House to be compassed with enemies, albeit he might have escaped with the rest, yet he would not, but did abide the adventure, to the intent he would answer for the fact, in receiving the said Assembly into the House. The constancy of this Man was invincible, in sustaining his conflicts with the Sorbonists. With Dr. Mail- lard especially he was of old acquaintance, whom he did know so well even from his youth upward, that whensoever the said Doctor would open his mouth to speak against the Saints for their night- ly Assemblies, he again did reproach him with such filthy acts of Buggery and infamous Sodom- ity, that neither they which heard could abide it, neither yet could he deny it, being so notorious that almost all the Children in the Streets did know it; and yet that Sorbonical Doctor flamed not to impeach good Men of Whoredom for their godly Assemblies in the night, whose Life was so far from all chastity, as were their holy Assemblies clear from all impu- rity. In fine, these two godly Elders in cruel pains of the fire finished their martyrdom.
Bells made the mark of the true Church.	Briefly, to finish the residue of this Story: As the faith- ful Christians were thus occupied in writing their Apolo- gies, and in comforting their Brethren in prison with their Letters, the Adversaries again with their Faction were not idle, but sought all means possible to hasten forward the execution, giving diligent attendance about the Prison and other open places, to satisfy their uncharitable desire with the death of them whose Religion they hated. The com- modity of Bells in the Pope's Church.	Finally, the seventeenth day of September Commission was directed out by the King, and certain Presidents and Counsellors appointed to oversee the expedition of the matter. Whereupon divers of the poor afflicted Gospellers were brought forth to their Judgment and Martyrdom, as anon (Christ willing) you shall hear.		Note the ho- ly life of these Sorbo- nical Do- ctors.
God's help in time of need.	Henricus Pantat , lib. 11. partly touching this Persecution of the Parilians, referreth the time thereof to the year of our Saviour 1557, which the French Chronicles do assign to the year 1558, and addeth moreover, that the Germans being the same time in a certain Colloquy at Wormes , di- vers learned Men resorted thither from Genova and other quarters, desiring of the Princes and Protestants there, that they by their Embassadors sent to the French King, would become Suiters unto him for the innocent Prisoners, which for the cause above said were detained in bands at Paris. By the means of whose Intercession, faith he, and especially for that the French King was then in War (as God provided) with Philip King of Spain , a great part of the Captives were released and delivered; albeit certain of the said number were executed before the coming of the Ger- man Embassadors, the Names and Martyrdom of whom hereunder do ensue: Ex Crisp. & Pant. lib. 11.	A Gentle- man called Perrier .	Bartholomew Helior , at Turin , 1556. First, this Helior was a traveller about the Country, and a seller of books, having his Wife and Children at Genova . As he came into the Vale of Angroign in Piedmont , to get his living with selling of books, he was taken by a cer- tain Gentleman, and there arrested and sent to Thurin , then examined, at last condemned. Being condemned, he was threatened, that if he spake any thing to the People, his tongue should be cut off; nevertheless he ceased nothing to speak. After his prayers made, wherein he prayed for the Judges, that God would forgive them, and open their eyes, he was offered his pardon at the stake, if he would convert; which he refused. Then he prepared himself to his death, which he took patiently. Whereat ma- ny of the People wept, saying, Why doth this Man die, which speaketh of nothing but of God? Ex Hist. Gall. per Crisp. lib. 6.
Nicholas Cline, Sen- ior of the Church, and Martyr.	Nicholas Cline , at Paris. Anno 1558. Of this godly Company thus brought to judgment and to martyrdom, the first was Ni- cholas Cline , of the age of sixty years, who first being a Schoolmaster to Youth at Saintonge (where he was born) was there pursued, and had his Image burned. From thence he came to Paris, where for his godly conversation he was made one of the Elders or Governors of the Church. For his age he was suspected of the Judges to be a Minister, and therefore was set to dispute against the chiefest of the Sorbo- nists, namely Maillard , whom he did so confute both by the Scriptures, and also their own Sorbonical Divinity, (wherein he had been well exercised and expert) in the presence of the Lieutenant Civil, that the said Lieutenant confessed that he never heard a Man better learn- ed, and of more intelligence.	M. Bar- tholomew Helior, President.	Philip de Luns , Gentlewoman, at Paris. Anno 1558. Next unto Cline and Gravelle above-said, was brought out Mrs. Philip , Gentlewoman, of the age of twenty three years. She came first from the parts of Gascogne with her Husband (who was Lord of Graveron) unto Paris, there to join her self to the Church of God, where her Husband also had been a Senior or Elder, who in the month of May before was taken with an Ague, and deceased, leaving this Philip a Wi- dow, which nevertheless ceased not to serve the Lord in his Church, and also in the house was taken with the said company. Many conflicts she had with the Judges and the Sorbonists, namely, Maillard ; but the always sent him a- way with the same reproach as the other did be- fore, and bad him, Avaunt Sodomite, saying, he would not answer one word to such a Villain. To the Judges her answer was this, That he had learned the Faith which he confessed in the Word of God, and in the same would live and die.

Martyrs, and the Causes of their Martyrdom.

And being demanded whether the Body of Christ was in the Sacrament: How is that possible, said she, to be the Body of Christ, to whom all power is given, and which is 'exalted above all Heavens, whereas we see the Mice and Rats, Apes and Monkeys play with it, and tear it in pieces? Her Petition to them was, that seeing they had taken her Sister from her, yet they would let her have a Bible or Testament to comfort himself Her wicked Neighbours, altho they could touch her conversation with no part of dishonesty, yet many things they laid to her charge, as that there was singing of Psalms in her house, and twice or thrice an infinite number of Persons were seen to come out of her house. Also when her Husband was in dying, no Priest was called for; neither was it known where he was buried; neither did they ever hear any word of their Infant to be baptized; for it was baptized in the Church of the Lord. Among other her Neighbours that came against her, two there were dwelling at St. Germain in the Suburbs; between whom incontinent rose a strife, wherein one of them flouted the other with a Knife. The death of this Gentlewoman was the more hastened of the Lord-keeper of the Seal, Bertrand, Cardinal of Sens, and his Son-in-Law the Marquess of Trane, to have the consecration of her Goods.

The just hand of God against false and bloody Witnesses.

The martyrdom of Cliney, Gravelle, and Philip de Lamo.

These three holy Martyrs above-recited, were condemned Septemb. 27. by the Process of the Commissioners, and the Lieutenant Civil: and then being put in a Chappel together, certain Doctors were sent to them, but their valiant constancy remained unmoveable. After that they were had out of their Prison, and sent every one in a Dung-cart to the place of Punishment. Cliney ever cried by the way, protesting, that he said or maintained nothing but the Verity of God. And being asked of a Doctor, Whether he would believe St. Augustin, touching certain matters? he said, Yea; and that he had said nothing but which he would prove by this Authority.

The Crois.

The Gentlewoman, seeing a Priest come to confess her, said, That she had confessed unto God, and had received of him remission: other absolution she found none in Scripture. And when certain Counsellors did urge her to take in her hands the wooden Crois, according to the custom of them that go to their death; alledging how Christ commanded every one to bear his Crois: she answered, My Lords, said she, you make me in very deed to bear my Crois, condemning me unjustly, and putting me to death in the quarrel of my Lord Jesus Christ. Who willeth us to bear our Crois, but no such Crois as you speak of.

Gravelle looked with a smiling countenance, and shewed a cheerful colour, declaring how little he passed for his condemnation: and being asked of his Friends to what death he was condemned; I see well (said he) that I am condemned to death, but to what death or torment I regard not. And coming from the Chapel, when he perceived they went about to cut out his tongue, unless he would return, he said, that was not so contained in the Article, and therefore he was unwilling to grant unto it: but afterward perceiving the same to be agreed by the Court, he offered his tongue willingly to be cut, and incontinent spake plainly these words; I pray you pray to God for me.

The Gentlewoman also, being required to give her tongue, did likewise, with these words: Seeing I do not flick to give my Body, shall I flick to give my Tongue? No, no. And so these three, having their Tongues cut out, were brought to Malbert-place. The constancy of Gravelle was admirable, calling up his sighs and groans to Heaven, declaring thereby his ardent affection in praying to God. Cliney was somewhat more sad than the other, by reason of the feebleness of Nature and his Age. But the Gentlewoman yet surmounted all the rest in constancy, which neither changed countenance, nor colour, being of an excellent beauty.

Martyrs, and the Causes of their Martyrdom.

After the death of her Husband, she used to go in a mourning Weed, after the manner of the Country. But the same day, going to her bunnings, she put on her French hood, and decked her self in her best Array, as going to a new marriage, the same day to be joined to her Spouse Jesus Christ. And thus the three, with singular constancy, were burned; Gravelle and Cliney were burned alive. Philip the Gentlewoman was strangled, after she had a little talked the flame with her feet and visage; and so she ended her martyrdom. Ex Joan. Crisp. lib. 6.

Precious in the sight of God, is the seat of his saints.

Nicholas Cene, Peter Gabart, at Paris, Anno 1558.

The Lieutenant.

Of the same Company was also Nicholas Cene a Physician, Brother to Philip Cene above mentioned, and martyred at Dyon, and Peter Gabart: which two, about five or six days after the other three before, were brought forth to their death, Ozab. 2.

Nich. Cene, Peter Gabart, Martyrs.

Doctor Mailard.

Nicholas Cene was but new come to Paris the same day, when he was advertised of the Assembly which then was congregate in the street of St. James, and (as he desired nothing more than to hear the Word of God) came thither even as he was, booted, and was also with them apprehended, sustaining the cause of God's holy Gospel unto death.

Counsellors.

The other was Peter Gabart, a Solicitor of Proceffes, about the Age of thirty years, whose constancy did much comfort the Prisoners. He was put among a great number of Scholars in the little Castle. Who when he heard to pass the time in talking of Philosophy; No, no, said he, let us forget these worldly matters; and learn how to sustain the heavenly Cause of our God, which lie here in defence of the Kingdom of Jesus Christ our Saviour: And so he began to instruct them how to answer to every point of Christian Doctrine so well, as if he had done no other thing in all his life, but only studied Divinity; and yet was he but very simply learned. Then was he sent from them apart to another Prison, full of filthy stench and vermin; where notwithstanding he ceased not to sing Psalms that the other might well hear him. He had a Nephew in a Prison by, being but a Child, of whom he asked what he had said to the Judges? He said, that he was constrained to do reverence to a Crucifix painted. O thou naughty Boy, said he, have not I taught thee the Commandments of God? Knowest thou not how it is written; Thou shalt not make to thy self any graven Image, &c. And so began to expound to him the Commandments; whereunto he gave good attention.

A wholesome Lesson for all Students.

The Friers.

In their Examinations, many Questions were proposed by the Doctors and Friers, touching matters both of Religion, and also to know of them what Gentlemen and Gentlewomen were there present at the ministrition of the Sacrament. Whereunto they answered in such sort, as was both sufficient for defence of their own cause, and also to save their other Brethren from blame, saying, that they would live and die in that they had said and maintained.

Images for all Students.

When the time of their Execution was come, they perceived that the Judges had intended, that if they would relent, they should be strangled, if not, they should burn alive, and their Tongues be cut from them. Which torments they being content to suffer for our Saviour Jesus Christ, offered their Tongues willingly to the Hangman to be cut. Gabart began a little to sigh, for that he might no more praise the Lord with his Tongue. Whom then Cene did comfort. Then were they drawn out of Prison in the Dung-cart to the Suburbs of St. Germain. Whom the People in rage and madness, followed with cruel injuries and blasphemies, as tho they would have done the execution themselves upon them, maugre the Hangman. The cruelty of their death, was such as hath not lightly

See here, how the whole tower of the World was con- siderate to- gether against the poor Saints of God, according to the prophecy of the Ieremial Chap. XLIX. Reges terræ & principes conveniunt in unum, adversus dominum, &c.	been seen: for they were holden long in the Air over a small fire, and their lower parts burnt off, before that the higher parts were much harmed with the fire. Nevertheless these blessed Saints ceased not in all these Torments to turn up their eyes to Heaven, and to shew forth infinite testimonies of their Faith and constancy. In the same fire many Testaments and Bibles the same time also were burnt. Upon the sight of this cruelty, the Friends of the other Prisoners which remained behind, fearing the tyranny of these Judges, presented certain causes of refusal against the said Judges, requiring other Commissioners to be plac- ed. But the King, being hereof advertised by his Solicitor, sent out his Letters Patents, commanding the said Causes of refusal to be frustrate, and willed the former Judges to proceed, all other Lets and Obstacles to the contrary notwith- standing: and that the Presidents should have power to chuse to them other Counsellors, according to their own ar- bitrement, to supply the place of such as were absent: a- mongst whom also the said Solicitor was received, instead of the King's Procurator, to pursue the Process. By the which Letters Patents it was decreed, that these stubborn Sacra- mentaries (as they were called) should be judged accord- ingly, save only that they should not proceed to the execu- tion, before the King were advertised. These Letters afore- said, stirred up the fire of this Persecution not a little, for that the Judges at this refusal took great Indignation, and were mightily offended for that reproach. Notwithstanding so it pleased God, that a young man, a German, called Al- bert Hartung, born in the Country of Brandenburg, and Godson to Albert Marquês of Brandenburg, by the King's Commandment was delivered, through the importunate suit of the said Marquês. Ex Jo. Cripp. lib. 6.	I recognize that to be the true Church where the Go- spel is truly preached, and the Sacraments rightly mi- nistrated, so as they be left by Jesus Christ and his Apo- stles. The Doctor. And is the Church (think you) of Geneva such a one as you speak of? The Martyr. I so judge it to be. The Doctor. And what if I do prove the contrary, will you believe me? The Martyr. Yes, if you shall prove it by the Scripture? The Doctor. Or will you believe St. Austin and other holy Doctors innumerable? The Martyr. Yes, for they dissent not from the Scripture and the Word of God. The Doctor. By the Authority of St. Augustine, the Church is there where is the Succession of Bishops. Whereunto I frame this Argument: There is the Church, where is the perpetual succession of Bishops. In the Church of Paris is such Succession of Bi- shops: Ergo the Church of Paris is the true Church. The Martyr. To your Major I answer, That if St. Austin mean the succession of such as are true Bishops indeed, which truly preach the Gospel, and rightly administer the Sacra- ments; such Bishops I suppose to be at Geneva, where the Gospel is truly preached, and the Sacraments du- ly ministrated, and not in the Church of Paris. But otherwise, if St. Austin mean the succession of false Bishops, such as neither preach nor minister according to God's Word, so is the same in no wise to be gran- ted. The Doctor. Calvin is there by his own thrusting in only, and by the chusing of the People. The Martyr. And that foundeth more for him to be of God's Divine Election, for so much as by him the Gospel of God is preached truly, and from this no Man shall bring me. After this disputation, the ninth of the same month came against him another Doctor with two Sorbonists; who, bringing forth a scroll out of his Bosom, pre- tended that a certain Scholar coming from Geneva, made his confession, wherein was contained, that, in receiving of the Bread and Wine, the Body and Blood of Christ is received really. Whereupon they demanded of him, whe- ther he would receive the same Confession. The Martyr. Whatsoever I have said unto you, that will I hold. And as touching this word [really] I know right well that they of Geneva do not take it for any carnal presence, as you do; but their meaning is, to exclude thereby only a vain imagination. The Doctor. I marvel much that you so refuse the Word really, and use only spiritually, seeing that Calvin himself doth use the same word really. The Martyr. Calvin meaneth thereby no other thing but as we do. The Doctor. What say you by Confession Auricular? The Martyr. The same that I said before to Monsieur Lieutenant, that is, That I take it for a Plantation, not planted by God in his Word.	The Church.

Of which number of Scholars were these two, Frederick Danville, and Francis Rebezes, neither of them being past twenty years of age. How valiantly they be- haved themselves in those tender years, sustaining the quarrel of our Lord Jesus Christ, what con- fession they made, what conflicts they had, dis- puting with the Doctors of Sorbon, their own Letters left in writing do make record: the ef- fect whereof briefly to touch is this; and first, touching Frederick Danville. The Lieutenant Criminal, who before was half suspected, but now thinking to prove him- self a right Catholick, and to recover his esti- mation again, came to him, beginning with these words of Scripture; Whosoever denieth me before Men, him will I deny before my Father, &c. That done, he asked him what he thought of the Sacrament, To whom Frederick answered, That if he should think Christ Jesus to be be- tween the Priest's Hands after the Sacramental words (as they call them) then should he be- lieve a thing contrary to the Holy Scripture, and to the Creed, which saith, That he sitteth on the right hand of the Father. Also to the Testimo- ny of the Angels, which spake both of the as- cending of Christ, and of his coming down a- gain, Alas! After this he questioned with him touching invocation of Saints, Purgato- ry, &c. Whereunto he answered so, that he ra- ther did astonish the Enemies, than satisfy them. Furthermore, the 12th of September the said Frederick again was brought before Benedictus Jacobin, and his Companion, a Sorbonist, called Noster Magister; who thus began to argue with him. The Doctor. Which think you to be the true Church, the Church of the Protestants, or the Church of Paris?

And also Melancthon in his Book of Common Places, doth call it Evangelium secretum. Another time the said Frederick was called again before the Lords, the twentieth of the said month, where they did nothing but demand of him certain Questions, where he was born, and whether he had heard in his Country at Oléron, that Mr. Gerard the Bishop there did sing Mass. Yea, said he, And why do not you also, said they, receive the same. He answered, Because he did it to retain and keep his Bishoprick. The Martyr, for lack of Paper, could proceed herein no further. The Examination of Francis Rebezies. Rebezies had three sundry Examinations: The first with the Lieutenant Civil: the second with the Presidents and the Counsellors: the third with the Friars. First, The Lieutenant enquiring of his Name, Country, and Parents, asked whether he was at the Communion, whether he received with them the Bread and Wine, and whether he was a Servitor to Mr. Nicholas Cote, Senior of the Congregation? Whereunto he said, Yea. Also whether he was a distributor of the Tokens, whereby they were let in that came? That he denied. Then he was brought into the Council Chamber, before two Presidents, and 25 Counsellors; who, after other Questions about his Country and Parents, demanded whether he was taken with them in the house? He answered, Yea. What he had to do there? To hear the Word of God, and to receive with them. Who brought him thither? Himself. Whom there he knew? No Man. How he durst, or would enter, knowing no Person there? Truth it was, said he, that he knew there two or three. Who were they? Mr. Gravell, Clinet, and John Sanson, saying that name of himself. Whether he knew the Preacher? That he denied. Whether he allowed the Act there done to be good? Yea. Whether he did not better like to resort unto their beautified Temples, to hear Mass, or whether he did not take the Mass to be an holy thing, and ordained of God? He answered again contrary, believing that it was a great blasphemy against God, and a service set up of the Devil. Whether he did not acknowledge Purgatory? Yea, that Purgatory, which is the death and passion of Christ, which taketh away the sins of the World. The death of Christ is the principal, said they, but thou must also believe another. Alas, said he, can we never content our selves with the simplicity of the Gospel, but Man always will be putting to something of his own brain: in so many places of the Scripture we see the Blood of Jesus Christ to be sufficient, as John 1. Apocalypse 5. Heb. 9. Isa. 43. Where the Lord himself saith; That it is he, who for his own sake purgeth away our Iniquities, &c. As St. Paul also saith, That God was in Christ, reconciling the World unto himself, &c. And contrary, when they objected the words of the Parable, Mat. 5. Thou shalt not come out, till thou hast paid the last farthing. To this he answered, That the words of that Parable had no such relation, but to matters civil: and this word [until] meaneth there, as much as never. After that, he was charged there by one, for reading the Books of Calvin, Bucer, and Bullinger. The President asked, if he were not afraid to be burned, as were the other before, and to bring his Parents into such dishonour? He answered, that he knew well, That all which would live godly in Christ Jesus, should suffer persecution. And that to him either to live or to die, were advantage in the Lord. And as touching his Parents, Christ, said he, doth premonish himself, That whosoever loveth Father or Mother more than him, is not worthy to be his, &c. Jesus Maria! said the President, What youth is this now-days, which call themselves so headlong into the fire! and so was he commanded away. Thirdly, He was brought before Bene, Master of the Doctors of Sorbon, and another called Jacobine, the	Persecut. Martyrs, and the Causes of their Martyrdom. fourteenth of October; whereas he, chancing to speak of the Lord, the Doctor began thus to object as followeth. The Doctor. See how you, and all such as are of your company, simply name the Lord, without putting to the Pronoun, our. So may the Devils well call the Lord, and tremble before his face. The Martyr. The Devils call the Lord in such sort as the Pharisees did, when they brought the Adultres before him, and called him Master: yet neither attended they to his Doctrine, nor intended to be his Disciples: whose cause I trust is nothing like to ours, which know, and confess (as we speak) him to be the true Lord with all our heart, so as true Christians ought to do. The Doctor. I know well you hold the Church to be; where the Word is truly preached, and the Sacraments sincerely ministered, according as they are left of Christ and his Apostles. The Martyr. That do I believe, and in that will I live and die. The Doctor. Do you not believe, that whosoever is without that Church, cannot obtain remission of his sins? The Martyr. Whosoever doth separate himself from that Church, to make either Sect, Part, or Division, cannot obtain as you say. The Doctor. Now let us consider two Churches, the one wherein the Word is rightly preached, and the Sacraments administered accordingly as they be left unto us: the other, wherein the Word and Sacraments be used contrarily. Which of these two ought we to believe? The Martyr. The first. The Doctor. Well said. Next is now to speak of the Gifts given to the said Church: as the power of the Keys, Confession for remission of sins, after we be confessed to a Priest. Also we must believe the seven Sacraments in the same Church truly administered, as they be here in the Churches of Paris, where the Sacrament of the Altar is ministered, and the Gospel truly preached. The Martyr. Sir, now you begin to halt. As for my part, I do not receive in the Church more than two Sacraments, which be instituted in the same for the whole communality of Christians. And as concerning the power of the Keys, and your Confession, I believe that for remission of our sins, we ought to go to none other but only to God, as we read 1 Job. 1. If we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to pardon our Offences, and he will purge us from all our Iniquities, &c. Also in the Prophet David, Psalm 19. & 32. I have opened my sin unto thee, &c. The Doctor. Should I not believe that Christ, in the time of his Apostles, gave to them power to remit sins? The Martyr. The power that Christ gave to his Apostles, if it be well considered, is nothing disagreeing to my saying: and therefore I began to say (which here I confess) that the Lord gave to his Apostles to preach the Word, and so to remit sins by the same Word. The Doctor. Do you then deny Auricular Confession? The Martyr. Yea verily I do. The Doctor. Ought we pray to Saints? The Martyr. I believe no. The Doctor. Tell me that I shall ask; Jesus Christ being here upon the Earth, was he not then as well sufficient to hear the whole World, and to be intercessor for all, as he is now? The Martyr. Yea.

Intercession of Saints.	The Doctor. But we find, that when he was here on Earth, his Apostles made intercession for the People; and why may they not do the same as well now also? The Martyr. So long as they were in the World, they exercised their Ministry, and prayed one for another, as needing humane succours together: but now they being in Paradise, all their Prayer that they make, is this, That they wish that they which be yet on Earth may attain to their felicity; but to obtain any thing at the Father's hand, we must have recourse only to his Son. The Doctor. If one Man have such charge to pray for another, may he not be then be called an Intercessor? The Martyr. I grant. The Doctor. Well then, you say there is but one Intercessor. Whereupon I infer, that I, being bound to pray for another, need not now to go to Jesus Christ to have him an Intercessor, but to God alone, setting Jesus Christ apart; and so ought we verily to believe. The Martyr. You understand not, Sir, that if God do not behold us in the face of his own well-beloved Son, then shall we never be able to stand in his sight. For if he shall look upon us, he can see nothing but sin. And if the Heavens be not pure in his Eyes, what shall be thought then of Man, so abominable and unprofitable, which drinketh Iniquity like water, as Job doth say? Then the other Frier, seeing his Fellow to have nothing to answer to this, inferred as followeth. The Doctor. Nay (my Friend) as touching the great mercy of God, let that stand, and now to speak of our selves, this we know, that God is not displeased with them which have recourse unto his Saints. The Martyr. Sir, we must not do after our own wills, but according to that which God willeth and commandeth. For this is the truth that we have in him, that if we demand anything after his Will, he will bear us. 1 John 5. The Doctor. As no Man cometh to the presence of an earthly King or Prince, without means made by some about him; so, or rather much more, to the heavenly King above, &c. The Martyr. To this earthly Example, I will answer with another Heavenly Example of the prodigal Son, who sought no other means to obtain his Father's Grace, but came to the Father himself. Then they came to speak of Adoration, which the said Rebezies disproved by the Scripture, Acts 10. 13, 14. Apoc. 19. 22. Heb. 10. 14, 12. Where it is to be noted, that where the Martyr alleged the 12th to the Hebrews; the Doctors answered, that it was in the 11th Chapter, when the place indeed is neither in the 11th, nor in the 12th, but in the 14th Chapter of the Acts. So well seen were these Doctors in their Divinity. The Doctor. Touching the Mass, what say you? believe you not that when the Priest hath consecrated the Host, our Lord is there as well, and in as ample sort, as he was hanging upon the Cross? The Martyr. No verily; but I believe that Jesus Christ is sitting, at the right hand of his Father; as appeareth Heb. 10. 1 Cor. 15. Col. 3. and therefore (to make short with you) I hold your Mass for none other, but for a false and counterfeited Service, set up by Satan, and retained by his Ministers, by the which you do annihilate the precious Blood of Christ, and his oblation once made of his own Body; and you know right well that the same is sufficient, and ought not to be reiterated. The Doctor. You deceive your selves in the word reiteration, for we do not reiterate it so as you think: as by Example I will shew you. You see me now in this religious Garment;	but if I should put upon me a Souldiers Weed, then should I be disguised, and yet for all that I should remain the same still within my Doublet, that I was before in my Friers Weed. So is it with the Sacrifice: We confess and grant, that Naturaliter, that is, naturally, he was once offered in Sacrifice; and also in fitting, Naturaliter, that is, naturally, at the right hand of his Father; but Supernaturaliter, & scriptivè, that is, supernaturally, we sacrifice the same without reiteration. Supernaturaliter we sacrifice him; but that Sacrifice is only disguised, to understand that he is contained under that curtain and whiteness which you see. The Martyr. Sir, this I say, that such a disguised Sacrifice, is a diabolical Sacrifice; and this you may take for a resolution. The Doctor. And how is your Belief touching the holy Supper? The Martyr. That if it be ministered unto me by the Minister, in such usage, as it hath been left of Christ and his Apostles, preaching also the Word purely withal, I believe that, in receiving the material Bread and Wine, I receive with lively Faith the Body and Blood of Jesus Christ spiritually. The Doctor. Say corporally. The Martyr. No Sir, for his words be Spirit and Life; and let this content you. The Doctor. What say you, Is it lawful for a Priest to marry? The Martyr. I believe it to be lawful for him, in such sort as the Apostle saith, Whosoever hath not the gift of Continence, let him marry; for it is better to marry than to burn. And if this do not content you, further you may read what the writeth of Bishops and Elders, 1 Tim. 3. and Tit. 1. And thus these Doctors, affirming that he denied Priesthood, gave him leave to depart, saying, God have mercy on you. So be it, said he. After this, about Octob. 22. the said Rebezies and Frederick Danville, were brought up to a Chamber in the Castle to be racked, to the intent they should utter the rest of the Congregation. In the which Chamber they found three Counsellors, who thus began with them: Lift up thy hand. Thou shalt swear by the passion of Jesus Christ, whose Image here thou seest, shewing him a great Marmouset there painted in a paper, &c. Whereunto Rebezies answered, Monsieur, I swear to you by the passion of Christ, which is written in my heart. Why dost not thou swear to us, said the Counsellors, as we say unto thee: Because, said he, it is a great blasphemy against the Lord. Then the Counsellors read their Depositions, and first beginning with Rebezies, said: Wilt thou not tell us the truth, what Companions thou knowest to be of this Assembly? Rebezies named, as he did before, Gravel, Clines, (which were already burnt) and John Sanfon. To whom they said, that the Court had ordained, that if he would give no other answer but so, he should be put to the Torture or Rack, and so he was commanded to be stripped to his shirt, having a Cross put in his hand, being bid to commend himself to God & the Virgin Mary; but he neither would receive the Cross, nor commend himself to the Virgin Mary, saying, That God was able enough to guard him, and to save him out of the Lion's mouth; and so, being drawn and stretched in the Air, began to cry, Come Lord and shew thy strength, that Man do not prevail, &c. But they cried, Tell truth Francis, and thou shalt be let down. Nevertheless he continued still in his invocation and prayer to the Lord, so that they could have no other word but that. And after they had thus long tormented him, the Counsellors said, Wilt thou say nothing else? I have nothing else, said he, to say. And so they commanded him to be loosed, and he was put by the fire side. Who, being loosed, said to them: Do you handle thus the poor Servants of God? And the like was done to Frederick Danville also, his Companion, of whom they could have no other answer (who at the same time was also very sick) but as of the other. So mightily did God assist and strengthen his Servants, as ever he did any else, as by their own Letters and Confession it doth appear. Ex literis Franci. The Swissers make supplication to the French King for the Martyrs.

These constant and true Martyrs of Christ, after they had returned from the Torture unto their fellow Prisoners, ceased not to thank and praise the Lord for his assistance. Frederick did fight oftentimes, and being asked of his fellows, Why he so did? he said it was not for the evil that he had suffered, but for the Evils that he knew they should suffer afterward. Notwithstanding, said he, be strong, Brethren, and be not afraid, assuring your selves of the aid of God, which hath succoured us, and also will comfort you. Rebezies with the Rack was so drawn and stretched, that one of his shoulders was higher than the other, and his Neck drawn on the one side, so that he could not move himself: and therefore desiring his Brethren to lay him upon his Bed, there he wrote his Confession, which hitherto we have followed. When the night came they rejoiced together, and comforted themselves with Meditation of the Life to come, and contempt of this World, singing Psalms together till it was day. Rebezies cried twice or thrice together, Away from me Satan. Frederick being in Bed with him, asked why he cried; and whether Satan would stop him of his Course? Rebezies said, that Satan set before him his Parents; but by the Grace of God, said he, he shall do nothing against me.

The day next following they were brought once or twice before the Counsellors, and required to shew what Fellows they had more of the said Assembly. Which when they would not declare, the Sentence was read against them, that they should be brought in a Dung-cart to Maulbert place, and there, having a Ball in their Mouths, be tied each one to his Post, and afterward be strangled, and so be turned into Ashes.

Afterward came the Friars and Doctors, Demiscars, Mailard, and others, to confess them, and offering to them a Cross to kiss, which they refused: then Demiscars by force made Rebezies to kiss whether he would or no, crying to them moreover, that they should believe in the Sacrament. What, said Frederick, will ye have us to pluck Christ Jesus out from the right hand of his Father? Demiscars said, that so many of their opinion had suffered death before, and yet none of them all ever did any Miracles as the Apostles, and other holy Martyrs did. Frederick asked them, if they required any Miracle? No, said they, and so stood mute, save only that Demiscars prayed them to consider well what they had said unto them. Mailard also added, that he would give his Soul to be damned, but it was true. Frederick answered, That he knew it was contrary.

At last, being brought to the place of Execution, a Cross again was offered them, which they refused. Then a Priest standing by, bad them believe in the Virgin Mary. Let God, faith they, reign alone. The People standing by, Ah mischievous Lutheran! said they: Nay, a true Christian I am, said he. When they were tied to their Stakes, after their Prayers made, when they were bid to be dispatched, one of them comforting the other, said; Be strong, my Brother, be strong: Satan away from us. As they were thus exhorting, one standing by, said, These Lutherans do call upon Satan. One John Morel (which afterward died a Martyr) then standing by at liberty, answered; I pray you let us hear (said he) what they say, and we shall hear them invoke the Name of God. Whereupon the People listened better unto them, to hearken, as well as they could, what they said: they crying still as much as their Mouths being stopped could utter; Assist us, O Lord. And so they, rendering up their Spirits to the hands of the Lord, did consummate their valiant Martyrdom. Ex Crispino lib. 6.

After the Martyrdom of these two above-said, the intention of the Judges was to dispatch the rest one after another in like sort, and had procured already process against twelve or thirteen ready to be judged. But a certain Gentlewoman, then Prisoner amongst them, had presented causes of Exceptions or Refusals against them, whereby the cruel rage of the Enemies was staid to the Month of July following. In the which mean time, as this Persecution was spread into other Countries, first the faithful Cantons of the Swissers perceiving these good Men to be afflicted for the same Doctrine which they preached in their Churches, sent their Ambassadors to the King to make supplication for them.

The same time also came Letters from the County Palatine Elector, tending to the same End, to solicit the King for them: The King starting the same time in great need of the Germans for his Wars, was contented at least that they should proceed more gently with them; and so the fire for that time ceased. Most of them were sent to Abbies, where they were kept at the charge of the Priors, to be constrained to be present at the Service of Idolatry, especially the young Scholars: of whom some strunk back, other, being more loosely kept, escaped away. The most part were brought before the Official to make their Confession, and to receive Absolution ordinary. Divers made their Confession ambiguous and doubtful, &c. *Ex Johan. Crisp. lib. 6. These two young Men were also of the Company above specified, and were in Prison, where they sustained such Cruelty, being almost racked to death, that Almarick could not go when he was called to the Court to be judged. And being upon the Rack, he rebuked their Cruelty, and spake so freely, as though he had felt no grief; and as they said, which came to visit him, he testified unto them, that he felt no labour so long as he was upon it. Both these died in Prison, continuing still firm and constant in the pure Confession of Christ's Church. Ibidem.

Mention is made in the French Story of one Villegaignon, Lieutenant for the French King, who made a Voyage into the Land of Bresil with certain French Ships, and took an Island near to the same adjoining, and made therein a Fortrell. After they had been there a while, Villegaignon (for lack of Victuals, as he pretended) sent certain of them away in a Ship to the River of Plais, toward the Pole Antartick, a thousand miles off: In the which Ship were these four here mentioned: who forsaking their Ship by occasion of Tempest, were carried back again, and so came to the Land of Bresil, and afterward to their own Countrymen. Villegaignon being much grieved thereat, first charged them with departing without his Letter. Moreover, being terrified in his mind with false Suspicion and vain Dreams, fearing and dreaming lest they had been sent as privy Spies by the Bresilians, because they came from them, and had been friendly entertained of them; he began to devise how he might put them to death under some colour of Treason: but the Cause was Religion: for albeit sometime he had been a Professor of the Gospel, yet afterward growing to some dignity, he fell to be an Apostate, and cruel Persecutor of his Fellows. But when no Proof or Conjecture probable could be found to serve his cruel purpose, he knowing them to be earnest Protestants, drew out certain Articles of Religion for them to answer, and so intrapping them upon their Confession, he laid them in Irons and in Prison, and secretly, with one Executioner and his Page, he took one after another, beginning with John Borel, and first brought him to the top of a Rock, and there being half strangled, without any judgment threw him into the Sea, and after the like manner, ordered also the rest. Of whom three were thus cruelly murdered and drowned; to wit, John Borel, Mathew

He sent them far then escape, because they should never return, pretending that he lacked Victuals, but the cause was Religion.

Persecut. Martyrs, and the cause of their martyrdom.

Christians of the said Town, fearing left by this racking, danger might happen to the Brethren, sent to Romain a- gain several Instructions and means how he might be aided, such as should not be against God. But when the Lieuten- ant came, the poor Man forgot his Instructions: so simple he was, and ignorant of the subtilties of this World.

When the time came that the Judges were set, and the Process should be read, Barbofi with others, whom the Frier had procured, had agreed before, that he should be fired alive, and put to the Rack, to disclose his Fellows, and also gagged that he might not speak and infect the residue. On the other part, one there was of the Advoca- tes (albeit a Man wholly superstitious) who, seeing the rage of the other, gave contrary advice; saying, That he should be sent home again, for that he was a Town- dweller of Geneva, neither had taught there any kind of Doctrine, nor brought any Books, neither had they any Informations against him: and that which he had spoken, was a thing contrained by his Oath, forced by the Justice. And as touching his Opinion, it was no other, but as o- ther young Men did follow, which were either of the one part, or of the other: and therefore that there remained no more, but only the Lieutenant to give his Verdict, &c. Thus much being spoken, and also because the Lieutenant was before suspected, and the time of dinner drew near, they arose for that time, deferring the matter to another season. The Frier observant in this mean while was not idle, inciting still the Consuls and the People, who at the ringing of a Bell being assembled together, with the Of- ficial and the Priests in a great rout, came crying to the Lieu- tenant to burn the Heretick, or else they would fire him, and all his Family: and in semblable wise did the same to the other Judges and Advocates: the Official moreover added, that if it were not better seen into than so, the Lu- therans would take such courage, and so shut up their Church doors, that no Man should enter in. Then, be- cause the Lieutenant would not take to him other Judges after their minds, in all post-haste the People contributed together, that at their own Charge the matter should be purified at the Parliament of Aix, and so compelled the Lieutenant to bring the Process unto Judgment, every Man crying, To the fire, to the fire, that he may be burned.

The Lieutenant being not able any otherwise to appease the People, promised to bring the matter to the High Court of Aix, and so he did. They hearing the Informa- tion of the Cause, commanded the Lieutenant and the other Judges to deal no further therein, but to send up the Process and Prisoner unto them. This went greatly against the minds of them of Draguignan, which would fain have had him condemned there. Whereupon Barbofi was sent out to the Parliament of Aix, where he so practised and la- boured the matter, that the Cause was sent down again to the Lieutenant, and he enjoyed to take unto him such at- tending Advocates, as their old Order required, and to certify them again within eight days. And so Romain, by the Sentence of those old Judges, was condemned to be burned alive, if he turned not; if he did, then to be strangled, and before the Execution to be put upon the Rack, to the intent he should disclose the rest of his Company. From the which Sentence Romain then appealed, saying, That he was no Heretick. Whereupon he was carried unto Aix, singing the Commandments as he passed by the Town of Draguignan. Which when the King's Advocate did see, looking out of his Window, he said unto him, That he was one of them that concluded his death, but desired God to forgive him. Romain answered again, God will judge us all in the last day of Judgment. After he was come to Aix, he was brought before the Counsellors before whom he remained no less constant and firm, than afore. Then was a sumish Frier sent, who being three hours with him, could not remove him, came out to the Lords, and said that he was damned: by reason whereof, the Sentence given before of his Condemnation was confirmed, and he sent back again from whence he came.

At this return again from Aix, the Consuls of Dra- guignan sent abroad by Parishes to the Curates, that they should signify to their Parishioners the day of his death, to the end that they should come: also caused to be cried through the Town by the found of a Trumpet, that all good Christians should bring Wood to the great Market- place to burn the Lutheran. The day being come, which was Saturday, the sixteenth of May, the poor Servant of God first was brought to the Rack or Torture: where, at his first entry, were brought before him the Coris, Irons, and Weights to terrifie him. Then, said they, he must ut- ter his Complices, and renounce his Religion, or else he should be burned alive. He answered with a constant heart, That he had no other Complices nor Companions, neither would he hold any other Faith, but that which Jesus Christ did preach by his Apostles. Then was he demanded of his Fellows taken with him, whether they did hold the Faith of Rome, or whether he did ever communicate with them, or did know them in the Town, or in the Province to be of his Faith? He said, No. Item, what he had to do in that Town? He said, to sell his Coral. Item, who gave him counsel to appeal? God, he said, by his Spirit.

Upon this he was put upon the Gin or Rack, where he being torn most outrageously, ceased not still to cry unto God, that he would have pity on him for the love of Jesus Christ his Son. Then was he commanded to call to the Virgin Mary, but he would not. Whereupon his Torture was renewed afresh, in such cruel sort, that they thought they had left him for dead. For the which they sent him to the Barbers, and finding that he could endure no longer, they were afraid left he had been past, and halsted to bring him to the fire. So after they had assayed him by Priests and Friars as much as they could, to make him revolt, they helped the Hangman to bear him, all broken and dis- membered as he was, unto the heap of Wood, where they tied him to a Chain of Iron which was let down upon the Fagots. Romain seeing himself to be alone lying upon the Wood, began to pray to God: whereat the Friars be- ing moved, ran to him again to cause him to say Ave Ma- ria. Which when he would not do, they were so furious, that they plucked and tore his Beard. In all these Anguishes the meek Saint of God had recourse still to God in his Prayers, beseeching him to give him patience. Then left they him lying as dead: but so soon as they descended down from the Wood, he began to pray to God again, in such sort, as one would would have thought that he had felt no hurt. Then another great Frier, supposing to do more with him than the rest, came up to the Wood unto him to admonish him. Romain thought at first, that he had been a faithful Christian by his gentle speech, but afterward when he urged him to pray to the Virgin Mary, he desired him to depart, and let him alone in peace. As soon as he was departed, Romain lifted up his Head and his Eyes on high, praying God to assist him in his great Tentation. Then, a certain Father, a Warden, to bring the people in more hatred, cried out and said, He blasphemeth, he blasphemeth, he speaketh against the blessed Virgin Mary. Whereat Barbofi cried, Stop his Mouth, let him be gagged. The People cried, To the fire, let him be burned. Then the Hangman set fire to the Straw and little Sticks that were about, which incontinent were set on fire. Romain still remained hang- ing in the Air till he died: and was burned all his neither parts well near, when he was seen to lift up his Head to Heaven, moving his Lips, without any cry: and so this blessed Saint rendered his Spirit to God.

Of this Assembly there were divers Judgments and sundry Bruis. Some said, that if good Men had been about him, it had gone better with him, and that those Priests and Monks which were about him, were Whoremasters, and infamous. Others said, that he had wrong, and that an hundred of that Company there were, which more deserved death than he, especially among them which con- demned him. Other went away marvelling, and dispu- ting of his Death and Doctrine. And thus was the Course finished to this valiant and thrice blessed Martyr and Servant of the Lord Jesus the Son of God. he was placed to be Secretary to the Senate or-Council of Geneva; where he continued about the space of a year. Having then certain Buſineſs he came to Dyion.

There was the ſame time a Prieſt that Preach- ed at Dyion ſuch Doctrines, whereat the ſaid Francis being worthily offended, came friendly unto the Prieſt, and reaſoned with him touch- ing his Doctrines, ſhewing by the Scriptures, how and where he had erred. The Prieſt ex- cused himſelf, that he was not ſo well ſufficient to diſpute, but he would bring him the next day to a certain learned Man, whom he knew there in the Town, and deſired the ſaid Francis to go with him to Breakfaſt, where he would be glad to hear them two in Conference to- gether. Whereunto when Francis had conſented, the Prieſt incontinent went to the Jacobin Friars, where the matter was thus contrived, that at the Breakfaſt-time Francis there un- aware ſhould be apprehended.

When the next day came, the Prieſt brought Francis, according to his appointment, to a Jacobin Friar, who pretending much fair Friendſhip unto him, as one glad and deſirous of his company, beſought him to take a Breakfaſt with him the next morrow, and there they would enter conference together. With this alſo Francis was content, and to prepare himſelf the better to that Conflict, ſate up almoſt all the night writing with his Fellow. The next morrow, as Francis with his Fellow were preparing themſelves to- ward the Breakfaſt, the Jacobin in the mean time went to the Juſtice of the Town, to admoniſh him to be ready at the time and place appointed. Thus, as the Jacobin was ſtanding at the Juſtices door, The Companion of Francis ſeeing the Friar there ſtand, began to miſtruſt with himſelf, and told Francis, willing him to beware of the Friar. More- over, the ſame night Francis had in his Dream, that the ſaid Friar ſhould commit him to the Juſtice. But he, either not caring for his Dreams, or elſe not much paſſing for the danger, committed himſelf to the Hands of God, and went. As they were together diſputing in the Covent of the Jaco- bins, Francis, thus betrayed of the Prieſt, was apprehended by the Officers, carried to Priſon, and within ſeven dayſ af- ter, being Saturday before the Nativity of our Lord, was brought to the place of Execution, where firſt he was ſtra- gled, and then burned. Ex ſcripto teſtimonio Geneveſi.

And as touching the Fellow and Companion of this Francis above-mentioned, he was alſo apprehended with him, and put in Priſon; but becauſe he was but a young Novice, and yet not fully confirmed, he recanted, and was delivered.

Peter Arondeau, at Paris, An. 1559.

The Town of Rochel, as it is a place of great commodity becauſe of the Sea, ſo was it not inferior to other good Towns in France, for nourishing and ſupporting the holy Aſſemblies of the Lord. Unto the which Town about the year of our Lord, 1559, reſorted one Peter Aron- deau, a Man of bale Condition, with a little Packet of Mercery Ware there to ſell. Who there being known to adjoin himſelf to the Church and Congregation of the faithful, was demanded of certain Miniſters of Antichriſt, Whether he would go to hear Maſs or no? He ſaid, that he had been there too oft to his great grief: and that ſince the time that the Lord had taken the Veil from his Eyes, he knew the Maſs to be a- bominable, forged in the Shop of the Enemy of all Mankind. They to whom he thus answered were Prieſts; amongst whom was one named Monroy, who, taking the other there preſent for Witneſſes, brought him ſtraight to the Lieutenant. The Depoſition being taken, and Information made, it was decreed incontinent, that his Body ſhould be attached. And although by one of his Friends he was admoniſhed to ſave him- ſelf, and to avoid the Danger, yet he feared not to put himſelf into his Enemies hands; and ſo was led Priſoner. As he was in Priſon many of the faithful came to comfort him, but rather he was able to comfort not only them which came to comfort him, but alſo the other which were there Priſoners with him. The Prieſts left no diligence unthought to ſtir up the Lieutenant, which was of himſelf too much inflamed in ſuch matters.

Arondeau, after many Interrogations, and threatening words, and alſo fair Promiſes of his Pardon, full continued one Man. Then the Lieutenant ſeeing his Conſtancy, condemned him to death. Arondeau praiſing God for his Grace given, did not a little rejoyce that he might ſuffer in that Quanel, and in token of rejoycing did ſing a Psalm, being fully reſolved to accept the ſaid Condemnation, without any Appeal. But his Friends not pleaſed with his Reſolution, came to him, and ſo perſwaded with him, not to give his Life ſo good cheap over to his Enemies hands, that he was turned from that, and made his Appeal. The Appeal being entred, the Lieutenant ſeeking to gratifie the Adverſaries of the Goſpel, and eſpecially the Cardinal of Lorain, ſecretly by the back- ſide of the Town, and out of the High-way con- veyed the poor Priſoner unto Paris: who being brought unto Paris by privy Journeys, as is ſaid, was put into Priſon, committed to the Cuſtody of two Presidents, to wit, Magiſtri, and St. Andre. By the means of whom the Sentence of the Lieutenant was confirmed, and alſo put in Execution the fifteenth day of November, in the year above ſaid: on the which day the ſaid Arondeau was burned quick at the place called St. John in Greve at Paris. The conſtancy heroical which God gave him, and wherein he endured victorious unto death, was a Mirror or Glaſs of Patience unto M. Anne du Bourge, Conſellor in the Parliament of Paris, and to divers others then Priſoners; and was to them a Preparation toward the like death, which ſhortly after they ſuffered.

Not long after the happy end of this bleſſed Martyr, the forenamed Monroy, which was the principal Accuſer and party againſt him, was ſtricken with a Diſeaſe called * Apoplexia, and there- upon ſuddenly died.

By this, and many other ſuch like Examples, the mighty Judgment of God moſt evidently may appear; who, al- beit commonly he doth ſue to begin his Judgment with his own Houſhold in this World, yet neither do his Adver- ſaries themſelves always eſcape the terrible hand of his Ju- ſtice.

Alſo the Lieutenant which was Condemner carried not long after the Prieſt, but he was arreſted perſonally to ap- pear before the Kings Council, through the procurement of a certain Gentleman of Polonia, called Ambroy de Le- giſte, againſt whom the ſaid Lieutenant had given falſe and wrong Judgment before. By reaſon whereof the ſoreſaid Gentleman ſo inſtantly did purſue him before the Lords of the Council, that all the Extortions and Pollings of the Lieutenant were there openly diſcovered, and ſo he con- demned to pay to the Gentleman a thouſand French Crowns of the Sun, within fourteen days, upon pain of death as Note much. Alſo he was depoeſed of his Office, and there de- clared unworthy to exerciſe any Royal Office hereafter for ever, with Infamy and Shame perpetual. Ex Criſp. lib. 6. pag. 907.

to use a Spectacle of God's great gracious Mercy towards his elected Christians. This Monsieur was attached for certain Words spoken to a Priest, saying thus, That his God of the Host was nothing but an abomination, which abused the People of God. These words were taken first as spoken in his Drunkenness. But the next day after, when the same words were repeated to him again, to know whether he would abide by the words there uttered, or no? He said, Yea: For it is an abuse, said he, to seek Jesus Christ any other where than in Heaven, sitting at the Glory and right hand of God his Father: And in this he was ready to live and die. His Process being made, he was condemned to be burned quick. But as he was carried from the Town-house to the place of Punishment; it was never seen a Man with such constancy to be so assured in heart, and so to rejoice at that great Honour which God hath called him unto. The Hangman halted as much as was possible, to bind him, and dispatch him. The Martyr in the midst of the flaming fire, lifting up his Eyes unto Heaven, cried to the Lord, that he would have mercy on his Soul, and so in great integrity of Faith and Perseverance, he gave up his life to God. Ex Jo. Crisp. lib. 6.

This Dutch Story should have gone before with the Dutch Martyrs; but seeing Valencien is not far distant from France, it is not much out of order to adjoin the same with the French Martyrs: who altogether at length shall be joyned in the Kingdom of Christ: which day the Lord send shortly. Amen.

Thus have we (through the assistance of the Lord) deduced the Table of the French, and also of the Dutch Martyrs unto the time and reign of Queen Elizabeth, that is, to the year 1560. Since the which time divers also have suffered both in France, and in the lower Country of Germany; whose Story shall be declared (the Lord willing) more at large, when we come to the time of Q. Elizabeth. In the mean season it shall suffice for this present to insert their Names only, which here do follow.

The Residue of the French Martyrs:

A. Nedu Burge, Councillor of Paris. Andrew Coffer, John Isabeau, John Indet, Martyrs of Paris; Geffery Guen, rien, Jo. Morel, Jo. Barbaulle, Pet. Chevet, Marin Marie, Margaret Rich, Adrian Dausst, Giles le Court, Philip Parmentier, Marin Rossieu, Peter Miles, John Berfoy; besides the tumult of Ambosie, the Persecution of Vassil Anglin Marlorat, Master Matonis.

The residue of the Dutch Martyrs:

James de Le, of the Isle of Flanders, John de Buiffons at Antwerp, Peter Petit, John Denys, Guymon Guilmein, Simon Herme of the Isle of Flanders, John de Lannoy at Tournay, Andrew Michel, a blind Man at Tournay, Francis Varlut at Tournay, Alexander Dayken of Brancaste, William Cornu in Honant, Anthony Caron of Cambray, Renaudine de Francueil: Certain suffered at Tournay, Michel Robilert of Atas, Nicaise de le Tomb at Tournay, Roger du Mont.

To the Catalogue of French Martyrs above-rehearsed, the Story of Merindol and Cabriery, with the lamentable handling of them, were also to be annexed. But because the Tractation thereof is prolix, and cannot well be contracted into a short Discourse, therefore we have deferred the same to a more convenient room, after the Table here following next of the Spanish and Italian Martyrs, where better opportunity shall be given to prosecute more at full that tragical Persecution, the Lord so permitting.

Franciscus san Romanus, at Burges in Spain.

ANNO 1540 this Francis was sent by certain Spanish Merchants of Antwerp, to Breme, to take up Money due to be paid of certain Mercants there. Where he being at a Sermon, hearing Master Jacobus, Prior sometimes of the Austrian Friars of Antwerp, preach, was so touched and drawn (through the marvellous working of God's Spirit, at the hearing thereof, albeit having no perfect understanding of the Dutch Tongue, that not only he understood all that was there said, but also coming to the Preacher, and accompanying him home (all his other worldly Business set apart) there recited the whole Contents of his Sermon every word (as they said, which heard the said Minister of Breme preach) in perfect form and order as he had preached. After this little taste, and happy beginning, he proceeded further, searching and conferring with learned Men, that in short space he was grown to great towardsness and ripe Knowledge in the Word of Life. The Minister marvelling at the sudden mutation of the Man, and also seeing the vehemency of his Zeal joyned withal, began to exhort him how to temper himself with Circumspection and Discretion, still more and more instructed him in the Word and Knowledge of the Gospel, which he so greedily did receive, as one that could never be satisfied: and so remained he with the Minister three days together, committing his worldly Business, and Message that he was sent for, unto his fellow which came with him. Thus being inflamed with another desire, he ceased to seek for temporal trifles, seeking rather for such French or Dutch Books which he could get to read; and again, read the same so diligently, that partly by the reading thereof, partly by Master Jacobus, and also by Master Macchabeus (which was there the same time) he was able in short time to judge in the chief Articles of our Religion. Informing that he took upon him to write Letters unto his Country-men the Merchants of Antwerp: in the which Letters first he gave thanks to God for the Knowledge of his holy Word which he had received. Secondly, he bewailed the great Cruelty and gross Blindness of his Countrymen; desiring God to open their Eyes and Ears, to see and understand the Word of their Salvation. Thirdly, he promised shortly to come to them at Antwerp, to confer with them touching the Grace of God, which he had received. Fourthly, declared to them his purpose in going also to Spain, intending there likewise to impart to his Parents and other Friends at Bruges, the wholesome Doctrine which the Lord had bestowed upon him.

Before this, he addressed other Letters also to Charles the Emperor, opening to him the Calamities and miserable Estate of Christ's Church; desiring him to tender the quietness thereof; especially that he would reform the miserable Corruption of the Church of Spain, &c. Over and besides all this, he wrote there a Catechism, and divers other Treatises in the Spanish Tongue. And all this he did in one Month's space.

In the mean time the Spanish Merchants of Antwerp understanding by his Letters, both his Change of Religion, and also his purpose coming to Antwerp, sent him Letters again, pretending outwardly a fair Countenance of good Good-will, but secretly practicing his Defundition. For at the day appointed of his coming, certain Friers were fetched to receive him, which took him coming down from his Horse, rifled his Books, had him into a Merchant's Houfe near hand, where they examined him; with whom he again disputed mightily; and when they found him not agreeing to their Faith, they bound him hand and foot, crying out upon him, and calling him Lutheran, and burnt his Books before his face, threatening to burn himself also. At this Disputation within the house divers Spaniards were present, which made the Friers more bold. Being demanded to shew of what Faith and Religion he was; My Faith (said he) is to confesse and preach Christ Jesus only, and him crucified, which is the true Faith of the Universal Church of Christ through the whole World; but this Faith and Doctrine you have corrupted, taking another abominable kind of Life, and by your Impiety have brought the most part of the World into blindness most miserable. And to explain his Faith to them more expressly, he recited all the Articles of the Creed.

ally, which done, then the Friars asked, Whether he believed the Bishop of Rome to be Christ's Vicar, and Head of the Church, having all the Treasures of the Church in his own power, being able to bind and loose? also to make new Articles, and abolish the old; at his own Will and Arbitrement? Hereunto Francis answered again, That he believed none of all this, but contrary did affirm, that the Pope was Antichrist, born of the Devil, being the Enemy of Jesus Christ, transferring to himself Gods Honour, and which moreover, being incited by the Devil, turned all things upside down, and corrupted the sincerity of Christ's Religion, partly by his false pretences, beguiling, partly by his extreme cruelty destroying the poor flock of Christ, &c. With the like boldness he altered his mind likewise against the Mass and Purgatory. The Friars could suffer him meanly well to speak, till he came to the Pope, and began to speak against his Dignity, and their profit; then could they abide no longer, but thundered against him words full of Cruelty and Terror. As they were burning of his Books, and began also to cast a New Testament into the fire, Francis seeing that, began to thunder out against them again. The Spaniards then supposing him not to be in his right Senses, conveyed him into a Tower six miles distant from Antwerp, where he was detained in a deep Cave or Dungeon, with much misery, the space of eight months. In which time of Imprisonment many grave and discreet persons came to visit him, exhorting him that he would change his opinion, and speak more modestly. Francis answered again, That he maintained no Opinion erroneous or heretical; and if he seemed to be somewhat vehement with the Friars, that was not to be ascribed to him, so much as to their own Impertinency; hereafter he would frame himself more temperately. Whereupon the Spaniards thinking him better come to himself, discharged him out of Prison, which was about the time when the Emperor was in his Council of Ratisbone. An. 1542.

San Romancing thus freed out of Pifnon, came to Antwerp, where he remained about twenty days. From thence he went to Luxen unto a certain Friend of his, named Franciscus Dryander (who also afterward died a Martyr) to whom he had much conference about divers matters of Religion: who gave him counsell not to alter the state of his Vocation, being called to be a Merchant, which state he might exercise with a good Conscience, and do much good. And as touching Religion his Counsel was, That he should say or do nothing for favour of Men, whereby the Glory of God should be diminished; but so, that he required notwithstanding in the same a found and right judgment conformed to the rule of God's Word, left it might chance to him, as it doth to many, who, being carried with an inconsiderate zeal, leave their Vocations, and while they think to do good, and to edifie, they destroy and do harm, and call themselves needles into danger. It is God, said he, that hath the care of his Church, and will fit up faithful Ministry for the same; neither doth he care for such, which rashly intrude themselves into that Function without any calling.

This Advertisement of Dryander, Francis did willingly accept, promising hereafter to moderate it himself more considerably : But this Promise was shortly broken, as you shall hear. For, passing from Dryander he went to Ratibone, and there having time and opportunity convenient to speak to the Emperor, he stepped boldly unto him, beseeching him to deliver his Country and Subjects of Spain from false Religion, and to restore again the Innocency of Christ's Doctrine, declaring and protesting, that the Princes and Protestants of Germany were in the true part, and that the Religion of Spain being drowned in ignorance and blindness, was greatly different from the true and perfect Word of God, with many other words pertaining to the same effect. The Emperor all this while gave him gentle hearing, signifying that he would consider upon the matter, and lo do therein, as he thought should behoove the best. This quiet answer of the Emperor ministered to him no little encouragement of better hope : and albeit he might perceive there in the City many Examples to the contrary, yet all that discouraged not him, but he went the second, and also the third time, unto the Emperor, who quietly again to answered him as before. And yet this our Francis not fatished in his mind, fought with greater ardency the fourth time to speak to the Emperor, but he was repulsed by certain of the Spaniards about the Emperor, who incontinent, without all further bearing or advising the Cause, would have thrown him headlong into the River of Danubius, had not the Emperor staid them, and willed him to be judged by the Laws of the Empire. By which Commandment of the Emperor he was relieved and detained with other Malefactors in bands, till the Emperor took his Voyage into Africa. Then Francis, with other Captives following the Court, after that the Emperor was come into Spain, was there delivered to the Inquisitors ; by whom he was laid in a dark Prison under the ground. Oft and many times he was called for to Examination, where he suffered great Injuries and Contumelies, but ever remained in his Conscience firm and unmovable. The Articles whereupon he stood, and for which he was condemned, were these :

That Life and Salvation in the sight of God, cometh to no Man in his own Strength, Works, or Merits, but only by the free Mercy of God, in the Blood and Sacrifice of his Son our Mediator.

That the Sacrifice of the Mass, which the Papists do recount available, ex opere operato, for the Remission of sin, both to the quick and the dead, is horrible Blasphemy.

That Auricular Confession with numbring up of sins, that Satisfaction, Purgatory, Pardons, Invocation of Saints, worshipping of Images, be meer Blasphemy against the living God.

Item, That the Blood of Christ is prophaned and injured in the same aforesaid.

After the Inquisitors perceived, that by no means he could be reclaimed from his Affections, they proceeded at last to the Sentence, condemning him to be burned for an Heretic. Many other Malefactors were brought also with him to the place of Execution, but all they were pardoned and dismissed; he only for the Gospel, being odious to the whole World, was taken and burned. As he was led to the place of suffering, they put upon him a Miter of Paper, painted full of Devils, after the Spanish guise.

Furthermore, as he was brought out of the City-gate to be burned, there flood a wooden Croſs by the way, where- unto Francis was required to do homage : which he reſe- ded, anſwering, That the manner of Chriſtians is not to worſhip Wood, and he was, ſaid he, a Chriſtian. Here- upon aroſe great Clamour among the vulgar People, for that he denied to worſhip the wooden Croſs. But this was turned incontinent into a miracle. Such was the blind muſcets of that People, that they did impute this to the Divine Virtue, as given to the Croſs from Hea- ven, for that it would not ſuffer it ſelf to be worſhip- ped of an Heretick : and immediately, for the opinion of that great Miracle, the Multitude with their Swords did hew it in pieces, every Man thinking himſelf happy that might carry away ſome Chip or Fragment of the ſaid Croſs.

K. Hen. 8. When he was come to the place where he should suffer, the Friars were buſie about him to have him recant, but he continued ever firm. As he was laid upon the heap of Wood, and the fire kindled about him, he began a little at the feeling of the fire, to lift up his head toward Heaven; which when the Inquifitors perceived, hoping that he would recant his Doctrine, they caſted him to be taken from the fire. But when they perceived nothing like in him, the Adverſaries being fruſtrate of their Expectation, willed him to be thrown in again, and ſo was he immediately diſpatched.

The death and Martyrdom of Fr. San Roman. The Inquifitors of Spain take Grifts Office to judge the quick and the dead. The English Ambaffador hath ſent the Spaniſh Court.

After that the Martyrdom of this bleſſed Man was thus confirmate, the Inquifitors proclaimed openly, that he was damned in Hell, and that none ſhould pray for him; yea, and that all were Hereticks whoſever doubted of his Damnation. Nevertheleſs certain of the Emperours Souldiers gathered of his Almes. Alſo the English Ambaffador procured a portion his Bones to be brought unto him, knowing right well that he died a Martyr. Yet this could not be ſo ſecretly done, but it came to the Ears of the Inquifitors, and of the Emperor. Wherefore the Souldiers going in great danger of life, were compell'd to Priſon. Neither did the Ambaffador himſelf eſcape clear from the danger of the Popes Scourges; for he was upon the ſame ſequell'd from the Court, and commanded to be abſent for a ſpace. And thus much concerning the notable Martyrdom of this bleſſed San Roman. Ex Franc. Encena. ſilpſano, teſte oculato.

Rochoſus, at San Lucar in Spain, Anno 1545.

Rochoſus was born in Brabant, his Father dwelling in Antwerp. By his Science he was a Carver or Graver of Images; who, as he ſeem as he began fiſt to taſte the Goſpel, he fell from making ſuch Images as uſe to ſerve for Idolatry in Temples, and occupied himſelf in making Seals, ſave only that he kept hanging on his ſhall an Image of the Virgin Mary artificially graven, for a Sign of his Occupation. It happened unhappily, that a certain Inquifitor paſſing by in the ſtreet, and beholding the carved Image, asked of Rochoſus what was the price thereof? which when Rochoſus had ſet (not willing belike to ſell it) the Inquifitor had him ſcarce half the Money. The other answered again, Thathe could not ſo live of that Bargain. But ſill the Inquifitor urged him to take his offer. To whom Rochoſus again, It ſhall be yours (ſaid he) if you will give me that which my Labour and Charges ſtand me in, but of that price I cannot afford it; yet had I rather break it in pieces. Yea, ſaith the Inquifitor, break it? let me ſee thee; Rochoſus with that took up a Chifel, and daſhed it upon the Face of the Image, wherewith the Noſe, or ſome other part of the Face was blemiſhed. The Inquifitor ſeeing that, cried out as he were mad, and commanded Rochoſus forthwith to Priſon. To whom Rochoſus cried again, that he might do in his own Works what he liſted. And if the Workmanſhip of the Image were not after his fancy, what was that to them? But all this could not help Rochoſus, but within three days after Sentence was given upon him, that he ſhould be burned, and ſo was he committed to the Executioners. As Rochoſus was entering the place there to be burned, he cried with a loud voice, asking among the multitude which there flood by, if any Man of Flanders were there? It was answered, yea; and alſo that there were two Ships already fraught, and appointed to fail to Flanders. Then, ſaid he, I would deſire ſome of them to ſignifie to my Father dwelling in Antwerp, that I was burned here in this City, and for this Cauſe which you all have heard. And thus after his Prayers made to God, this good Man being wrongfully condemned, after his godly life made this bleſſed end. An. 1545.

The death and Martyrdom of Rochoſus. And left this ſo rare and ſtrange Example of Cruelty ſhould ſeem to lack credit, in the fifth Book of the Hiſtory of Panisalon there is recorded, That a certain Spaniard coming to Antwerp, made diligent Inquifition there amongſt the Image-makers, to find out the Parents of this Rochoſus, and ſignified to them what had happened to their Son, as hath been by his ſaid Parents and Friends declared: inſomuch that it alſo testified, that his Father at the hearing of the ſaid Meſſage, for ſorrow thereof died ſhortly after. Ex Pantal. lib. 5.

Furthermore, beſides theſe above-recited, and alſo before their time, I hear and underſtand by faithful Relation, that divers other have been in the ſaid Country of Spain, whoſe Hearts God had marvelouſly illuminate and ſuſtained up, both before, and alſo ſince the coming in of the Inquifition, to ſtand in defence of his Goſpel, and which were alſo perſecuted for the ſame, and are ſaid to have died in Priſon: Albeit their Names as yet are unknown, for the Stories of that Country be not ſo come to light, but, I truſt, ſhortly ſhall, as partly ſome Intelligence I have thereof. In the mean time we will come now to the Inquifition of Spain, ſpeaking ſomewhat of the ceremonial Pomp, and alſo of the barbarous Abufe and Cruelty of the ſame.

The execrable Inquifition of Spain.

THE cruel and barbarous Inquifition of Spain firſt began by King Ferdinandus and Elizabeth his Wife, and was inflituted againſt the Jews, which after their Baptiſm maintained again their own Ceremonies. But now it is practiſed againſt them that be never ſo little ſuſpected to favour the Verity of the Lord. The Spaniards, and eſpecially the great Divines there, do hold, That this holy and ſacred Inquifition cannot err, and that the holy Fathers the Inquifitors cannot be deceived.

Three forts of Men moſt principally be in danger of theſe Inquifitions. They that be greatly rich, for the ſpoil of their Goods. They that be learned, becauſe they will not have their Midealinges and ſecret Abules to be eſpied and detected. They that begin to increaſe in Honour and Dignity, left they being in Authority, ſhould work them ſome ſhame or diſhonour.

The Abule of this Inquifition is moſt execrable. If any Word ſhall paſs out of the mouth of any, which may be taken in evil part; yea, tho no Word be ſpoken, yet if they bear any grudge or evil Will againſt the Party, incontinent they command him to be taken, and put in an horrible Priſon, and then find out Crimes againſt him at leiſure, and in the mean time no Man living is ſo hardy once to open his Mouth for him. If the Father ſpeak one word for his Child, he is alſo taken and caſt into Priſon as a Favourer of Hereticks. Neither is it permitted to any perſon to go in to the Priſoner; but there he is alone in ſuch a place where he cannot ſee ſo much as the ground where he is; and is not ſuffered either to read or write, but there indureth in darkneſs palpable, in horrors infinite, in fear miſerable, wreſtling with the Affaults of death.

By this it may be eſteemed, what trouble and ſorrow, what penſive thoughts and cogitations they ſuſtain, which are not throughly inſtructed in holy Doctrine. Add moreover to their Diſtreſſes and Honors of the Priſon, the Injuries, Threats, Whippings, and Scourgings, Irons, Tortures, and Racks which they indure. Sometimes alſo they are brought out, and ſhewed in ſome higher place to the People, as a Spectacle of rebuke and infamy. And thus are they detained there ſome many years, and murdered by long Torments, and whole days together intreated much more cruelly (out of all compariſon) than if they were in the Hangman's Hands to be ſlain at once. During all this time, what is done in the proceſs, no perſon knoweth, but only the holy Fathers and the Tormentors, which are ſworn to execute the Torments. All is done in ſecret, and (as great Myſteries) paſs not the hands of theſe holy ones. And after all theſe Torments ſo many years indured in the Priſon, if any Man ſhall be ſaved, it muſt be by gyeſting. For all the Proceedings of the Court of that execrable Inquifition are open to no Man, but all is done in hugger-mugger, and in cloſe corners, by Ambages, by Covertales, and ſecret Councils: The Accuſer is ſecret, the Crime ſecret, the Witneſs ſecret, whatſoever is done is ſecret, neither is the poor Priſoner ever advertiſed of any thing. If he

	cangues who accused him whereof, and wherefore, he may be pardoned peradventure of his Life: but this is very seldom, and yet he shall not incontinent be set at liberty before he hath endured long time infinite Torments, and this is called their Penitence, and so is he let go; and yet not so, but that he is enjoyed, before he pays the Inquisitor's hands, that he shall wear a Garment of yellow Colours for a note of publick infamy to him and his whole race: and if he cannot guess right, shewing to the Inquisitors by whom he was accused, whereof, and wherefore, (as is before touched) incontinent the horrible Sentence of Condemnation is pronounced against him, that he shall be burned for an obdurate Heretick. And so yet the Sentence is not executed by and by, but after that he hath endured Imprisonment in some heinous Prison. And thus have ye heard the form of the Spanish Inquisition. By the Vigour and Rigour of this Inquisition, many good true Servants of Jesus Christ have been brought to death, especially in these later years, since the Royal and peaceable Reign of this our Queen Elizabeth. The Names and Stories of whom partly we will here recite, according as we have faithful Records of such as have come to our hands by writing. The other which be not yet come to our knowledge, we will defer, till further intelligence and opportunity, by the Lord's aid and leave, shall serve hereafter. Ann 1556 Maii 21, in the Town of Valledolid, where commonly the Council of the Inquisition is wont to be kept, the Inquisitors had brought together many Prisoners, both of high and low estate, to the number of thirty; also the Coffin of a certain Noble Woman, with her Picture lying upon it, which had been dead long before, there to receive Judgment and Sentence. To the hearing of which Sentence, they had ordained in the said Town three mighty Towers or Stages: Upon the first was placed Dame Jane, Sister to K. Philip, and chief Regent of his Realms; also Friar Charles, King Philip's Son, with other Princes and Peers of Spain. Upon the other Scaffold mounted the Archbishop of Sevil, Prince of the Synagogue of the Inquisition, with the Council of the Inquisition; also other Bishops of the Land, and the King's Council with them. After that the Princes and other spiritual Judges and Councillors were thus set in their places, with a great guard of Archers and Halberdiers, and harnessed Souldiers, with four Heraults also of Arms giving their attendance to the same, and the Earl of Buendia bearing the naked Sword, all the Market-place where the Stages were, being invironed with an infinite multitude of all sorts of the World there standing, and gazing out of Windows and Houles to hear and see the Sentences and Judgments of this Inquisition: Then after all were brought forth, as a Spectacle and Triumph, the poor Servants and Witnesses of Jesus Christ, to the number (as is above said) of thirty, clothed with their Sanbenitos, (as the Spaniards do call it) which is a manner of Vesture of yellow Cloth, coming both before them and behind them, spangled with red Croffes, and having burning Cierges in their hands: also before them was born a Crucifix covered with black linen Cloths, in token of Mourning. Moreover, they which were to receive the Sentence of death, had Miter of Paper upon their heads, which the Spaniards call Coracae. Thus they being produced, were placed in their order, one under another, according as they were esteemed culpable; so that first of all stood up Doctor Casalla, an Austen Frier, a Man notable and singular in knowledge of Divinity, Preacher sometime to Charles the ninth Emperor, both in higher and Lower Germany. These things thus disposed, then followed a Sermon made by a Dominick Frier, which endured an hour. After the Sermon finished, the Procurator General, with the Archbishop went to the Stage where the Princes and Nobles stood, to minister a Solemn Oath unto them upon the Crucifix painted in the Table-Book; the Tenor of which Oath was this: Your Majesties shall swear, that you will favour the holy Inquisition, and also give your consent unto the same; and not only that you shall by no manner of way hinder and impeach the same; but also you shall employ the uttermost of your help and endeavour hereafter	to see all them to be executed, which shall swerve from the Church of Rome, and adjoyn themselves to the Sect of the Lutheran Hereticks, without all respect of any Person or Persons of what Estate, Degree, Quality, or Condition soever they be. And thus much for the first Article of the Oath; the second was this as followeth: Item, Your Majesties shall swear, that you shall constrain all your Subjects to submit themselves to the Church of Rome, and to have in reverence all the Laws and Commandments of the same; and also to give your aid against all them whosoever shall hold of the Heresie of the Lutherans, or take any part with them. In this sort and manner, when all the Princes and States every one in their degree had received their Oath, then the Archbishop, lifting up his hand, gave them his Benediction, saying, God blefs your Highnesses, and give you long life. This solemn Pageant thus finished, at last the poor Captives and Prisoners were called out, the Procurator fiscal, or the Pope's great Collector, first beginning with Dr. Casalla, and so proceeding to the other in order, as hereafter in the Table which followeth, with their Names and their Judgments, is described. 1. Dr. Casalla a Frier Augustine. Before the Pope's great Proctor, or Collector fiscal, first was called forth Doctor Augustin Casalla. This Doctor was a Frier of Augustin's Order, and Priest of the Town of Valledolid, and Preacher sometimes to the Emperor Charles the fifth, a Man well accounted of for his Learning. Who for that he was thought to be as the Standard-bearer to the Gospellers (whom they called Lutherans) and Preacher and Prisoner unto them; therefore he being first called for, was brought from his Stage next to the Proctor fiscal, there to hear the Sentence of his Condemnation, which was, That he should be degraded, and presently burned, and all his Goods confiscate to the Profit and Advancement of Justice. 2. Francis de Bivero Priest of Valledolid, and Brother to the foresaid Casalla. The second Prisoner, and next to Doctor Casalla that was called, was Francis de Bivero his Brother, Priest also of Valledolid, who received likewise the same Sentence of Condemnation. And to the intent he should not speak any thing to the prejudice, or against the Abuse of the sacred Inquisition, as he before had done, both within and without the Prison, with much boldness; and also because he was much favoured of the People; to the end therefore that no Commotion should come by his speaking, his Mouth was so stopped and shut up, that he could not speak one Word. 3. Dame Blanch de Bivero. The third was Dame Blanch, Sister to the other two aforesaid, against whom also was pronounced the like Sentence, as upon her Brother before. 4. John de Bivero. The fourth was John de Bivero, Brother to the same Kindred, who was also judged an Heretick, and condemned to perpetual Prison, and to bear his Sanbenito all his Life long; which is an habilliment of dishonour.	The Inquisitors of Spain. The Pope's great Collector, or Procurator fiscal. The Archbishop of Sevil. The Bishop of Valence.	Dr. Casalla, a Frier Augustine, Preacher sometimes to Charles 5th. R. Hen. 8.	4. Dame Constance de Bivero, Sister to the same aforesaid. Dame Constance de Bivero, was the fifth Sister to the other before specified, and Widow of Perdinando Orti, dwelling sometime at Valledolid, who was also condemned, with the like Sentence with her Brethren, to be burned. 6. The Coffin with the dead Corps of Dame Leonore de Bivero, the Mother of these aforesaid. The sixth Thunderbolt of Condemnation was thundred out against a poor Coffin, with the dead Corps of Dame Leonore de Bivero, Mother to these above-named, being her self the sixth, and being already dead long before at Valledolid. Above her Coffin was her Picture laid, which was also condemned with her dead Corps to be burned for an Heretick: and yet I never heard of any Opinion that this Picture did hold, either with or against the Church of Rome. This good Mother, while she lived, was a worthy maintainer of Christ's Gospel, with great integrity of life; and retained divers assemblies of the Saints in her house for the preaching of the Word of God. In fine, her Corps and Image also, being brought before the Fiscal, was condemned likewise (as the Mother with her seven Children in the Book of Macabees) to be burned for a Lutheran Heretick, and all her goods to be seized to the behoof of the superior Powers, and also her house utterly to be razed and cast down to the ground: and for a memorial of the same, a Marble Stone was appointed to be set up in the house, whereas in the like cause of her burning should be engraved. 7. Mr. Alonso Perez, Priest of Valencia. In the seventh place was condemned Master Alonso Perez, Priest of Valencia, first to be degraded, and after to be burned as an Heretick, and all his goods confiscate and likewise seized to the behoof of the Superiority. When these seven aforesaid had received their Sentence, then the Bishop of Valencia, in his Pontificalibus, caused Dr. Cacalla, Francis his Brother, and Alonso, to be apparelled and vested in Priestly Vesture. Which done, he took from them first the Chalice out of their hands, and so all their other Trinkets in order, according to their accustomed solemnity. And thus they being degraded, and all their Priestly Unctions taken from their fingers, also their Lips and their crowns razed, so were their yellow Habits of Sanbenito put over their Shoulders again, with their Meters also of Paper upon their Heads. This done, Dr. Cacalla began to speak, praying the Princes and Lords to give him audience: but that being not granted unto him, he was rudely repulled, and returned again to his standing. Only thus much he protested clearly and openly, That his Faith, for which he was so handled, was not heretical, but consonant to the pure Word of God. For the which also he was prest and ready to suffer death as a true Christian, and not as an Heretick: Besides many other worthy Sentences of great consolation, which he there uttered in the mean space, whiles the Judges were busy in their Sentences against the residue of the Martyrs. 8. Don Peter Sarmiento, Knight of the Order of Alcantara. The eighth that was brought before the aforesaid Fiscal was Don Peter Sarmiento, Knight of the Order of Alcantara, dwelling at Valencia,	and Son of Marques de Pozza, who was pronounced an Heretick, and judged to bear the mark and habit of dishonour all his life, and condemned to perpetual Prison, with the loss of his Order, and of all his Goods. To whom moreover it was enjoined, never to wear any more Gold, Silver, Pearls, or any precious Stone about him. 9. Dame Mencia, Wife of the said Don Peter. Ninthly, after him was called Dame Mencia de Figuera, Wife of the aforesaid Don Peter Sarmiento. Who likewise, being proclaimed for an Heretick, was condemned to the same punishment as her Husband was. 10. Don Louis de Roxas, Son and Heir of the Marques de Pozza. Next after her was called and brought forth Don Louis de Roxas, Son and Heir of the Marques de Pozza: who also being declared an Heretick, for the great suit and labour that was made for him, was condemned only to bear his Sanbenito unto the Town-house, and his Goods to be confiscate. 11. Dame Anne Henriques. After whom, in the eleventh place, followed Dame Anne Henriques, Daughter of the Marques Afcanzar, and Mother to the forenamed Marques de Pozza, and Wife to the Lord Alphonfus de Fonseca: Who in like sort was declared an Heretick, and condemned to bear her Sanbenito to the Town-house, and her Goods to be confiscate. 12. Christopher Del Campo. Christopher Del Campo, Citizen of Samora, was the twelfth, who, after he was declared an Heretick, was judged to be burned, and his Goods to be seized. 13. Christopher de Padilla. The like Sentence was also given upon Christopher de Padilla, Citizen of Samora. 14. Antonio de Huetzuello. The fourteenth was Antonio de Huetzuello, Bachelor of Divinity, dwelling at Toro. Who after he was proclaimed Heretick, and his Goods confiscate, was condemned to be burned; and moreover had his mouth stopped, for that he should not speak and make confession of his Faith unto the People. 15. Katharine Roman. Then followed Katharine Roman, dwelling in Pedrofa, called from her standing: who, receiving the like Sentence, was condemned to be burned, and all her Goods confiscate. 16. Frances Errem. The sixteenth was Frances Errem, born in Pegnaranda; whom they condemned to be burned alive, and all her Goods likewise to be confiscate.

A Smith martyr.	20. A Smith. A certain Workman of white Iron, or Smith, for entertaining Assemblies in his House, and for watching with them, received also with them the like Sentence, to lose both Life and Goods for the Gospel's sake.		After these Sentences being thus pronounced, they which were condemn'd to be burned, with the Coffin of the dead Lady and her Picture upon the same, were committed to the secular Magistrate, and their Executioners, which were commanded to do their endeavour. Then were they all incontinent taken, and every one set upon an Ais, their Faces turned backward, and led with a great Garrison of armed Souldiers unto the place of punishment, which was without the Gate of the Town, called Del Campo .	24 Martyrs in Spain burned.
A few burned.	21. A Jew. With these also was joined a Portugal , named Gonzalo Vaz of Lisbon , which was born a Jew, afterward baptized, and then returned again to his Judaism: who, for more shame to the other, was put also in the same tale and number, as the two Thieves were joined with Christ, and was also with them condemn'd to be burned, and his Goods seized.		When they were come to the place, there were fourteen Stakes set up of equal distance one from another, whereunto every one severally being fastned according to the fashion of Spain , they were all first strangled, and then burned and turned to Ashes, save only Anthony Huezuello , who forso-much as he had, both within and without the Prison, vehemently defied the Pope's Spirituality, therefore he was burned alive, and his mouth stopp'd from speaking. And thus these faithful Christians, for the verity and pure Word of God, were led to death as Sheep to the Shambles: who not only most Christianly did comfort one another, but also did so exhort all them there present, that all Men marvelled greatly, both to hear their singular constancy, and to see their quiet and peaceable end.

It is reported that, besides these aforesaid, there remained yet behind thirty seven other Prisoners, at the said Town of Valledolid , reserved to another Tragedy and Spectacle of that bloody Inquisition. Ex quin. parte Mart. Leonore de Lisueros.	23. Leonore de Lisueros, Wife of Huezuello. In like manner was called for Leonore de Lisueros , Wife of the aforesaid Anthony Huezuello , Bachelor of Divinity.		Furthermore, whereas the story of the said Inquisition being set out in the French Tongue, doth reckon the number of the Martyrs above-mentioned, to be thirty, and yet, in particular declaration of them, doth name no more but eight and twenty; here is therefore to be noted, That either this number lacked two of thirty, or else that two of the said Company were returned back without judgment into the Prison again.

Albeit there be other Countries also, besides Spain , subject unto the same Inquisition, as Naples and Sicily : in which Kingdom of Sicily , I have it credibly reported, That every third year are brought forth to Judgment and Execution a certain number, after the like sort of Christian Martyrs, sometimes twelve, sometimes six, sometimes more, sometimes less. Among whom there was one, much about the same year above-mentioned, Ann 1559 : who coming from Genova to Sicily , upon zeal to do good, was at last laid hand on; and being condemn'd the same time to the fire, as he should take his death, was offered there of the Hangmen to be strangled, having the Cord ready about his Neck; but he, notwithstanding, refused the same, and said, That he would feel the fire: and so endured he, singing with all his might unto the Lord, till he was bereaved both of Speech and Life, in the midst of the flame: such was the admirable constancy and fortitude of that valiant Souldier	A Christian Martyr burned in Sicily

The Italian Martyrs.

N. Encenas, otherwise called Dryander, at Rome, Anno 1546.

THis Encenas, or Dryander, a Spaniard, born at Bruges, was Brother to Francis Encenas the learned Man, so oft before mentioned: and was also the teacher or instructor in knowledge of Religion to Dianus the godly Martyr above recorded. He was sent of his superstitious Parents, being young, unto Rome; Who there, after long continuance, growing up in Age and Knowledge, but especially being instructed by the Lord in the truth of his Word, after he was known to mislike the Pope's Doctrine, and the impure doings at Rome, was apprehended and taken of certain of his own Country-men, and some of his own household Friends at Rome, at the same time when he was preparing to take his journey to his Brother Francis Encenas in Germany. Thus he, being betrayed and taken by his own Country-men, was brought before the Cardinals, and there committed to strait Prison. Afterward he was brought forth to give testimony of his Doctrine, which he in the presence of the Cardinals, and in the face of all the Pope's Retinue, boldly and constantly defended. So that not only the Cardinals, but especially the Spaniards being therewith offended, cried out upon him that he should be burned. The Cardinals, first before the Sentence of Death should be given, came to him, offering, if he would take it (after the manner of the Spaniards) the Badg of Reconciliation; which hath the name of Sanbonis's Cloth, made in form of a Mantle, going both before him and behind him, with signs of the red Crocs. But Encenas, still constant in the profession of Truth, denied to receive any other Condition or Badg, but only the Badg of the Lord, which was to seal the Doctrine of his Religion with the testimony of his Blood. At last the matter was brought to that issue, that the faithful Servant and Witness of Christ was judged and condemned to the Fire; where he, in the sight of the Cardinals, and in the face of the Apostolick See pretended, gave up his life for the testimony of the Gospel. *Ex Pantul. lib. 6. cretly was moved in his mind to take the occasion offered, and to shift for himself; and so he slipping out of the Prison, without any hasty pace, but going as leisurely as he could, escaped from thence, and went straight to Germany.

Faninus, at Ferrara, Anno 1550.

Faninus, born in Faventia, a Town in Italy, through the reading of godly Books translated into the Italian Tongue, (having no perfect skill in the Latin) was converted from great blindness, to the wholesome knowledge of Christ and of his Word. Wherein he took such a sweetness, and so grew up in the meditation of the same, that he was able in short time to instruct other. Neither was there any diligence lacking in him to communicate that abroad which he had received of the Lord: being so in his mind persuaded, that a Man, receiving by the Spirit of God the knowledge and illumination of his Verity, ought in no case to hide the same in silence, as a Candle under a Bushel. And therefore being occupied diligently in that behalf, albeit he used not publicly to preach, but by private conference to teach, he was at length by the Pope's Clients espied, apprehended, and committed to Prison. Albeit he remained not long in Prison, for by the earnest persuasions and prayers of his Wife, his Children, and other Friends, he was so overcome, that he gave over, and so was dismissed shortly out of Prison. After this, it was not long but he fell into horrible perturbation of mind: insomuch that unless the great Mercy of God had kept him up, he had fallen into utter desperation, for slipping from the Truth, and preferring the love of his Friends and Kindred before the Service of Jesus Christ, whom he so earnestly before had professed. This Wound went so deep into his heart, that he could in no case be quieted, before he had fully fixed and determined in his mind, to adventure his life more faithfully in the Service of the Lord.

Whereupon he, being thus inflamed with zeal of Spirit, went about all the Country of Romaigna, publicly preaching the pure Doctrine of the Gospel, not without great fruit and effect in places as he went. As he was thus labouring, it so fell out that he was apprehended again, Anno 1547, in a place called Bagnacavallo, where also he was condemned to be burned. But he said his hour was not yet come, and the same to be but the beginning of his Doctrine: and so it was; for shortly after he was removed unto Ferraria, where he was detained two years. At last the Inquisitors of the Pope's Heresies condemned him to death, Anno 1549; and yet his time being not come, he remained after that to the month of September, An. 1550. In the mean time many faithful and good Men came to visit him; for the which the Pope commanded him to be inclosed in stricter custody; wherein he suffered great torments the space of eighteen months, and yet had suffered greater, if the Dominick Friars might have got him in their

The Imprisonment and escape of N. Encenas.

And for so much as mention hath been made both in this story, and many other before, of Francis Encenas his Brother, here is not to be permitted, how the said Francis being a Man of notable learning as ever was any in Spain, being in the Emperor's Court at Brussels, offered unto the Emperor, Charles the 5th. the New Testament of Christ translated into Spanish. For the which he was cast into Prison, where he remained in sorrowful captivity and calamity the space of fifteen months, looking for nothing more than present death. At last, through the marvellous providence of Almighty God, the first day of February, Anno 1545, at eight of the Clock after Supper, he found the doors of the Prison standing open, and he setheir house, as they went about. Thus Fannius removed from Prison to Prison, many times changed his place, but never altered his constancy.

At length he was brought into a Prison, where were divers great Lords, Captains, and noble Personages there committed, for stirring up Commotions and Factions (as the Country of Italy is full of such) who at first, hearing him speak, began to set him at nought, and to deride him: supposing that it was but a melancholy humour that troubled his brain. Whereupon, such as seemed more sage amongst them, began to exhort him to leave his Opinion, and to live with Men as other Men do, and not to vex his mind, but to suspend his Judgment till the matter were decided in the General Council. To whom Fannius again, first giving them thanks for their friendly good will, wherewith they seemed to respect his well-doing, modestly and quietly declared unto them, how the Doctrine which he professed, was no Humour nor Opinion of Man's brain, but the pure Verity of God, founded in his Word, and revealed to Men in the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and especially now in these days restored: which Verity he had fully determined in his mind never to deny, to believe the lying Fantasies of Men. And as in his Soul, which was redeemed by the Blood of the Son of God, he was free from all bondage: so likewise as touching Councils, he looked for no other Sentence nor Authority, he said, but that only which he knew to be declared to us by Christ Jesus in his Gospel, which both he preached with his Word, and confirmed with his Blood, &c. With these and such other words, he so moved their minds, that they were clean altered unto a new kind of Life, having him now in admiration, whom they had before in derision, and recounted him for an holy Person. To whom he proceeded still to preach the Word of Grace, declaring, and confessing himself to be a miserable Sinner; but by the Faith of the Lord Jesus, and through the Grace only of him, he was fully persuaded and well assured his sins to be forgiven: like as all their sins also shall be remitted to them through their Faith only in Christ, they believing his Gospel.

There were others also besides these, who, having used before a more delicate kind of life, could not well away with the sharpness and the hardness of the Prison. These also received such comfort by the said Fannius, that not only they were quietly contented, but also rejoiced in this their captivity; by the occasion whereof they had received and learned a better liberty than ever they knew before.

When the imprisonment of this Fannius was known to his Parents and Kinsfolk, his Wife and Sister came to him with weeping perswasions, to move him to consider and care for his poor Family. To whom he answered again, That his Lord and Master had commanded him, not to deny him for looking to his Family; and that it was enough for them that he had once for their sakes fallen into that cowardliness which they knew. Wherefore he desired them to depart in peace, and sollicite him no more therein, for his end, he said, he knew to draw near, and so he commanded them unto the Lord.

About the same time died Pope Paulus the 3^d, and after him succeeded Julius the 3^d, which then sent Letters and Commandment that Fannius should be executed. Whereof when one of the Magistrates Officers brought him word the next day, he rejoiced thereat, and gave the Messenger thanks, and began to preach a long Sermon to them that were about him, of the felicity and beatitude of the Life to come. Then the Messenger exhorted him, that, in case he would change his Opinion, he should save both his Life, and enjoy that to come. Another asked him in what case he should leave his little Children and his Wife, or what stay should they be at, he so leaving them: wherefore he desired him to have respect both to himself and to them. Fannius answered, that he had left them with an Overseer, which would see unto them sufficiently: and being asked who he was? The Lord Jesus Christ, said he, a faithful Keeper and Conserver of all that is committed to him. After that the Messenger was thus departed from Fannius, all full of tears and sorrow, the next day following he was removed into the common Prison, and delivered to the secular Magistrate. Who in all his ways, his words, his gestures, and countenance, declared such constancy of Faith, such modesty of manners and tranquillity of mind, that they which before were extreme against him, thinking him rather to have a Devil, began now favourably to hearken to him, and to commend him. With such grace and sweetness he talked, ever speaking of the Word of God, that divers of the Magistrates Wives, in hearing him, could not abstain from weeping. The Executioner also wept himself. One of the Publick Scribes then came to him, and said, That if he would relent from his Opinion, the Pope's pleasure was, that he should be saved: but that he refused. This was marvellous, that he having but small skill in the Latine, yet recited so many and sundry places of the Scripture without Book, and that so truly and promptly, as tho he had studied nothing else. One, seeing him so jocond and merry going to his death, asked, why he was so merry at his death, seeing Christ himself sweat Blood and Water before his Passion? Christ said he, sustained in his Body all the sorrows and conflicts with Hell and Death due to us: by whose suffering we are delivered from sorrow and fear of them all. Finally, early in the morning he was brought forth where he should suffer. Who, after his Prayers most earnestly made unto the Lord, meekly and patiently gave himself to the Stake, where with a Cord drawn about his Neck, he was secretly strangled of the Hangman, in the City of Ferraria, three hours before day, to the intent the People should not see him, nor hear him speak: and after, about dinner-time, his Body in the same place was burned. At the burning whereof such a fragrant and odoriferous scent came to all them there present, and so their senses, that the sweetness thereof seemed to refresh them no less, than his words would have done, if they had heard him speak.

The Custom is of that City, that the Bones and Ashes which be left, should be carried out of the City; but neither the Magistrate, nor the Bishop, nor his great Vicar or Chancellor, nor any Divine else, would take any charge thereof, every Man transferring that burthen from themselves to him which was the cause of his death. Whereby it may appear, what secret judgment and estimation all they had of that good and blessed Man. At the last, People took his burned Bones, with the Cinders, and carried them out of the street of the City. Ex Hen. Pantul. lib. 7. Ex Jo. Crisp. pag. 363.

Anno 1550.

The same year that the aforesaid Fannius suffered in Ferraria, Dominicus also suffered in the City of Placentia. This Dominicus was Citizen in Basana, and followed the Wars of Charles the Emperor in Germany: where he received the first taste of Christ's Gospel. Wherein he increased more and more, by conferring and reasoning with learned Men, so that in short time he was able to instruct many, and so he did working and travelling in the Church, till at length, in the year 1550, he, coming to the City of Naples, there preached the Word, and from thence proceeding to Placentia, preached there likewise unto the People, of true Confession, of Purgatory, and of Pardons. Furthermore, the next day he entreated of true Faith and good Works, how far they are necessary to Salvation, promising moreover the next day to speak of Antichrist, and to paint him out in his colours. When the hour came that he should begin his Sermon, the Magistrate of the City commanded him to come down from the Chair in the Market-place, and delivered him to the Officers. Dominicus was willing and ready to obey the Commandment, saying, That he did much marvel that the Devil could suffer him so long in that kind of Exercise. From thence he was led to the Bishop's Chancellor, and asked whether he was a Priest, and and how he was placed in that Function. He answered, That he was no Priest of the Pope, but of Jesus Christ, by whom he was lawfully called to that Office. Then was he demanded, whether he would renounce his Doctrine? He answered, That he maintained no Doctrine of his own, but only the Doctrine of Christ, which also he was ready to seal with his Blood, and also gave hearty thanks to God, which so accepted him as worthy to glorify his Name with his martyrdom. Upon this he was committed to a filthy and stinking Prison, where after he had remained a few months, he was exhorted divers times to revoke, otherwise he should suffer; but still he remained constant in his Doctrine. Whereupon when the time came assigned for his punishment, he was brought to the Market-place, where he preached, and there was hanged; who most heartily praying for his Enemies, so finished his days in this miserable wretched World. Ex Pantul. lib. 7.

The martyrdom of Domitius de Bassiana.

Galeazius Trecius, at the City called Laos Pompeia in Italy, Anno 1551.

Santangelo, is a certain Fortreis or Castle in Italy, within Lombardy, not far from the City called Laus Pompeia, belonging also to the same Diocese. In this Fort of Santangelo was an House of Augustine Friars, unto whom used much to resort a certain Frier of the same Order, dwelling at Pania, named Maisnardus, a Man well expert in the study of Scripture, and of a godly conversation. By this Maisnardus, towns not only of the Friars, but also of other Townsmen, were reduced to the love and knowledge of God's Word, and to the detestation of the Pope's abuses. Among whom was also this Galeazius, a Gentleman of a good calling, and wealthy in worldly substance, and very beneficial to the Poor. Who first by conference with the Friars, and also with his Brother-in-Law, began to conceive some light in God's Truth, and afterward was confirmed more thoroughly by Celcius secundus Caris, who, then being driven by Persecution, came from Pavia to the said place of Santangelo. In process of time, as this Galeazius increased in Judgment and Zeal, in setting forward the wholesome Word of God's Grace: as a Light shining in darkness he could not so lie hid, but at last, in the year of our Lord 1551, certain were sent from the forenamed City of Laus Pompeia, to lay hands upon him, and brought him to the Bishop's Palace; where he was kept in bands, having under him but only a pad of straw. Altho his Wife sent unto him a good Featherbed, with sheets to lie in, yet the Bishop's Chaplains and Officers kept it from him, dividing the Prey among themselves.

When the time came that he should be examined, he was thrice brought before the Commissioners, where he rendered Reasons and Causes of his Faith, answering to their interrogatories with such evidence of Scriptures, and constancy of mind, that he was an admiration to them that heard him. Albeit not long after, through the importunate persuasions of his Kinsfolk and Friends, and other cold Gospellers, laying many considerations before his eyes, he was brought at length to assent to certain points of the Pope's Doctrine. But yet the Mercy of God, which began with him, so left him not, but brought him again to such repentance, and bewailing of his Pact, that he became afterward (according to the example of Peter, and Scyprian, and others) double-wise more valiant in defence of Christ's Quarrel: neither did he ever desire any thing more, than occasion to be offered to recover again by confession, that which he had lost before by denial: affirming, that he never felt more joy of heart, than at the time of his examinations, where he stood thrice to the constant confession of the Truth: and contrary that he never tasted more sorrow in all his life, than when he slip'd afterward from the same by dissimulation. Declaring moreover to his Brethren, that death was much more sweet unto him, with testimony of the Verity, than life with the least denial of Truth, and loss of a good Conscience. Thus Galeazius, mourning for his fall into Prison, after he heard of his Friends, that nothing was yet so far past, but that he might recover himself again, and that his inhumanity was not prejudicial, but rather a furtherance to God's Glory, and an admonition to himself to stand more strongly hereafter, took thereby exceeding comfort: and when they would have left with him a Book of the New Testament for his comfort, he refused it, saying, that he had in his heart whatsoever Christ there spake to his Disciples: also what happened both to Christ himself, and to his Disciples, for confessing the Word of Truth.

Furthermore, so comfortable was he after that, that they which talked with him, continued all the day without Meat or Drink, and would also have carried all the night following, if they might have been suffered.

As Galeazius thus continued in the Prison, looking for some occasion to recover himself again from his fall, it followed in short time that the Inquisitors and Priests repaired to him again in the Prison, supposing that he would confirm now that which before he had granted to them, and required him so to do. Galeazius, denying all that he had granted to them before, returned again to the defence of his former Doctrine, with much more boldness of Spirit confessing Christ, as he did before, and detested Images, affirming and proving that God only is to be worshipped, and that in Spirit and Verity: Also that there be no more Mediators but Christ alone, and that he only and sufficiently by his suffering hath taken away the sins of the whole World; and that all they which depart hence in this Faith, are ascertain'd of everlasting Life; they which do not, are under everlasting damnation, with such otherlike matter, which was repugnant utterly to the Pope's Proceedings. With this confession made, as his mind was greatly refreshed, so the Adversaries went away all much appaled; who, at last perceiving that he in no case could be revoked, caused him to be committed to the secular Judge to be burned.

Galeazius Trecius martyr.

Galeazius Trecius martyr.

Thus Galeazius early in the morning, being brought out of Prison to the Market-place, there was left standing bound to the Stake till noon, as a gazing-stock for all Men to look upon. In the which mean time many came about him, exhorting him to recant, and not so to cast away his life, whereas with ten words speaking he might save it. If he passed not for his Life, nor for his Country where he should live, nor for his Goods and Possessions, which should be confiscated, yet he should somewhat respect his Wife whom he loved so well, and his young Children, at least he should consider his own Soul. This counsel gave they, which more esteemed the Commodities of this present life, than any true Soul's health in the life to come. But to conclude, nothing could stir the settled mind of this valiant Martyr. Wherefore fire was commanded at last to be put to the dry Wood about him, wherewith he was shortly consumed, without any noise or crying, save only these words heard in the middle of the flame, Lord Jesus. This was Anno 1551, Novemb. 24.

The Death and death of Galeazius.

Touching the story of this blessed Martyr, this by the way is to be given for a Memorandum. That a little before this Galeazius should be burned, there was a Controversy between the Major of the City, and the Bishop's Clergy, for the expences of the Wood that should go to his burning. He hearing thereof, sent word to both the Parties to agree, for he himself, of his own Goods, would see the cost of that matter discharged.

Another note moreover here is to be added, that while Galeazius was in captivity, certain of the Papists, perceiving that Galeazius had great Goods and Possessions, practised with his Wife, under colour to release her Husband, that she should lay out a sum of Money to be sent to the Wife of the chief Lord of Millain (called Ferrarius Guesaga) to the end that he should entreat both with her Husband, and with the Senate, for Galeazius's Life. Which Money when they had thus jugged into their hands, Galeazius notwithstanding was burned, and so was the silly Woman robbed and defeated, both of her Husband, and also of her Money. Ex Celis.

D. Jo. Molli- nus, martyr.	D. John Mollinus, a Gray Friar. A certain Weaver of Perulium. At Rome, Anno 1553.	In the mean season, Laurentius Spatha above-mentioned, being General of that Order, in most speedy wife pulled up to Rome, and there so practised with the Cardinal St. Crucis, the Proctor in the Court of Rome for the Gray Friars, that the Pope wrote down his Letters to Campjus, that he should deliver the said John out of Prison: so that he notwithstanding, within three months after, should personally appear at Rome. Thus the thirtieth day of his imprisonment he was delivered; who, but for the coming of the Pope's Letters, had been burned within three days after. Moreover, with the said Mollinus, Cornelius was also cited to make his appearance likewise at Rome, and there was detained in Prison by the Cardinal St. Crucis, till his cause should be decided. The Friends of Mollinus gave him counsel not to go to Rome, and offered him money to go to Germany: but he would not, saying, that the Gospel must also be preached at Rome. After he was come to Rome, and appeared before Pope Paul the third, humbly he desired, that the Cause being so weighty, might come in publick hearings, but that could not be obtained. Then was he commanded to write his mind in Articles, and to bring his Proofs: which he diligently performed, treating of Original Sin, Justification by Faith, Free-Will, Purgatory, and other such like: proving the said Articles by the Authority of the Scripture, and of ancient Fathers, and to exhibited the same to the Bishop of Rome. Upon this, certain Cardinals and Bishops were assigned to have the Cause in hearing: who disputed with him three days, and could not feel that which he had proved. At last answer was made unto him thus; that it was truth which he affirmed, nevertheless the same was not meet for this present time; for that it could not be taught or published without the detriment of the Apostolick See: wherefore he should abstain hereafter from the Epistles * of St. Paul, and so return again safe to Bononia, and there profess Philosophy. Thus as he was returned to Bononia, and all Men there were desirous to know of his case, how he fared at Rome, openly in the Pulpit he declared all things in order as they were done, and gave God thanks.	Mollins delivered out of Prison by means of Spatha the General.
Cornelius Profef- sor of Bonony	Joan. Mollinus Montiscinus, being but twelve years old, with his Brother Augustinus, was let of his Parents in the house of the Gray Friars, where he in short time, having a fresh Wit, far excelled his Fellows in all Tongues and Liberal Sciences. So growing up to the Age of eighteen, he was ordained Priest, and sang his first Mass. After that he was sent to Ferrara to study, where he so profited in the space of six years, that he was assigned, by Vigerius General of that Order, to be Doctor, and then Reader in Divinity: who then, with his Sophistry, opposed himself as an utter Enemy against the Gospel. From thence he went to Brixia, and the next year following to Milaine, where he read or professed openly. Again, from thence he was taken by Franciscus Sforzia, and brought to the University of Pavia, there openly to profess Philosophy. Where he remained four years. After that he was called to the University of Bononie, by Laurentius Spatha, General of the Order, where he was occupied in reading the Books of Aristotle de Anima. In the mean time God wrought in his Soul such light of his Word, and of true Religion, that he, waxing weary of professing Philosophy, began secretly to expound the Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans to a few; which being known, his Auditors increased so fast, that he was compelled to read openly in the Temple. Whereas the number of his Audience daily augmented, so the eager fervency of their minds so mightily increased withal, that every Man almost came with his Pen and Ink to write, and great diligence was bestowed how to come betime to take up the first places, where they might best hear, which was about the year of our Lord 1538. There was the same time, at Bononie, one Cornelius an arrogant Babbler, who, envying the doings of Joannes, took upon him, at the request of Cardinal Campjus, to expound the said Epistle of Saint Paul, consisting and disproving the explanation of the said John, and extolling the Pope with all his traditions. Contrary, John extolled and commended only Christ and his Merits to the People. But the purpose of Cornelius came to small effect. For the Auditors which first came unto him, began by little to fall from him, and the concourse of the other Man's Auditors more and more increased.	Mollins appeared before the Pope.
Laurentius Spatha, General of the gray Friars.		Herewith Campjus, being more offended than before, obtained of the Pope, that the General of the Order should remove the said John Mollinus from Bononie, and place him some other where. So Mollinus from thence, was sent to Naples, and there was appointed Reader and Preacher in the Monastery of St. Laurence. But Petrus the Viceroy there, not abiding his Doctrine, so nearly sought his death, that he had much ado to escape with life; and so departing from thence, he went wandering in Italy from place to place, preaching Christ wheresoever he came. Not long after this, when Cardinal Campjus was dead, he was called again unto Bononie by a good Abbat named de Grassis, Anno 1543, where he renewed again the reading of St. Paul's Epistles after a secret sort, as he did before; but that could not be long undiscovered. Whereupon by the means of Cardinal de Capo, and by Bonaventura the General, he was apprehended the second time, and brought to Favia, and laid there in a filthy and stinking Prison, where he continued four years, no Man having leave once to come to him. During which time of his inurance, he wrote a Commentary upon the Books of Moses: but that labour, by the malignity of the Adversaries was suppressed. At length, through the intercession of the Earl Petiliannus, and of the aforesaid good Abbat de Grassis, he was again delivered, and sent to Ravenna, where he made his abode a few months with the Abbat ad S. Vitalem, and there again taught the Gospel of Christ as before: and whensoever he spake of the Name of Jesus, his eyes dropped tears, for he was fraught with a mighty fervency of God's Holy Spirit.	* The Popes Church can not abide St. Pauls Epistles, but the Epistles must give place to Philosophy.
Cornelius & Cardinal Campjus, Persecutors.		In process of time, when this Abbat was dead, his Sureties began to be weary of their Bond, and so was he again now the third time reduced into Prison by the Pope's Legats. There were then four Men of great Authority, who, being stirred up by God, had pity upon him, and bailed him out of Prison. Of whom, one of the said Sureties took the said Mollinus home, to instruct his Children in the Doctrine of Religion and good Letters. Furthermore, at the fame of this Man such a concourse of People came to see him, that the Adversaries began to	Mollins in great danger at Naples.
Mollins taken and imprisoned by Cardinal Campjus	Which when Cornelius perceived, he perswaded Campjus, that unless he provided that Man to be dispatched, the estimation of the Church of Rome would thereby greatly decay. But when they could not openly bring their purpose about, secretly this way was devised, that Cornelius and Joannes should come to open disputation: which Disputation indured till three of the Clock after midnight. At length when neither part could agree, Joannes was bid to return home to his house. Who as he was come down to the lowest steps, where the place was most straitest, so that his Friends could not come to rescue him, (al tho by drawing their Swords they declared their good wills) was there taken and laid fast in Prison. When the day came, such tumult and fir was in the whole City, that Cornelius was driven to hide himself. Also Campjus the Cardinal, with the Bishop there, were both contemned of the Students. The next day the Bishop of Bononie sent his Chancellor to John in the Prison, to signify unto him, that either he must recant, or else burn. But he, being of a bold and cheerful Spirit, would in no wife be brought to recant. This one thing grieved him, that he should be condemned, his cause being not heard.	Mollins again delivered.

K.Hen.8. Mollus the fourth time imprisoned.	consult with themselves to kill him, left his Doctrine should disperse further abroad, to the detriment of the Church of Rome. Whereupon commandment was sent to the Pope's Legat to lay hands upon him, and to send him up fast bound to Rome. Where again, now the fourth time, he was imprisoned in the Castle of Rome, and there continued eighteen months, being greatly assaulted, sometimes with flattering Promises, sometimes with terrible Threats, to give over his Opinion: but his Building could not be shaken, for it was grounded upon a sure Rock. Thus Dr. Mollus, being constant in the defence of Christ's Gospel, was brought, with certain other Men (which were also apprehended for Religion) into the Temple of St. Mary (called De Minerva) the fifth day of September, Anno 1553; either there to revoke, or to be burned. There sat upon them six Cardinals in high Seats, besides the Judge: before whom preached a Dominick Frier, with cruelty inveighing against the poor Prisoners, incensed the Cardinals, with all the vehemency he might, to their condemnation. The poor Men stood holding a burning Taper in their hands: of whom some for fear of death revolted. But this Doctor Mollus, with a Weaver of Perugia , remained constant. Then Mollus began an earnest Sermon in the Italian Tongue, wherein he confirmed the Articles of the Faith by the Sacred Scriptures, declaring also that the Pope was not the Successor of Peter, but Antichrist, and that his Sectaries do figure the Whore of Babylon . Moreover, he cited them up to the Tribunal Seat of Christ, and threw away the burning Taper from him: Whereupon they, being replenished with anger, condemned him with the Weaver to the Fire, and commanded them to be had away. So were they carried incontinent to the Camp or Field, called Florianum , where they remained cheerful and constant: First, the Weaver was hanged: Mollus then, willing the Hangman to execute his Office likewise upon him, began to exhort the People to beware of Idolatry, and to have no other Saviours but Christ alone: for he only is the Mediator between God and Man. And so was he also hanged, commending his Soul to God, and afterward laid in the fire and burned. The People having divers Judgments upon him, some said he died an Heretic, some said he was a good Man. Ex Henrico Pant. lib. 19. Anno 1543.	ons: which seemed to some but Phantries coming of some Humor: to some they seemed uncatholic or Heretical. But he, constantly disputing with them by the manifest Scriptures, declared the Opinions which he defended, not to be any vain Speculations or imaginary Phantries of Man's doting Brain, but the pure Verity of God, and the evident Doctrine of Jesus Christ, expressed in his Word, necessary for all Men to believe, and also to maintain unto death: and therefore for his part, rather than he would be found false to Christ and his Word, he was there ready, not to deny, but to stand to Christ's Gospel, to the effusion of his Blood. Thus when he could in no wise be reclaimed from the Doctrine of Truth, Letters came from the Senate of Milain , that he should be executed with death. Which execution, as they of Comen were about to prepare, in the mean while came other Letters from Geneva , written by the Emperor's Ambassador, and other Nobles of Milain , by the which Letters his death was delay'd for a time, till at length other Letters were sent from the Senate again of Milain , requiring execution of the Sentence. Nevertheless, through intercession of his Friends, one week's respite more was granted him, to prove whether he might be won again to the Pope's Church, that is to say, lost from God. Thus he being mightily and long, both assailed by Friends, and by Enemies terrified, yet by no persuasions would be expunged, but gave thanks to God, that he was made worthy to suffer the rebukes of this World, and cruel death, for the testimony of his Son; and so went he cheerfully unto his death. Then came certain Franciscan Friers to him to hear his Confession, which he refused. Also they brought in their hands a Cro's for him to behold, to keep him from desperation at the feeling of the fire. But his mind, he said, was so replenished with joy and comfort in Christ, that he needed neither their Cro's, nor them. After this, as he was declaring many comfortable things to the People, of the fruition of those heavenly Joys above which God hath prepared for his, because he should speak no more to the People, his Tongue was bored through; and so immediately being tied to the Stake, there he was strangled till he was dead; every Man there, which saw his constancy, giving testimony, that he died a good Man. Afterward in his returning home, as he was passing over the Lake of Como , he was taken and brought to Como , and there committed to Ward. K.Hen.8.

A comfortable Letter of Pomponius Algerius an Italian Martyr.

To his dearly beloved Brethren and fellow Servants of Christ, which are departed out of Babylon into Mount Sion; Grace, peace, and health, from God our Father, by Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour.

TO mitigate your sorrow which you take for me, I cannot but impart unto you some portion of my delectation and joys, which I feel and find, to the intent you with me may rejoice and sing before the Lord, giving thanks unto him, I shall utter that which no Man will believe when I shall declare it. I have found a nest of Hony and Hony-comb in the intrails of a Lion. Who will ever believe that I shall say? or what Man will ever think in the deep dark Dungeon to find a Paradise of Pleasure? in the place of sorrow and death, to dwell in tranquility and hope of life? in a Cave infernal to be found joy of Soul? and where other Men do weep, there to be rejoicing? where other do shake and tremble, there strength and boldness to be plenty? Who will ever think, or who will believe this? in such a woful state such delectation? in a place so desolate, such society of good Men? in strait bands and cold irons, such rest to be had? All these things the sweet hand of the Lord (my sweet Brethren) doth minister unto me. Behold, he that was once far from me, now is present with me. Whom once scarce I could feel, now I see more apparently; whom once I saw afar off, now I behold near at hand; whom once I hungered for, the same now approacheth and reacheth his hand unto me. He doth comfort me, and heareth me up with gladness; he driveth away all bitterness, he miniseth strength and courage, he healeth me, refresheth, advanceth, and comforteth me. O how good is the Lord, which suffereth not his Servants to be tempted above their strength! O how easy and sweet is his Yoke! Is there any like unto the Highest, who receiveth the afflicted, healeth the wounded, and nourisheth them? Is there any like unto him? Learn ye, Welbeloved, how amiable the Lord is, how ruerk and merciful he is, which visiteth his Servants in temptations, neither disdaineth he to keep company with us in such vile and thinking Caves. Will the blind and incredulous World (think you) believe this? Or rather will it not say thus? No, thou wilt never be able to abide long the burning heat, the cold snow, and the pinching hardness of that place, the manifold miseries, and other grievances innumerable; the rebukes and frowning faces of Men how wilt thou suffer? Dost thou not consider and revolve in thy mind thy pleasant Country, the riches of the World, thy Kinsfolk, the delicate pleasures and honours of this Life? Dost thou forget the solace of thy Sciences, and fruit of all thy Labours? Wilt thou thus lose all thy labours which thou hast hitherto sustained? so many nights watched? thy painful travels, and all thy laudable enterprises, wherein thou hast been exercised continually even from thy childhood? Finally, fearest thou not death, which hangeth over thee, and that for no crime committed? O what a fool art thou, which for one word speaking mayest save all this, and wilt not? What a rude and unmannerly thing is this, not to be intreated at the instant petitions and desires of such, so many and so mighty, so just, so virtuous, so prudent and gracious Senators, and such noble Personages, &c.

But now to answer; Let this blind World hearken to this again, What heat can there be more burning, than that fire which is prepared for thee hereafter? And likewise what snow can be more cold than thy heart which is in darkness, and hath no light? What thing is more hard, and sharp, or crooked, than this present life which here we lead? What thing more odious and hateful than this World here present? and let these worldly Men here answer me; What Country can we have more sweet than the Heavenly Country above? What Treasures more rich or precious than everlasting life? And who be our Kinsmen, but they which hear the Word of God? where be greater Riches, or Dignities more honourable, than in Heaven? And as touching the Sciences, let this foolish World consider, be they not ordained to learn to know God? whom unless we do know, all our Labours, our night Watchings, our Studies, and all our Enterprises serve to no use or purpose, all is but labour lost. Furthermore, let the miserable worldly Man answer me; What remedy or safe refuge can there be unto him, if he lack God, who is the Life and Medicine of all Men? And how can he be fild to fly from death, when he himself is already dead in sin? If Christ be the Way, Verity, and Life, how can there be any life then without Christ? The foolish heat of the Prison to me is coldness; the cold Winter to me is a fiery spring-time in the Lord. He that feareth not to be burned in the fire, how will he fear the heat of the weather? or what careth he for the pinching frost, which burneth with the Love of the Lord? The place is sharp and tedious to them that be guilty, but to the innocent and guiltless it is mellifluous. Here dropeth the delectable Dew, here floweth the pleasant Nectar, here runneth the sweet Milk, here is plenty of all good things. And also the place it self be desert and barren, yet to me it seemeth a large walk, and a valley of pleasure; here to me is the better and more noble part of the World. Let the miserable worldling say and confess, if there be any Plot, Pasture, or Meadow, so delightful to the mind of Man, as here. Here I see Kings, Princes, Cities, and People; here I see Wars, where some be overthrown, some be Victors, some thrust down, some lifted up. Here is the Mount Sion, here I am already in Heaven it self. Here standeth first Christ Jesus in the Front. About him stand the old Fathers, Prophets, and Evangelists, Apostles, and all the Servants of God. Of whom some do embrace and cherish me, some exhort, some open the Sacraments unto me, some comfort me, others are singing about me. And how then shall I be thought to be alone, among so many and such as these be? the beholding of whom to me is both solace and example. Fore here I see some crucified, some slain, some stoned, some cut asunder, and some quartered, some roasted, some broiled, some put in hot Cauldrons, some having their Eyes bored through, some their Tongues cut out, some their Skin plucked over their Heads, some their Hands and Feet chop'd off, some put in Kilns and Furnaces, some cast down headlong and given to the Beasts and Fowls of the Air to feed upon; it would ask a long time if I should recite all.

To be short, divers I see, with divers and sundry torments excruciate: yet notwithstanding, all living, and all safe. One Plaster, one Salve cureth all their Wounds, which also gives to me strength and life, so that I sustain all these transitory anguishes and small afflictions, with a quiet mind, having a greater Hope laid up in Heaven. Neither do I fear mine Adversaries which here persecute me and oppress me: for he that dwelleth in Heaven shall laugh them to scorn, and the Lord shall deride them. I fear not thousands of People which compass me about. The Lord my God shall deliver me, my Hope, my Supporter, my Comforter, who exalteth up my head. He shall smite all them that stand up against me without cause, and shall dash the teeth and jaws of Sinners asunder: for he only is all blessedness and majesty. The rebukes for Christ's Cause makes us joyous: for so it is written, if ye be rebuked and scorned for the Name of Christ, happy be you; for the Glory and Spirit of God resteth upon you. 1 Pet. 4. Be you therefore certified, that our Rebukes which are laid upon us, redound to the shame and harm of the Rebukers. In this World there is no Mansion firm to me; and therefore I will travel up to the New Jerusalem which is in Heaven, and which offereth it self unto me without paying any fine or income. Behold, I have entred already in my Journey, where my House standeth for me prepared, and where I shall have Riches, Kindness, Delights, Honours never failing. As for these earthly things here present, they are transitory Shadows, vanishing Vapours, and ruinous Walls. Briefly, all is but very Vanity of Vanities, whereas Hope and the substance of Eternity to come are wanting; which the mercifull goodness of the Lord hath given as Companions to accompany me, and to comfort me, and now do the same begin to work and to bring forth Fruits in me. I have travelled hitherto, laboured and sweat early and late, watching day and night, and now my travels begin to come to effect. Days and hours have I bestowed upon my Studies. Behold, the true Countenance of God is sealed upon me, the Lord hath given mirth in my heart. And therefore in the same will I lay me down in peace and rest, Psal. 4. And who then shall dare to blame this our Age consumed, or say that our years be cut off? What Man can now cavil that these our Labours are lost, which have followed and found out the Lord and Maker of the World, and which have changed death with Life? My Portion is the Lord (saith my Soul) and therefore I will seek and wait for him. Now then, if to die in the Lord be not to die, but to live most joyfully, where is this wretched worldly Rebel, which blameth us of folly, for giving away our lives to death? O how delectable is this death to me, to taste the Lord's Cup, which is an assured pledge of true Salvation! for so hath the Lord himself forewarned us, saying; The same that they have done to me, they will also do unto you. Wherefore let the dolefull World with his blind Worldlings (who in the bright Sunshine yet go stumbling in darkness, being as blind as Beetles) cease thus unwilfully to carp against us for our rash suffering, as they count it. To whom thus we answer again with the Holy Apostle, That neither tribulation, nor anguish, nor hunger, nor nakedness, nor jeopardy, nor persecution, nor sword, shall be able ever to separate us from the love of Christ: we are slain all the day long, we are made like Sheep ordained to the Shambles, Rom. 8. Thus do we resemble Christ our Head, which said, That the Disciple cannot be above his Master, nor the Servant above his Lord. The same Lord hath also commanded, that every one shall take up his Cross and follow him, Luke 9. Rejoice, rejoice (my dear Brethren, and fellow Servants) and be of good comfort, when ye fall into sundry temptations. Let your Patience be perfect on all parts. For so it forewarned us before, and is written, That they which shall kill you, shall think to do God good service. Therefore Afflictions and Death be as Tokens and Sacraments of our Election and Life to come. Let us then be glad and sing unto the Lord, when as we, being clear from all just accusation, are persecuted and given to death. For better it is, that we in doing well do suffer, if it be the Will of the Lord, than doing evil, 1 Pet. 3. We have for our example Christ and the Prophets, which spake in the Name of the Lord, whom the Children of Iniquity did quell and murder. And now we bleis and magnify them that then suffered; Let us be glad and joyous in our innocency and uprightness. The Lord shall reward them that persecute us; let us refer all revengement to him.

I am accused of foolishness, for that I do not shrink from the true Doctrine and Knowledge of God, and do not rid my self out of these troubles, when with one word I may. O the blindness of Man, which seeth not the Sun-shining; neither remembereth the Lord's words.

Consider therefore what he saith, You are the Light of the World. A City built on a Hill cannot be hid; neither do Men light a Candle, and put it under a Bushel, but upon a Candlestick, that it may shine and give light to them in the house. And in another place he saith, You shall be led before Kings and Rulers; fear ye not them which kill the Body, but him which killeth both Body and Soul: whosoever shall confess me before Men, him will I also confess before my Father which is in Heaven. And he that denieth me before Men, him will I also deny before my Heavenly Father. Wherefore seeing the Words of the Lord be so plain, how, or by what authority will this wife Counsellor then approve this his counsel which he doth give? God forbid that I should relinquish the Commandments of God, and follow the Counsels of Men: for it is written; Blessed is the Man that hath not gone in the way of flatterers, and hath not stood in the counsels of the ungodly, and hath not fit in the chair of Pestilence, Psal. 1. God forbid that I should deny Christ, where I ought to confess him. I will not set more by my Life than by my Soul: neither will I exchange the Life to come, for this World here present. O how foolishly speaketh he which argueth me of foolishness!

Neither do I take it to be a thing so unconseil, or unseemly for me, not to obey in this matter the requests of those so honourable, just, prudent, veracious, and noble Senators, whose desire (he saith) were enough to command me: for so are we taught of the Apostle; That we ought to obey God before Men. After that we have served and done our duty unto God, then are we bound next to obey the Protectors of this World; whom I wish to be perfect before the Lord. They are honourable; but yet are they to be made more perfect in the Lord. They are just; but yet Christ, the Seat of Justice, lacking in them. They are wise; but where is in them the beginning of Wisdom; that is, the fear of the Lord? They are called Veracious, but yet I wish them more absolute in Christian Charity: they are good and gracious; but yet I miss in them the foundation of Goodness, which is the Lord God, in whom dwelleth all Goodness and Grace. They are honourable; yet have they not received the Lord of Glory, which is our Saviour, most honourable and glorious. Undersit you Kings, and learn you that judge the Earth. Serve the Lord in fear, and rejoice in him with trembling. Hearken to Doctrine, and get knowledge, lest you fall into God's displeasure, and so perish out of the way of Righteousness. What fret you, what fume you, O Gentiles? O you People, what call you in your brains the cogitations of vanity? you Kings of the Earth, and you Princes, why conspire you so together against Christ and against his Holy One? Psal. 2. How long will you seek after lies, and hate the truth? Turn you to the Lord, and harden not your hearts. For this you must needs confess, that they which persecute the Lord's Servants, do persecute the Lord himself. For so he saith himself; Whatsoever Men shall do to you, I will count it to be done not as unto you, but to my self.

And now let this carnal polittick Counsellor and Disputer of this World tell, wherein have they to blame me; if in my Examinations I have not answered so after their mind and affection as they required of me? Seeing it is not our selves that speak, but the Lord that speaketh in us; as he himself doth forewarn us, saying; When you shall be brought before Rulers and Magistrates, it is not you your selves that speak, but the Spirit of my Father that shall be in you, Mat. 10. Wherefore if the Lord be true and faithful of his Word, as it is most certain, then there is no blame in me: for he gave the words that I did speak; and who was I that could resist his Will? If any Man shall reprehend the things that I said, let him then quarrel with the Lord, whom I pleased to work so in me. And if the Lord be not to be blamed, neither am I therein to be accused, which did that I purposed not, and that I forethought not of. The things which there I did utter and express, if they were otherwise than well, let them shew it, and then will I say, that they were my words, and not the Lords. But if they were good and approved, and such as cannot justly be accused, then must it needs be granted, spite of their teeth, that they proceeded of the Lord, and then who be they that shall accuse me? A People of Prudence? or who shall condemn me? Just Judges?

And tho they do so, yet nevertheless the Word shall not be frustrate, neither shall the Gospel be foolish, or therefore decay; but rather the Kingdom of God shall the more prosper and flourish unto the Israelites, and shall pass the sooner unto the Elect of Christ Jesus: And they which shall so do, shall prove the grievous Judgment of God; neither shall they scape without punishment that be Persecutors and Murderers of the Just. My wellbeloved, lift up your Eyes, and consider the Counsels of God. He hewed unto us alate an Image of his Plague, which was to our correction: and if we shall not receive him, he will draw out his Sword, and strike with Sword, Pestilence, and Famine, the Nation that shall rise against Christ.

These have I written to your comfort, dear Brethren. Pray for me. I kiss in my heart, with an holy kiss, my good Masters, Sylvius, Pergula, Justus, also Fidel Roche, and him that beareth the name of Leila, whom I know, altho being absent. Item, The Governor of the University, Syndicus, and all other, whose Names be written in the Book of Life. Farewel all my fellow Servants of God; fare you well in the Lord, and pray for me continually.

12 Calend. August. Anno 1555.

It is written of one Theobrotus, That when he had read the Book of Plato, De Immortalitate Anima, he was so moved and persuaded therewith, that he cast himself headlong down from an high Wall, to be rid out of this present life. If those Heathen Philosophers, having no Word of God, nor promise of any Resurrection and Life to come, could so soon be persuaded, by reading the Works of Plato, to condemn this World and Life here present; how much more is it to be required in Christians, instructed with so many Evidences and Promises of God's most perfect Word, that they should learn to cast off the carnal desires and affections of this miserable peregrination? and that for a double respect, not only in seeing, reading, and understanding so many Examples of the miseries of this wretched World; but also much more in considering and pondering the heavenly Joys and Consolations of the other World remaining for us hereafter in the Life to come. For a more full evidence whereof, I thought good to give out this present Letter of Algerine above-prehixed, for a taste of the fame, and a lively Testimony for all true Christians to read and consider. Now let us proceed further (the Lord willing) in our Table of Italian Martyrs.

Persecut. Martyrs, and the Causes of their Martyrdom.

Joannes Aloysius, at Rome.
Anno 1559.

Of Joannes Aloysius, we find mention made in a Letter of Simon Florilus: which Aloysius was sent down from Geneva to the parts of Calabria, there to be their Minister; who afterward was sent for up to Rome, and there suffered. Ex Epist. D. Simonis Florili.

Jacobus Bovellus, at Messina.
Anno 1559.

Jacobus Bovellus was likewise sent from Geneva to the said parts of Calabria, with Aloysius; who also, being sent for up to Rome, was sent down to the City Messina, and there was martyred. Ibidem.

Divers that suffered in the Kingdom of Naples.
At Naples, Anno 1560.

After Pope Julius the third, came Marcellus the second. After him succeeded Pope Paul the fourth. This Paul being dead, followed Pope Pius the fourth; who, being advanced to that room, began hot persecution in all the Territories of the Church of Rome, against them which were suspected for Lutherans.

Whereupon ensued great trouble and persecution in the Kingdom of Naples, in such cruel sort, that many Noblemen, with their Wives and others, are reported there to be slain. Vide Pantal. lib. 11.

Eighty eight Martyrs in one day, with one butcherly Knife, slain like Sheep.

A hundred and sixty other also condemned.
At Calabria, Anno 1560.

In Calabria likewise the same time suffered a blessed number of Christ's wellbeloved Saints, both old and young, put together in one house, even 88 Persons; all which, one after another, were taken out of the House, and so being laid upon the Butchers Stall, like the Sheep in the Shambles, with one bloody Knife were all killed in order. A Spectacle most tragical for all Posterity to remember, and almost incredible to believe. Wherefore for the more credit of the matter, lest we should seem either light of credit, to believe that is not true, or rashly to commit to Pen things without due proof and authority; we have here annexed a piece of an Epistle written by Mr. Simon Florilus, preacher of God's Word at the City Clavenna, among the Rhetians, unto a certain Friend of his named Gualtelmus Gratalorus, an Italian, and Doctor of Physick in the University of Basil. Which Gratalorus translated the same into the Latin Tongue, and it is to be found in the 11th Book of Pantal, pag. 337. the English whereof is this as followeth.

The end of a certain Letter of Mr. Simon Florellius, written in Italian, concerning a lamentable slaughter of eighty eight Christian Saints in the parts of Calabria.

As concerning News I have nothing to write, but only that I send you a Copy of certain Letters, imprinted either at Rome or at Venice, concerning the martyrdom or persecution in two several Towns of Calabria, eight Italian miles from the borders of Consentia, the one called St. Sixtus, within two miles of Montalte, under the Seigniorie of the Duke of Montalte; the other called Guardia, situate upon the Sea-Coast, and twelve miles from St. Sixtus: the which two Towns are utterly destroyed, and eight hundred of the Inhabitants there, or (as some write from the City of Rome) no less than a full thousand. He that wrote the Letter, was Servant to Afcianus Carracciolus. The Country and People there I well knew to take the first original of their good Doctrine and honest Life from the Waldenses. For before my departure from Geneva, at their request, I sent them two Schoolmasters, and two Preachers. The last year the two Preachers were martyred, the one at Rome, named Joannes Aloisius Pafcalis, a Citizen of Cunium; the other at Messina, named James Bovell, both of Piedmont: This year the residue of that godly Fellowship were martyred in the same place. I trust this good Seed sown in Italy, will bring forth good and plentiful Fruit.

Now followeth the Copy of the Letters sent from Montalte, a Town in Calabria, eight miles distant from Consentia, bearing date the 11th of June, 1560. The Writer of which Letters, as ye may perceive, was one of them which call themselves Catholic, and followers of the Pope. The words of the Letter be these, as hereunder followeth.

Here followeth the Copy of a Letter sent from Montalte in Calabria, by a Romanist, to a certain Friend of his in Rome, containing news of the persecution of Christ's People in Calabria, by the new Pope Pius the Fourth.

Horrible persecution in Calabria,
An. 1560.

The Christians killed like Calves.
83 Martyrs.

Hitherto, most noble Lord, I have certified you, what here daily hath been done about these Hereticks. Now cometh next to signify unto your Lordship the horrible judgment begun this present day, being the eleventh of June, to be executed very early in the morning against the Lutherans: Which when I think upon, I verily quake and tremble. And truly the manner of their putting to death, was to be compared to the slaughter of Calves and Sheep. For they being all thrust up in one house together, as in a Sheep-fold, the Executioner cometh in, and amongst them taketh one and blindfoldeth him with a Musfler about his eyes, and so leadeth him forth to a larger place near adjoining, where he commandeth him to kneel down; which being so done, he cutteth his Throat, and leaving him half dead, and taking his Butchers Knife and Musfler all of goat Blood, (which the Italians call Benda) cometh again to the rest, and so leading one after another, he dispatcheth them all, which were to the number of eighty eight. This Spectacle to behold how dolorful and horrible is war, I leave to your Lordship's Judgment: For to write of it, I my self cannot chuse but weep. Neither was there any of the beholders there present, which seeing one to die, could abide to behold the death of another. But certes so humbly and patiently they went to death, as it almost incredible to believe. Some of them, as they were in dying, affirmed, that they believed even as we do. Notwithstanding, the most part of them died in the same their obstinate Opinions. All the aged Persons went to death more cheerfully; the younger were more timorous. I tremble and shake even to remember how the Executioner bled his bloody Knife between his teeth, with the bloody Musfler in his hand, and his arms all in goat blood up to the elbows, going to the Fold, and taking every one of them, one after another, by the bands, and so dispatching them all, no otherwise than doth a Butcher kill his Calves and Sheep.

It is moreover appointed (and the Carts be come already) that all those so put to death should be quartered, and so be conveyed in the Carts to the hiddest parts of Calabria, where they shall be hanged upon Poles in the high ways and other places, even to the confines of the same Country. Unto the Pope's Holiness and the Lord Viceroy of Naples shall give in commandment to the Lord Marquis of Buccianus, Governor of the said Province, to stay his hand, and go no further, he will proceed with the Rack and Torture, examining all other, and so increase the number in such sort, that he will nigh dispatch them all.

This day it is also determined, that an hundred of the more ancient Women should appear to be examined and racked, and after to be put to death, that the mixture may be perfect, for so many Men so many Women. And thus have you that I can say of this Justice. Now is it about two of the clock in the afternoon: shortly, we shall hear what some of them said when they went to execution. There be certain of them so obstinate, that they will not look upon the Crucifix, nor be confessed to the Priest, and they shall be burned alive.

The Hereticks that be apprehended and condemned, are to the number of 1600, but as yet so more but these aforesaid 88, are already executed. This People have their original of the Valley named Angrogna, near to Saubadia, and in Calabria are called Ultramontani. In the Kingdom of Naples, there are four other places of the same people, of whom whether they live well or no, as yet we know not; for they are but simple people, ignorant without learning, Wood-gatherers, and Eliasbandmen: but as I hear, much devout and religious, giving themselves to die for Religion's sake. From Montalto the 11th of June. And thus much writeth this Romanist.

Here moreover is to be noted, that the foresaid Marquis Buccianus above specified, had a Son or Brother, unto whom the said new Pope (Pius the fourth belike) is reported to have promised a Cardinalship at Rome, if all the Lutherans were extirpated and rooted out in that Province. And like enough that the same was the cause of his butcherly persecution and effusion of Christian Blood, in the said Country of Calabria, beyond Naples, in Italy.

Besides those godly Italian Martyrs in this Table above contained, many other also have suffered in the same Country of Italy, of whom some before have been specified, some peradventure omitted. But many more there be whose names we know not; whereof as soon as knowledge may be given unto us, we purpose God willing to impart the same, loving Reader, unto thee.

Now in the mean time it followeth (according to my promise made before) next after this lamentable slaughter of Calabria, here to insert also the tragical Persecution, and horrible Murder of the faithful Flock of Christ, inhabiting in Merindol in France, and in the Towns adjacent near unto the same, in the time of Francis the first, the French King. The furious cruelty of which miserable Persecution, altho it cannot be set forth too much at large, yet because we will not weary too much the Reader with the full length thereof, we have so contracted the same, especially the principal effect thereof we have comprehended in such sort, that as we on the one part have avoided prolixity, so on the other, we have omitted nothing which might seem unworthy to be forgot. The story here followeth.

A notable History of the Persecution and Destruction of the People of Merindol and Cabriets in the Country of Provence: where not a few Persons, but whole Villages and Townships, with the most part of all the foresaid Country, both Men, Women, and Children, were put to all kind of Cruelty, and suffered Martyrdom for the Profession of the Gospel.

They that write of the beginning of this People, say, That about two hundred years ago, they came out of the Country of Piedmont to inhabit in Provence, in certain Villages destroyed by Wars, and other desert places: wherein they used such labour and diligence, that they had abundance of Corn, Wine, Oils, Honey, Almonds, with other Fruits and Commodities of the Earth, and much Cattel. Before they came thither, Merindol was a barren Desert, and not inhabited. But these good People (in whom God always had reserved some little Seed of Piety) being dispersed and separated from the society of Men, were compelled to dwell with Beasts, in that waste and wild Desert, which notwithstanding, through the Blessing of God, and their great labour and travel, became exceeding fruitful. Notwithstanding, the World in the mean time so detested and abhorred them, and with all shameful rebukes and contumelies, railed against them in such despicable manner, that it seemed they were not worthy that the Earth should bear them. For they of a long continuance and custom had refused the Bishop of Rome's Authority, and observed ever a more perfect kind of Doctrine than others, delivered unto them from the Father to the Son, ever since the year of our Lord 1260.

For this cause they were often accused and complained of to the King, as contempters and despisers of the Magistrates, and Rebels. Wherefore they were called by divers names, according to the Countries and Places where they dwelt. For in the Country about Lions, they were called the poor People of Lions; in the borders of Sarmatia, and Livonia, and other Countries toward the North, they were called Lollards; in Flanders and Artois, Tourleupsins, of a Desert where Wolves did haunt. In Dolphins, with great despite, they were called Chagnards, because they lived in places open to the Sun, and without house or harbour. But most commonly they were called Waldays, of Wald, who first instructed them in the Word of God which name continued until the name of Lutherans came up, which above all other was most hated and abhorred.

Notwithstanding in all these most spiteful contumelies and slanders, the People dwelling at the foot of the Alps, and also in Merindol and Cabriets, and the quarters thereof always lived so godly, so uprightly, and justly, that in all their Life and Conversation, there appeared to be in them a great fear of God. That little light of true knowledge which God had given them, they laboured by all means to kindle and encrease daily more and more, sparing no charges, whether it were to procure Books of the holy Scriptures, or to instruct such as were of the best and most towardsly wits in learning and godliness or else to send them into other Countries, yea even to the farthest parts of the Earth, where they had heard that any light of the Gospel began to shine.

For in the year 1530, understanding that the Gospel was preached in certain Towns of Germany and Switzerland, they sent thither two learned Men, that is, Georgius Maurelius born in Dolpina, a godly Preacher of their own, and whom they had of their own charges brought up in learning, and Petrus Latomus a Burgundian, to confer with the wife and learned Ministers of the Churches there, in the Doctrine of the Gospel, and to know the whole form and manner which those Churches used in the service and worshipping of God: and particularly to have their advice also upon certain Points which they were not resolved in.

Their two, after great conference had with the chiefest in the Church of God, namely with Oecolampadius at Basel; at Strasbourg, with Bucer and Capito; and at Bern, with Bartholomaeus Hallerus, as they were returning thorough Burgundy homeward, Petrus Latomus was taken at Dyon, and cast into Prison: Maurelius escaped, and returned alone to Merindol, with the Books and Letters which he brought with him from the Churches of Germany; and declared to his Brethren all the Points of his Commission, and opened unto them, how many and great Errors they were in, into the which their old Ministers, whom they called *Barbers (that is to say, Uncles) had brought them, leading them from the right way of true Religion.

When the People heard this, they were moved with such a zeal to have their Churches reformed, that they sent for the most ancient Brethren, and the chiefest in knowledge and experience of all Calabria and Apulia, to consult with them touching the Reformation of the Church. This matter was so humbled, that it stirred up the Bishops, Priests, and Monks in all Provinces, with great rage against them. Amongst others, there was one cruel Wretch called Jo. de Roma a Monk, who obtaining a Commission to examine those that were suspected to be of the Waldos or Lutheran Profession, forthwith ceased not to afflict the Faithful with all kind of Cruelty that he could devise or imagine. Amongst other most horrible torments, this was one which he most delighted in, and most commonly practised; he filled Boots with boiling Grease, and put them upon their Legs, tying them backward to a Form, with their Legs hanging down over a small fire, and so he examined them. Thus he tormented very many, and in the end most cruelly put them to death.

The first whom he thus tormented, were Michelotus Serra and W. Malus, and a number more.

Wherefore Francis the French King, being informed of the strange and outrageous cruelty of this Hellish Monk, sent Letters to the High Court of Parliament of Provence, that forthwith he should be apprehended, and by form of Process, and order of Law, he should be condemned, and advertisement sent unto him with all speed of his Condemnation. The Monk being advertised hereof by his Friends, conveyed himself to Avignon, where he thought to enjoy the Spoilings, which he, like a notorious Thief, had gotten by fraud and extortion from the poor Christians. But shortly after, he which had so shamefully spoiled others, was spoiled of all together by his own household Servants. Whereupon shortly after he fell sick of a most horrible Ulcer, strange and unknown to any Physician. So extreme were the pains and torments wherewith he was continually vexed in all his Body, that no Ointment, no Fomentation, nor any thing else could ease him one minute of an hour. Neither was there any Man that could carry near about him, nor yet would any one of his own Friends come near to him, so great was the stench that came from him. For the which cause he was carried from the Jacobines to an Hospital, there to be kept. But the stench and infection so increased, that no Man there durst come near him: no, nor he himself was able to abide the loathsome stench that issued from his Body, full of Ulcers and Sores, and swarming with Vermin, and so rotten, that the flesh fell away from the bones by peacemeal.

Whiles he was in these torments and anguish, he cried out oftentimes in great rage; Oh who will deliver me? who will I have rid me out of these intolerable pains, which I know I suffer for the Evils & Oppressions that I have done to the poor Men? And he himself went about divers times to deliver himself, but he had not the power. In these horrible torments and anguish, and fearful despair, this Blasphemer and most cruel Homicide most miserably ended his unhappy days and cursed life, as a spectacle to all Persecutors, receiving a just reward of his cruelty by the just judgment of God. When he was dead, there was no Man that would come near him to bury him: but a young Novice newly come to his Order, instead of a more honourable Sepulture, caught hold with a Hook upon his stinking Carion, and drew him into a hole hard by which was made for him.

After the death of this cruel Monster, the Bishop of Aix, by his Official Perones, continued the Persecution, and put a great multitude of them in Prison: of whom some by force of torments revolted from the Truth; the others which continued constant, after he had condemned them of Heresy, were put into the hands of the ordinary Judge, which at that time was one Mairanus, a notable cruel Persecutor, who without any form of Process, or order of Law, such as the Official had pronounced to be Heretics, he put to death with most cruel torments; but shortly after he received a just reward of his cruelty in like manner.

After the death of the good President Cassianus, the Lord of Revest, being chief President of the Parliament of Aix, put many of the Faithful to death. Who afterward, being put out of his Office, returned to his House of Revest, where he was stricken with such a horrible sickness, that, for the fury and madness which he was in, his Wife, or any that were about him, durst not come near him; and so he, dying in his fury and rage, was justly plagued for his unmerciful and cruel dealing.

After him succeeded Barthol. Cassaneus, likewise a pious Persecutor, whom God at length struck with a fearful and sudden Death. In the time of this Tyrant, those put many of the Faithful to death. Who afterward, being put out of his Office, returned to his House of Revest, where he was stricken with such a horrible sickness, that, for the fury and madness which he was in, his Wife, or any that were about him, durst not come near him; and so he, dying in his fury and rage, was justly plagued for his unmerciful and cruel dealing.

This bloody Arrest or Decree seemed so strange and wonderful, that in every place throughout all Provence there was great reasoning and disputation concerning the same, especially among the Advocates and Men of learning and understanding: innumerable that many durst boldly and openly say, that they greatly marvelled how that Court of Parliament could be so mad, or so bewitched, to give out such an Arrest, so manifestly injurious and unjust, and contrary to all right and reason, yea to all sense of humanity; also contrary to the solemn Oath which all such as are received to Office in Courts of Parliament, are accustomed to make, that is to say, to judge justly and uprightly, according to the Law of God, and the just Ordinances and Laws of the Realm, so that God thereby might be honoured, and every Man's right regarded, without respect of Persons.

Some of the Advocates or Lawyers, defending the said Arrest to be just and right, said, That in case of Lutheranism, the Judges are not bound to observe either Right or Reason, Law or Ordinance; and that the Judges cannot fail or do amiss, whatsoever judgment they do give, so that it tend to the ruin and extirpation of all such as are suspected to be Lutherans.

To this the other Lawyers and learned Men answered, That upon their sayings it would ensue, that the Judges should now altogether follow the same manner and form in proceeding against the Christians accused to be Lutherans, which the Gospel witnesseth that the Priests, Scribes, and Pharisees followed in pursuing and persecuting, and finally condemning our Lord Jesus Christ.

By these and such other-like talks, the said Arrest was published throughout the Country, and there was no Assembly or Banquet where it was not disputed or talked of; and namely, within twelve days after the Arrest was given out, there was a great Banquet in the Town of Aix; at which Banquet was present M. Bartholomaeus Chassaneus, President, President, and many other Councellers and other noble Personages and Men of Authority. There was also the Archbishop of Arles, and the Bishop of Aix, with divers Ladies and Gentlemen, amongst whom was one which was commonly reported to be the Bishop of Aix his Concubine. They were scarce well fate at the Table, but the began thus to talk; My L. President, will you not execute the Arrest which is given out of late against the Lutherans of Merindol? The President answered nothing, feigning that he heard her not. Then a certain Gentleman asked of her What Arrest that was? She recited it in manner and form as it was given out, forgetting nothing, as if he had a long time studied to commit the same to memory. Whereunto they which were at the Banquet gave diligent care, without any word speaking, until she had ended her Tale.

Then the Lord Alene, a Man fearing God, and of great understanding, said unto her; Gentlewoman, you have learned this Tale either of some who would have it so, or else it is given out by some Parliament of Women. Then the Lord of Senar, an ancient Counceller, said unto him; No, no, my Lord of Alene, it is no Tale which you have heard this Gentlewoman tell; for it is an Arrest given out by a whole Senate; and you ought not thus to speak, except you would call the Court of Province a Parliament of Women. Then the Lord of Alene began to excite himself with Protestation, that he would not speak any thing to blemish the Authority of that Sovereign Court; notwithstanding he could not believe all that which the said Gentlewoman had told, that is to say, that all the Inhabitants of Merindol were condemned to die by the Arrest of the said Court of Parliament of Province, and especially the Women, and little Children, and Infants; and the Town to be rated for the fault of ten or twelve Persons which did not appear before the said Court at the day appointed. And the Lord Beavieu also answered, that he believed not the said Court to have given out any such Arrest; for that (said he) were a thing most unreasonable, and such as the very Turks, and the greatest Tyrants in the World would judge to be a thing most detestable; and said further, that he had known a long time many of Merindol which seemed unto him to be Men of great honesty: and my Lord President (said he) can certifie us well what is done in this matter, for we ought not to give credit unto Womens Tales. Then the Gentlewoman which had rehearsed the Arrest, stayed not to hear the President's Answer, but suddenly looking upon the Bishop of Aix, said, I should greatly have marvelled, if there had been none in all this Company which would defend these wicked Men. And lifting up her Eyes to Heaven, in a great womanly chafe and fume, said, Would to God that all the Lutherans which are in Province, yea, and in all France, had Horns growing on their Foreheads, then we should see a goodly many of Horns.

To whom the Lord Beavieu suddenly answered, saying, Would to God all Priests Harlots should chatter like Pies. Then said the Gentlewoman, Ah, my Lord Beavieu, you ought not so to speak against our holy Mother the Church, for that there was never Dog that barked against the Crucifix, but he waxed mad. Whereat the Bishop of Aix laughed, and clapping the Gentlewoman on the shoulder, said, By my holy Orders, my Minion, well said, I can you thank. She hath talked well unto you, my L. Beavieu, remember well the Lesson which the hath given you. Here the L. Beavieu being wholly moved with anger, said, I care neither for her School nor yours, for it would be long before a Man should learn of either of you both any Honesty or Honour. For if I should say, that the most part of the Bishops and Priests are abominable Adulterers, blind Idolaters, Deceivers, Thieves, Seducers, I should not speak against the holy Church, but against an heap and flock of Wolves, Dogs, and filthy Swine: In speaking these things I should think a Man not to be mad at all, except he be mad for speaking of the truth.

Then the Archbishop in a great fury answered, My L. Beavieu, you speak very evil, and you must give account, when time and place serveth, of this your talk which you have here uttered against the Church-men. I would, said the L. Beavieu, that it were to do even this present day, and I would bind my self to prove more Abuses and Naughtiness in Priests than I have yet spoken. Then said the President Chassane, My L. Beavieu, let us leave off this talk, and live as our Fathers have done, and maintain their Honour. Then said he in great anger, I am no Priest's Son to maintain their Wickedness and Abuse. And afterward he said, I am well content to honour all true Pastors of the Church, and will not blame them which shew good Example in their Doctrine and living: but I demand of you, my Lord, of Arles, and you my L. of Aix, when as our Lord Christ Jesus called the Priests, deceiving Hypocrites, blind Seducers, Robbers and Thieves, did he them any outrage or wrong? and they answered, no; for the most part of them were such Men. Then said the Lord Beavieu, even so it is with the Bishops and Priests which I have spoken of, for they are such kind of Men, or rather worse; and I so abhor their filthy and abominable life, that I dare not speak the one half of that which I know, and therefore in speaking the truth, to cool the babbling of an Harlot, I do them no Injury.

Then Monsieur de Senar, an ancient Counceller, said, Let us leave off this contentious talk, for we are here assembled and come together to make good Cheer. And afterward he said, Monsieur de Beavieu, for the Love and Amity which I do bear unto you, I will advertise you of three things, which, if you will do, you shall find great ease therein.

The first is, That you neither by Word nor Deed aid or assist those which you hear to be Lutherans.

Secondly, That you do not intermeddle openly to reprove Ladies and Gentlewomen for their pastime and pleasure.

Thidly, That you do never speak against the life and living of Priests, how wicked soever it be, according to this saying, Do not touch mine Anointed.

To whom Monsieur de Beavieu answered, As touching the first Point, I know no Lutherans, neither what is meant by this Word Lutheranism, except you do call them Lutherans, which profess the Doctrine of the Gospel. Neither yet will I ever allow any Arrest which shall be given out to death against Men, whose cause hath not been heard, especially against Women and young Infants: and I am assured, that there is no Court of Parliament in all France, which will approve or allow any such Arrest. And whereas you say, that I should not meddle to reprove Ladies and Gentlewomen, if I knew any Kindwoman of mine, which would abandon her self unto a Priest or Clerk, yea, albeit he were a Cardinal or Bishop, I would not do her so much honour as to rebuke her therefore, but at the least I would cut off her Nose. And as touching Priests, as I am contented not to meddle with their Evilness, to likewise I will not that they meddle with mine hereafter, or come thenceforth within mine house. For as many as I shall find or take there, I will set their Crowns so near their shoulders, that they shall need no more to wear any Hoods about their Necks; the like also said the President Chassane.

Then the Bishop of Aix his Sweet-heart, which had begun the Quarrel, said, I shall not be in quiet, except I speak yet one word more unto Monsieur de Beavieu. Do you think, said she unto him, that all the Cardinals, Bishops, Abbats, Priests, and all those holy religious Men, which go oftentimes to Gentlemen's houses, and haunt the Castles and Palaces of Princes and Noble Men, go thither to commit Wickedness? Also you must not think evil of all those Ladies and Gentlewomen that go to Bishops houses of Devotion, and to reveal those whom they know to be Lutherans, as it was commanded in the Pulpit upon pain of Excommunication: if so be you will maintain these words, I will not cease to accuse you of crime, and also of Treason both to God and Man: for here be those in this Company, which shall make you give an account thereof. She had not so soon ended her talk, but Monsieur de Beavieu said unto her, Advance, O Heretic, thou filthy and impudent Harlot! is it thy part to open thy Mouth to talk in this Company? Dost thou well understand and know what Treason to God and Man meaneth? Is it not sufficient for thee to be as thou art; but thou must sollicite other to shed innocent Blood? With these Words the Gentlewoman was somewhat amazed. All Men had thought that this talk had been at an end; and every Man began to invent some merry Communication, that the former matter should be no more talked of.

At the last, the Gentlewoman advising her self, and thinking that she was too much injured, in that it was said,

The Pope's Churchmen work man the old Priests.

Churchmen, be they never so evil, must not be spoken against. Par. 14.

How Priests Harlots should be handled.

Well spoken, and like an Harlot.

As Heretics wrong the death of John Baptist, for this Strumpet feels the death of the Merindolians. Two Strumpets well compassed together.

that went about to shed innocent Blood, the brake off all their talk, and with a loud voice said, Monsieur Beavie, if I were a Man as I am a Woman, I would offer you the Combate, to prove that I am no such manner of Woman as you say I am, that I desire to shed innocent Blood. Do you call the Blood of these wicked Men of Merindol, innocent Blood? True it is, that I desire and offer with my whole power, that these naughty packs of Merindol, and such like as they are, should be slain and destroyed, from the greatest even unto the least. And to see the beginning of this work, I have employed all my credit, and all my Friends, and do spare neither Body nor Goods to work the Ruin and Destruction of these People, and to save out and to detain their memory from amongst Men. Do you then, Montieur Beavie, call the slaughter of these Lutherans, the effusion of innocent Blood? And say you what you will, I will not refrain for any man living, to go either by day or by night unto the Houses of Bishops, in all (a) honesty and honour, for the Devotion which I bear unto our holy (b) Mother the Church, and also I will receive into my house all religious Men, to consult and devise the means how to put these Lutherans to death. But as Monsieur Beavie took no more regard unto her talk, so likewise all that were at the Table dispraised her, and were weary of her prating.

Then there was a certain young Gentleman, which merrily jesting, said unto her, Gentlewoman, it must needs be that these poor People, unto whom you do with this cruel death, have done you some great displeasure. Then said she, I may well take an Oath, that I never knew one of these wretched People, neither (that I wot of) ever saw any of them. And I had rather to meet ten Devils than one of those naughty Knaves: for their Opinions are so detestable, that happy and blessed are they that never heard tell of them. And I was not then well advised at what time by Curiosity, I seeing the Bishop of Aix so much troubled and angry, that he could not eat nor drink, did desire him and constrain him to tell me the cause thereof. Then he perceiving that I would not be well contented if he should not tell me, declared unto me some part of the Cause, that is to say, that there were certain Heretics, which spake against our holy Mother the Church, and among other errors, they maintained even to death, that all Bishops, Priests and Pastors ought to be married, or else they should be gelded: and hearing this I was marvelously offended, and ever since I did hate them to the death. And also it was injoined unto me by Penance, that I should endeavour with all my power to put these Heretics to death. After these frivolous talks, there was great trouble and debate amongst them, and many threatenings, which were too long here to describe.

Then the President Cassane, and the Councillors parted aside, and the Gentlemen went on the other part. The Archbishop of Arles, the Bishop of Aix, and divers Abbots, Priests, and others, assembled themselves together, to consult how this Arrest might be executed with all speed, intending to raise a new Persecution, greater than that of John the Jacobin Monk of Rome: for otherwise (said they) our State and Honour is like to decay: We shall be reproved, contemned, and derided of all Men. And if none should thus want and set themselves against us, but these Peasants, and such like, it were but a small matter; but many Doctors of Divinity, and Men of the religious Order, divers Senators and Advocates, many wife and well learned Men, also a great part of the Nobility (if we may so say) and that of great Renown, yea, even of the chiefest Peers in all Europe, begin to condemn and despise us, counting us to be no true Pastors of the Church; so that except we see to this mischief, and provide for Remedy betime, it is greatly to be feared, left not only we shall be compelled to forsake our Dignities, Possessions, and Livings, which we now wealthily enjoy, but also the Church being spoiled of her Pastors and Guides, shall hereafter come to miserable Ruin, and utter Desolation. This matter therefore now requireth great Diligence and Circumspection, and that with all celerity.

Then the Archbishop of Arles, not forgetting his Spanish Subtleties and Policies, gave his Advice as followeth. Again the Nobility (said he) we must take heed that we attempt nothing rashly, but rather we must seek all the means we can how to please them; for they are our shield, our fortress and defence. And albeit we know that many of them do both speak and think evil of us, and that they are of these new Gospellers, yet may we not reprove them, or exasperate them in any case: but seeing they are too much bent against us already, we must rather seek how to win them, and to make them our Friends again by gifts and Presents: and by this Policy we shall live in safety under their Protection. But if we enterprize any thing against them, sure we are to gain nothing thereby, as we are by experience already sufficiently taught.

It is well said (said the Bishop of Aix) but I can shew you a good Remedy for this Disease: we must go about with all our endeavour and power, and policy, and all the Friends we can make, sparing no Charges, but spending Goods, Wealth and Treasure, to make such a slaughter of the Merindolians and rustical Peasants, that none shall be so bold hereafter, whatsoever they be, yea, altho they be of the Blood Royal, once to open their Mouths against us, or the Ecclesiastical State. And to bring this matter to pass, we have no better way than to withdraw our selves to Avinion, in the which City we shall find many Bishops, Abbots, and other famous Men, which will with us employ their whole endeavour to maintain and uphold the Majesty of our holy Mother the Church. This Council was well liked of them all. Whereupon the said Archbishop of Arles and the Bishop of Aix went with all speed to Avinion, there to assemble out of hand the Bishops, and other Men of Authority and Credit, to intreat of this matter. In this pestilent Conspiracy, the Bishop of Aix, a stout Champion, and a great Defender of the Traditions of Men, taking upon him to be the chief Orator, began in a manner as followeth:

O Ye Fathers and Brethren, ye are not ignorant, that a great Tempest is raised up against the little Bark of Christ Jesus, now in great danger, and ready to perish. The Storm cometh from the North, whereof all these troubles proceed. The Seas rage, the Waters rush in on every side, the Winds blow and beat upon our Houles, and we without speedy Remedy are like to sink in Shipwrack and loss of all together. For Oblations cease, Pilgrimage and Devotion waxeth cold, Charity is clean gone, our Estimation and Authority is debased, our Jurisdiction decayed, and the Ordinances of the Church despised. And wherefore are we set and ordained over Nations and Kingdoms, but to root out and destroy, to subvert and overthrow whatsoever is against our holy Mother the Church? Wherefore let us now awake, let us stand stoutly in the right of our own Possession, that we may root out from the memory of men for ever, the whole Root of the wicked Lutherans: Those Foxes (I say) which destroy the Vineyard of the Lord; those great Whales which go about to drown the little Bark of the Son of God. We have already well begun, and have procured a terrible Arrest against these cursed Heretics of Merindol: now then resteth no more, but only the same to be put in Execution. Let us therefore employ our whole endeavour, that nothing happen which may let or hinder that which we have so happily begun; and let us take good heed that our Gold and Silver do not witness against us at the day of Judgment, if we refuse to bestow the same, that we may make so good a Sacrifice unto God. And for my part I offer to wage and furnish of mine own Costs and Charges, an hundred Men well horrid, with all other Furniture to them belonging, and that so long, until (the utter Destruction and Subversion of these wretched and cursed Catibis be fully performed and finished.

This Oration pleased the whole multitude, saving one Doctor of Divinity, a Prier Jacobin, named Bassinet, who then answered again with this Oration.

This is a weighty matter (said he) and of great importance; we must therefore proceed wisely, and in the fear of God, and beware that we do nothing rashly. For if we seek the death and destruction of these poor and miserable People wrongfully, when the King and the Nobility shall hear of such an horrible slaughter, we shall be in great danger, lest they do to us as we read in the Scriptures was done to the Bishops of Basil. For my part I must of Bullfinch.The Telli-

' must say, and unfeignedly confess, that I have too rashly
' and lightly signed many Procefles against those which have ' been accused of heretical Doctrine: but now I do protest
' before God which seeth and knoweth the Hearts of Men,
' that, seeing the lamentable end and effect of mine Af-
' firmments, I have had no quietness in my Conscience,
' considering that the secular Judges, at the Report of the ' Judgment and Sentence given by me and other Doctors
' my Companions, have condemned all those unto most ' cruel death, whom we have adjudged to be Hereticks. And
' the cause why in Conscience I am thus disquieted, is this:
' that now of late, since I have given my self more diligent' ly to the reading and contemplation of the holy Scriptures,
' I have perceived that the most part of those Articles, which ' they that are called Lutherans do maintain, are so comfort' able and agreeing to the Scriptures, that for my part I ' can no longer gainstay them, except I should even wilfully
' and maliciously resist and strive against the holy Ordina-
' ments of God. Albeit hitherto to maintain the honour of ' our holy Mother the Church, and of our holy Father the ' Pope, and of our Orders, I have consented to the Op-
' nions and doings of other Doctors, as well through igno' rance, as also because I would not seem to attempt any ' thing against the Will and Pleasure of the Prelates and ' Vicars general. Yet now it seemeth unto me, that we ' ought not any more to proceed in this matter as we have ' done in time past. It shall be sufficient to punish them ' with Fines, or to banish them, which shall speak too in-' temperately and rashly against the Constitutions of the ' Church, and of the Pope. And such as shall be plainly ' convicted by the holy Scripture to be blasphemous or ' obstinate Hereticks, to be condemned to death according ' to the enormity of their Crimes or Errors, or else to ' perpetual Prison. And thus my Advice and Counsel I de' clare you to take in good part.

With this Counsel of Bassinet all the Company was offended, but especially the Bishop of Aix, who, lifting up his voice above all the rest, said thus unto him; O thou Man of little Faith! whereof art thou in doubt? Dost thou repent thee of that thou hast well done? Thou hast told here a Tale that smelleth of Fagots and Brimstone. Is there any difference (thinkest thou) between Heresies and Blafphemies spoken and maintained against the holy Scriptures, and Opinions holden against our holy Mother the Church, and contrary to our holy Father the Pope, a most undoubted and true God on Earth? Art thou a Master in Israhel, and knowest thou not these things? Then said the Bishop of Aix, Could any Man intreat better of the little Bark of Christ Jesus, than my Lord of Aix hath done? Then stood up Bassinet again, and made this Oration.

' T is true that my Lord the Bishop of Aix hath very well
' set out the manners and state of the Clergy, and hath ' aptly reproved the Vices and Heresies of this present time,
' and therefore so soon as mention was made of the Ship
' of Christ Jesus, it came into my mind first of all of the ' high Bishop of Jerusalem, the Priests, the Doctors of the ' Law, the Scribes and Pharisees, which sometimes had the ' governance of this Ship, being ordained Pastors in the ' Church of God: But when they forsook the Law of God,
' and served him with Men's Inventions and Traditions, he ' destroyed those Hypocrites in his great Indignation;
' and having compassion and pity upon the People which ' were like Sheep without a Shepherd, he sent diligent Fish' ers to fish for Men, faithful Workmen into his Harvest, and ' Labouers into his Vineyard, which shall all bring forth
' true Fruits in their season. Secondly, considering the ' purpose and intent of the Reverend Lord Bishop of Aix,
' I called to mind the saying of the Apostle in his first Epistle
' and fourth Chapter unto Timothy, That in the latter days
' some shall fall away from the Faith, following after de' ceitful Spirits, and the Doctrine of Devils. And the ' Apostle giveth a Mark whereby a Man shall know them.
' Likewise our Lord Jesus Christ, in the seventh Chapter of ' Matthew, saith, That the false Prophets shall come clothed
' in Sheep-skins, but inwardly they are ravening Wolves, and ' by their Fruits they shall be known. By these two, and ' divers such other places, it is easie to understand, who are
' they that go about to drown this little Bark of Christ.
' And they not those which fill the same with filthy and un' clean things, with mire and dirt, with puddle and sink' ing Water? Are they not those which have forsaken Jesus ' Christ, the Fountain of living Water, and have digged

' unto themselves Pits or Cisterns which will hold no Wa' ter? Truly even those they are which vaunt themselves ' to be the Salt of Earth, and yet have no favour at all,
' which call themselves Pastors, and yet are nothing less ' than true Pastors, for they minister not unto the Sheep the ' true pasture and feeding, neither divide and distribute the ' true Bread of the Word of Life. And (if I may be bold ' to speak it) would it not be at this present as great a ' Wonder to hear a Bishop preach, as to see an Ass fly? Are ' not they accused of God which glory and avaunt them' selves to have the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, and ' neither enter in themselves, nor suffer them that would ' enter, to come in? They may be known right well by ' their Fruits; for they have forsaken Faith, Judgment, and ' Mercy, and there is no honesty, clean, or undefiled thing in ' them, but their Habit, their Rochet, and their Surplice,
' and such other. Outwardly they are exceeding neat and ' trim, but within they are full of all Abomination, Rapine,
' Gluttony, filthy Lust, and all manner of Uncleannesse;
' they are like painted Sepulchres, which outwardly appear ' beautiful and fair, but within they are full of Filth and ' Corruption. A Man shall know, I say, these ravening
' Wolves by their Fruits, which devour the quick and the ' dead under the pretence of long Prayer; and forso much ' as I am enforced to give place to the Truth, and that you
' call me a Master in Israel, I will not be afraid to prove by ' the holy Scriptures, that your great Pilot and Patron the ' Pope, and the Bishops the Mariners, and such others which ' impudently forsake the Ship of Christ Jesus, to imbarke
' themselves in Pinnaces and Brigandines, are Pyrates and ' Robbers of the Sea, false Prophets, Deceivers, and not ' true Pastors of the Church of Jesus Christ.

When Dr. Bassinet had thus freely and boldly uttered his mind, the whole multitude began to gather about him, and spitefully railed at him. But the Bishop of Aix, above other, raging and crying out as he had been mad; Get thee out, said he, from amongst us, thou wicked Apostate, thou art not worthy to be in this Company. We have burned daily a great many which have not so well deserved it, as thou hast: We may now perceive, that there is none more steadfast and fervent in the Faith than the Doctors of the Canon Law. And therefore it were necessary to be decreed in the next General Council, that none should have to do in matters of Religion but they alone: For these Knaves and beggarly Monks and Friars will bring all to naught. Then the other Doctors of the same Order boldly reproved the Bishop of Aix for the Injury he had done unto them. After this there arose a great Dissention amongst them, inso much that there was nothing at that time determined. After Dinner all these reverend Prelates assembled together again, but they suffered neither Friar nor Monk to be amongst them, except he were an Abbat. In this Assembly they made a general Compulsion confirmed with an Oath, That every Man should endeavour himself that the said Arrest of Morindel should be executed with all expedition, every Man offering to furnish out Men of War, according to his ability. The Charge whereof was given to the Bishop of Aix, and to the President of the Canons, to follicite the matter, and to perfwade by all means possible the Presidents and Counsellors of the said Court of Parliament without fear or doubt, to execute the said Arrest with Drums, Ensigns displayed, Artillery, and all kind of Furniture of War.

This Conspiracy being concluded and determined, the unto Aix, to perform the Charge which was given to him. Notwithstanding they desired him to be the next day after the Council was holden, at a Banquet which should be made at the house of the Bishop of Rieux. To this Banquet such as were known to be the fairest and most beautiful Women in all Avinion, were called, to refresh and solace these good Prelates, after the great pains and travel which they had taken for our holy Mother the Church. After they had dined, they fell to dancing, playing at Dice, and such other Pastimes as are commonly wont to be frequented at the Banquets and Feasts of these holy Prelates. After this they walked abroad to solace themselves, and to pass the time till Supper. As

As they passed through the streets, every one leading his Minion upon his Arm, they saw a Man which sold bawdy Images and Pictures, with filthy Rhymes and Ballads annexed to the same, to move and stir up the people to whoredom and knavery. All these goodly Pictures were brought up by the Bishops; which were as many as a Mule could well carry. And if there were any obscure Sentence, or hard to understand in those Rhymes or Ballads, the same these learned Prelates did readily expound, and laughed pleasantly thereat. In the same place, as they walked along, there was a Bookseller which had set out to sale certain Bibles in French and Latin, with divers other Books; which when the Prelates beheld, they were greatly moved thereat, and said unto him, Darest thou be so hardy to set out such Merchandise to sell here in this Town? Dost thou not know that such Books are forbidden? The Bookseller answered, Is not the holy Bible as good as these goodly Pictures, which you have bought for these Gentlewomen? He had scarce spoken these words, but the Bishop of Aix said, I renounce any part of Paradise, if this fellow be not a Lutheran. Let him be taken, said he, and examined what he is; and incontinently the Bookseller was taken and carried unto Prison, and pitifully handled: for a Company of Knaves and Ruffians, which waited upon the Prelates, began to cry out, A Lutheran, a Lutheran, to the fire with him, to the fire with him, and one gave him a blow with his fist, another pulled him by the hair, and others by the beard, in such sort that the poor Man was all imbued with Blood before he came to Prison.

The morrow after he was brought before the Judges in the presence of the Bishops, where he was examined in this form as followeth: Hast thou not set forth to sale the Bible and the New Testament in French? The Prisoner answered, that he had so done. And being demanded, Whether he understood or knew not, that it was forbidden throughout all Christendom to print or sell the Bible in any other Language than in Latin? He answered, that he knew the contrary, and that he had sold many Bibles in the French Tongue, with the Emperor's Privilege, and many other printed at Lyons; also New Testaments imprinted by the King's Privilege. Furthermore he said, that he knew no Nation throughout all Christendom, which had not the holy Scriptures in their vulgar Tongue: and afterward with bold courage thus he spake unto them: O you Inhabitants of Avinion! are you alone in all Christendom those Men which do despise and abhor the Testament of the Heavenly Father? Will ye forbid and hide that which Jesus Christ hath commanded to be revealed and published? Do you not know that our Lord Jesus Christ gave power unto his Apostles to speak all manner of Tongues, to this end that his holy Gospel should be taught unto all Creatures in every Language? And why do you not forbid those Books and Pictures, which are full of Filthiness and Abomination, to move and stir up the People to Whoredom, and to Uncleanliness, and to provoke God's Vengeance and great Indignation upon you all? What greater Blasphemy can there be, than to forbid God's most holy Books, which he ordained to instruct the ignorant, and to reduce and bring again unto the way such as are gone astray? What Cruelty is this, to take away from the poor silly Souls their nourishment and sustenance? But my Lords, you shall give an heavy account, which call sweet fower, and fower sweet, which maintain abominable and detestable Books and Pictures, and reject that which is holy.

Then the Bishop of Aix and the other Bishops began to rage, and gnash their teeth against this poor Prisoner. What need you, said they, any more examination? Let him be sent straight unto the fire without any more words. But the Judge Laberius and certain others were not of that mind, neither found they sufficient cause why to put him to death, but went about to have him put to his Fine, and to make him confess and acknowledge the Bishop of Aix, and others his Companions, to be the true Pastors of the Church. But the Bookseller answered, that he could not do it with a good Conscience, so far as he did see before his Eyes, that these Bishops maintained filthy Books and abominable Pictures, rejecting and refusing the holy Books of God, and therefore he judged them rather to be the Priests of Baal and Venus, than the true Pastors of the Church of Christ. Whereupon he was immediately condemned to be burned, and the Sentence was executed the very same day. And for a sign or token of the cause of his Condemnation, he carried two Bibles hanging about his neck, the one before, and the other behind him: but this poor Man had also the Word of God in his heart, and in his mouth, and ceased not continually by the way, until that he came to the place of Execution, to exhort and admonish the people to read the holy Scriptures; inasmuch that divers were thereby moved to seek after the Truth. The Prelates seeing a great diffention among the people of Avinion, and that many murmured and grugged against them for the death of this good Man, and also for the dishonour which they had done unto the holy Testament of God, minding to put the people in a fear, they proceeded the next day to make a Proclamation by the sound of a Trumpet throughout the whole Town and County of Venice. That all such as had any Books in the French Tongue, intreating upon the holy Scriptures, should bring them forth, and deliver them into the hands of the Commissioners appointed for that purpose: contrariwise they which had any such Books found about them, should be put to death.

Then after that these Prelates had taken advice to raise great Persecution in Venice, the Bishop of Aix returned to prosecute the Execution of the Arrest against Merindol, travelling earnestly with the President Casseneus to that effect; declaring unto him the Good-will of the Prelates of Avinion and Provence, and the great affection they bare both to him and his, with many fair promises if he would put the Arrest in Execution. The President answered him, that it was no small matter to put the Arrest of Merindol in execution: Also that the said Arrest was given out more to keep the Lutherans in fear, which were a great number in Provence, than to execute it in effect, as it was contained in the said Arrest. Moreover he said, That the Arrest of Merindol was not definitive, and that the Laws and Statutes of the Realm did not permit the Execution thereof without further Process. Then said the Bishop, if there be either Law or Statute which do hinder or let you, we carry in our sleeves to dispence therewithal. The President answered, It were a great sin to shed the innocent Blood. Then said the Bishop, The Blood of them of Merindol be upon us, and upon our Successors. Then said the President, I am very well assured, that if the Arrest of Merindol be put in Execution, the King will not be well pleased to have such destruction made of his Subjects. Then said the Bishop, Altho the King at the first do think it evil done, we will so bring it to pass, that within a short space he shall think it well done; for we have the Cardinals on our side, and especially the most Reverend Cardinal of Tournon, which will take upon him the defence of our Cause, and we can do him no greater pleasure, than utterly to root out these Lutherans: so that if we have any need of his Counsel or Aid, we shall be well assured of him: And is not he the principal, the most excellent and prudent Adversary of these Lutherans, which is in all Christendom?

By this and such other like talk the Bishop of Aix persuaded the President and Councillors of the Court of Parliament, to put the said Arrest in Execution, and by this means, through the authority of the said Court, the Drum was sounded throughout all Provence, the Captains were prepared with their Ensigns displayed, and a great number of Foot-men and Horse-men began to set forward, and marched out of the Town of Aix in order of Battel, well horsed and furnished against Merindol, to execute the Arrest. The Inhabitants of Merindol being advertised hereof, and seeing nothing but present death to be at hand, with great lamentation commended themselves and their Cause unto God by Prayer, making themselves ready to be murdered and slain, as Sheep led unto the Butchery.

Whilst they were in this grievous distress, piteously mourning and lamenting together, the Father with the Son, the Daughter with the Mother, the Wife with the Husband, suddenly there was news brought unto them, that the Army was retired, and no Man knew at that time how, or by what means; yet notwithstanding afterward it was known, that the Lord of Aleze, a wife Man, and learned in the Scriptures, and in the Civil Law, being moved with great zeal and love of Justice, declared unto the President Casseneus, that he ought not so to proceed against the Inhabitants of Merindol by way of force of Arms, contrary to all form and order of Justice, without judgment or Condemna-demnation, or without making any difference between the guilty and the innocent. And furthermore he said, I desire you, my Lord President, call to remembrance the Counsel which you have written in your Book entituled Calogue Gloria Mundi; in the which Book you have in-treated and brought forth the Proceses which were holden against the Rats by the Officers of the Court and Jurisdiction of the Bishop of Aubun. For as it happened, there was almost throughout all the Bailiwick of Landais such a great number of Rats, that they destroyed and devoured all the Corn of the Country. Whereupon they took counsel to fend unto the Bishop of Aubun's Official, to have the Rats excommunicate. Whereupon it was ordained and decreed by the said Official, after he had heard the Plaintiff of the Procurator fiscal, that before he would proceed to Excommunication, they should have admonition and warning according to the order of Justice. For this cause it was ordained, that by the found of a Trumpet, and open Proclamation made throughout all the Streets of the Town of Aubun, the Rats should be cited to appear within three days; and if they did not appear, then to proceed against them.

The three days were passed, and the Procurator came into the Court against the Rats, and for lack of Appearance obtained default, by Virtue whereof he required that they would proceed to the Excommunication. Whereupon it was judicially acknowledged that the said Rats, being absent, should have their Advocate appointed them to hear their defence, forasmuch as the Question was for the whole destruction and banishing of the said Rats. And you my Lord President, being at that time the Kings Advocate at Aubun, were then chosen to be the Advocate to defend the Rats. And having taken the charge upon you in pleading the matter, it was by you there declared, that the Citation was of no effect, for certain Causes and Reasons by you there alleged. Then it was decreed, that the said Rats should be once again cited throughout the Parishes where they were. Then after the Citations were duly served, the Procurator came again into the Court as before; and there it was alleged by you my Lord President, how that the term of Appearance given unto the Rats was too short, and that there were so many Cats in every Town and Village as they should pass through, that they had just cause to be absent.

Wherefore my L. President, you ought not so lightly to proceed against these poor Men, but you ought to look upon the holy Scriptures, and there you shall find how ye ought to proceed in this matter; and you my Lord have alleged many places of the Scripture concerning the same, as appeareth more at large in your said Book; and by this plea of a matter which seemeth to be but of a small importance you have obtained great fame and honour, for the upright declaration of the manner and form how Judges ought gravely to proceed in criminal Causes. Then my Lord President, you which have taught others, will you not also learn by your own Books? the which will manifestly condemn you, if you proceed any further to the destruction of these poor Men of Merindol. For are they not Christian Men, and ought you not as well to minister Right and Justice unto them, as you have done to the Rats? By these and such like Demonstrations the President was persuaded, and immediately called back his Commission which he had given out, and caused the Army to retire, the which was already come near unto Merindol, even within one mile and a half.

Then the Merindolians understanding that the Army was retired, gave thanks unto God, comforting one another, with admonition and exhortation always to have the fear of God before their Eyes, to be obedient to his holy Commandments, subject to his most holy Will, and every Man to submit himself unto his Providence, patiently attending and looking for the hope of the Blessed, that is to say, the true life, and the everlasting Riches, having always before their eyes for example our Lord Jesus Christ the very Son of God, who hath entered into his Glory by many Tribulations. Thus the Merindolians prepared themselves to endure and abide all the Afflictions that it should please God to lay upon them; and such was their Answer to all those that either pried, or else sought their destruction. Whereupon the bruit and noise was so great, as well of the Arrest, as of the Enterprize of the Execution, and also of the patience and constancy of the Merindolians, that it was not hidden or kept secret from King Francis, a King of noble Courage and great Judgment; who gave Commandment unto the Noble and Virtuous Lord Mounieur de Languey, which then was his Lieutenant in Tourin, a City in Piemont, that he should diligently enquire and search out the Truth of all this matter. Whereupon the said Mounieur de Languey sent unto Province two Men of fame and estimation, giving them in charge to bring unto him the Copy of the Arrest, and diligently to enquire out all that followed and ensued thereupon; and likewise to make diligent inquisition of the life and manners of the Merindolians, and others which were persecuted in the Country of Province.

These Deputies brought the Copy of the Arrest; and of all that happened thereupon, unto the said Mounieur de Languey, declaring unto him the great Injuries, Pollings, Extortions, Exactions, Tyrannies, and Cruelties, which the Judges as well Secular as Ecclesiastical used against them of Merindol, and others. As touching the Behaviour and Disposition of those which were persecuted, they reported that the most part of the Men of Province affirmed them to be Men given to great labour and travel; and that about 200 years past, (as it is reported) they came out of the Country of Piemont to dwell in Province, and took to tillage, and to inhabit many Hamlets and Villages destroyed by the Wars, and other defect and waste places, which they had so well occupied, that now there was great store of Wines, Oyls, Honey, and Cattel, wherewith strangers were greatly relieved and holpen. Besides that, before they came into the Country to dwell, the place of Merindol was taxed but at four Crowns, which before the last destruction paid yearly unto the Lord for Taxes and Tallages, above three hundred and fifty Crowns, beside other Charges.

The like was also reported of Lormarin, and divers other places of Province, whereas there was nothing but Robbery before they came to inhabit there, so that none could pass that way but in great danger. Moreover, they of the Country of Province affirmed, That the Inhabitants of Merindol, and the other that were persecuted, were peaceable and quiet People, beloved of all their Neighbours, Men of good Behaviour, constant in keeping of their promise, and paying of their Debts, without travelling or pleading at the Law: That they were also charitable Men, giving Alms, relieving the Poor, and suffered none amongst them to lack, or to be in necessity. Also they gave Alms to strangers, and to the poor Passengers, harbouring, nourishing, and helping them in all their necessities, according to their power. Moreover, that they were known by this, throughout all the Country of Province, that they would not swear, nor name the Devil, or easily be brought to take an Oath, except it were in Judgment, or making some solemn Covenant. They were also known by this, That they could never be moved nor provoked to talk of any dishonest matters, but in what Companysoever they came, where they heard any wanton talk, Swearing or Blasphemy to the dishonour of God, they straightway departed out of that Company. Also they said, that they never saw them go to their Busines, but first they made their Prayers. The said People of Province furthermore affirmed, that when they came to any Fairs or Markets, or came to their Cities by any occasion, they never in a manner were seen in their Churches: and if they were, when they prayed they turned away their faces from the Images, and neither offered Candles to them, nor kissed their feet. Neither would they worship the Reliques of Saints, nor once look upon them. And moreover, if they passed by any Cross or Image of the Crucifix, or any other Saint by the way as they went, they would do no Reverence unto them. Also the Priests did testify, that they never caused them to say any Masses, neither Dirges, neither yet De profundis, neither would they take any holy Waters; and if it were carried home unto their houses, they would not say once, God a mercy, yea, they termed itself to abhor it. To go on Pilgrimage, to make any Vows to Saints, to buy Pardons or Remission of Sins with Money, yea, tho it might be gotten for a Half-penny, they thought it not lawful. Likewise when it thundered or lightened, they would not cross themselves, but casting up their Eyes unto Heaven, fetch deep sighs. Some of them would kneel down and pray, without blessing themselves with the Sign of the Cross, or taking of holy Water. Also they were never seen to offer, or call into the Basin any thing for the maintenance of Lights, Brotherhoods, Churches, or to give any offering either for the Quick or the Dead. But if any were in affliction or poverty, those they relieved gladly, and thought nothing too much.

This was the whole tenor of the report made unto Monsieur de Langres, touching the life and behaviour of the Inhabitants of Merindol, and the other which was persecuted; also as touching the Arrest, and that which ensued thereon. Of all those things the said Monsieur de Langres, according to the charge that was given him, advertised the King, who understanding these things, as a good Prince moved with mercy and pity, sent Letters of Grace and Pardon, not only for those which were condemned for lack of appearance, but also for all the rest of the Countrey of Provence, which were accused and suspected in like case, expressly charging and commanding the said Parliament, That they should not hereafter proceed so rigorously as they had done before, against this People: but if there were any that could be found or proved, by sufficient information, to have iwerred from the Christian Religion, that then he should have good demonstration made unto him by the Word of God, both out of the Old and New Testament: and so, as well by the gentleness as by the rigor of the same, he should be reduced again unto the Church of Christ. Declaring also, That the King's pleasure was, that all such as should be convicted of Heresy in manner aforesaid, should abjure; forbidding also all manner of persons, of what estate or condition soever they were, to attempt any thing against them of Merindol, or other that were persecuted, by any other manner of means, or to molest or trouble them in person or goods: revoking and disannulling all manner of sentences and condemnations of what Judges soever they were, and commanding to set at liberty all Prisoners which either were accused or suspected of Lutheranism.

By virtue of these Letters they were now permitted to declare their cause, and to say what they could in defence thereof. Whereupon they made a Confession of their Faith, the effect whereof you shall see in the end of the Story. This Confession was presented first to the Court of Parliament; and afterward being declared more at large, with Articles also annexed therunto, it was delivered to the Bishop of Cavaillon, who required the same. Also to Cardinal Sadolet, Bishop of Carpentras, with the like Articles, and also a Supplication to this effect: That the Inhabitants of Cabriers in the Countrey of Venice most humbly desired him, that he would vouchsafe to receive and read the Confession and Declaration of their Faith and Doctrine, in the which they, and also their Fathers before them, had been of a long time instructed and taught, which they were persuaded to be agreeable to the Doctrine contained in the Old and New Testament. And because he was learned in the holy Scriptures, they desired him that he would mark such Articles as he thought to be against the Scriptures; and if he should make it to appear unto them, that there was any thing contrary to the same, they would not only submit themselves to abjuration, but also to suffer such punishment as should be adjudged unto them, even to the loss, not only of all that they had, but also of their Lives. And moreover, if there were any Judge in all the Countrey of Venice, which by good and sufficient information should be able to charge them that they had holden any erroneous Doctrine, or maintained any other Religion than was contained in the Articles of their Confession, they desired him that he would communicate the same unto them, and with all obedience they offered themselves to whatsoever should be thought just and reasonable. Upon this request Cardinal Sadolet answered by his Letters written by his Secretary, and signed with his own hand, the tenour whereof here ensueth.

I have seen your Request, and have read the Articles of your Confession, wherein there is much matter contained; and do not understand that you are accused for any other Doctrine, but for the very same which you have confessed. It is most true, that many have reported divers things of you worthy of reproof, which, after diligent enquiry made, we have found to be nothing else but false reports and slanders. As touching the rest of your Articles, it seemeth unto me, that there are many words therein which might well be changed without prejudice unto your Confession. And likewise it seemeth to me, that it is not necessary that you should speak so manifestly against the Pastors of the Church. For my part, I desire your Welfare, and would be sorry that you should be so spoiled or destroyed as they do pretend. And to the end you shall the better understand my amity and friendship towards you, shortly I will be at my House by Cabriers, whither ye may resort unto me either in greater or smaller numbers, as you will, and return safely without any hurt or damage, and there I will advise you of all things that I think meet for your profit and health.

About this time, which was the year of our Lord 1542, the Vice-legat of Avinion assembled a great number of Men of War, at the suit of the Bishop of Cavaillon, to destroy Cabriers. When the Army was come within a mile of Cabriers, the Cardinal Sadolet went with speed to the Vice-legat, and shewed him the request of the Inhabitants of Cabriers, with the Articles of their Confession, and the Offers that they made; so that for that present the Army retired, without any hurt or damage done unto the Inhabitants of Cabriers. After this the Cardinal Sadolet went unto Rome; but before his departure he sent for divers of Cabriers, and certain Farmers of his own, whom he knew to be of the number of those which were called Lutherans, and told them, That he would have them in remembrance as soon as he came to Rome, and communicate their Articles and Confession unto the Cardinals, trusting to find a mean to have some good reformation, that God should be thereby glorified, and all Christendom brought to unity and concord; at the least, nothing at all doubting but that the foulest Abuses should be corrected and amended; advertising them in the mean time to be wise and circumspect, to watch and pray, for that they had many Enemies. With this Oration of Cardinal Sadolet, they of Cabriers were greatly comforted, trusting that at the suit of Cardinal Sadolet they should have answer of their Confession. But at his return they understood that he found all things so corrupt at Rome, that there was no hope of any Reformation there to be had, but rather mortal War against all such as would not live according to the Ordinances of the Church of Rome. Likewise said the Treasurer of Carpentras, who albeit he paid out money to furnish Souldiers that were hired for the destruction of Cabriers, notwithstanding he did aid them secretly all that he might. Howbeit he could not do it so secretly, but that it came to the knowledge of the Legate; whereupon he was constrained to withdraw himself.

On the other part, the Bishop of Aix and Cavaillon purchased still the execution of the Arrest of Merindol. Then it was ordained by the Court of Parliament, That, according to the King's Letters, John Durand, Counsellor of the Court of Parliament, with a Secretary, and the Bishop of Cavaillon, with a Doctor of Divinity, should go unto Merindol, and there declare unto the Inhabitants the Errors and Heresies which they knew to be contained in their Confession, and make them apparent by good and sufficient information; and having so convicted them by the Word of God, they should make them to renounce and abjure the said Heresies; and if the Merindolians did refuse to abjure, then they should make relation thereof, that the Court might appoint how they should further proceed. After this Decree was made, the Bishop of Cavaillon would not tarry until the time which was appointed by the Court for the execution of this matter; but he himself, with a Doctor of Divinity, came to Merindol to make them to abjure. Unto whom the Merindolians answered, That he enteredpriized against the authority of the Parliament, and that it was against his Commission so to do. Notwithstanding he was very earnest with them that they should abjure, and promised them, if they would so do, to take them under his wings and protection, even as the Hen doth her Chickens, and that they should be no more robbed or spoiled. Then they required that he would declare unto them what they should abjure. The Bishop answered, that the matter needed no disputation, and that he required but only a general Abjuration of all Errors, which would be no damage or prejudice to them; for he himself would not stick to make the like Abjuration. The Merindolians answered him again, That they would do nothing contrary to the Decree and Ordinance of the Court, or the King's Letters, wherein he commanded that first the Errors should be declared unto them, whereof they were accused: wherefore they were resolved to understand what those Errors and Heresies were, that being informed thereof by the Word of God, they might satisfy the King's Letters: otherwise

The King's Pardon procured and sent down for the Merindolians.

This most godly and Christian Confession you shall find more largely set out in Hen. Part. and also in the French Story, intreating of the destruction of Merindol and Cabriers; also touching their Faith & Confession you shall partly see hereafter.

it were but hypocrisy and dissimulation to do as he required them. And if he could make it to appear unto them by good and sufficient information, that they had holden any Errors and Heresies, or should be convicted thereupon by the Word of God, they would willingly abjure; or if in their Confession there were any word contrary to the Scriptures, they would revoke the same. Contrariwise, if it were not made manifest unto them, that they had holden any Heresies, but that they had always lived according to the doctrine of the Gospel, and that their Confession was grounded upon the same, then they ought by no means to move or constrain them to abjure any Errors which they held not, and that it were plainly against all equity and justice so to do.

Then the Bishop of Cavaillon was marvellously angry, and would hear no word spoken of any demonstration to be made by the Word of God, but in a fury cursed and gave him to the Devil that first invented that means. Then the Doctor of Divinity, whom the Bishop brought thither, demanded what Articles they were that were presented by the Inhabitants of Merindol; for the Bishop of Cavaillon had not yet showed them unto him. Then the Bishop of Cavaillon delivered the Doctor the Confession, which after he had read, the Bishop of Cavaillon said, What! will you any more witness or declaration? this is full of Heresy. Then they of Merindol demanded, In what point? whereupon the Bishop knew not what to answer. Then the Doctor demanded to have time to look upon the Articles of the Confession, and to consider whether they were against the Scriptures or no. Thus the Bishop departed, being very sore aggrieved that he could not bring his purpose to pass.

After eight days the Bishop sent for this Doctor, to understand how he might order himself to make their Heresies appear which were in the said Confession. Whereunto the Doctor answered, That he was never so much abashed: for when he had beheld the Articles of the Confession, and the Authorities of the Scriptures that were there alleged for the confirmation thereof, he had found that those Articles were wholly agreeable and according to the holy Scriptures; and that he had not learned so much in the Scriptures all the days of his life, as he had in those eight days, in looking upon those Articles, and the Authorities therein alleged.

Shortly after the Bishop of Cavaillon came unto Merindol, and calling before him the Children both great and small, gave them money, and commanded them with fair words to learn the Pater noster and the Credo in Latin. The most part of them answered, That they knew the Pater noster and the Credo already in Latin, but they could make no reason of that which they spoke, but only in the vulgar tongue. The Bishop answered, That it was not necessary they should be so cunning, but that it was sufficient that they knew it in Latin; and that it was not requisite for their salvation, to understand or to expound the Articles of their Faith; for there were many Bishops, Curates, yea, and Doctors of Divinity, whom it would trouble to expound the Pater noster and the Credo. Here the Bayliff of Merindol, named Andrew Maynard, asked, To what purpose it would serve to say the Pater noster and the Credo, and not to understand the same? for in so doing they should but mock and deride God. Then said the Bishop unto him, Do you understand what is signified by these words, I believe in God?

The Bayliff answered, I should think myself very miserable, if I did not understand it; and then he began orderly to give an account of his Faith. Then said the Bishop, I would not have thought there had been so great Doctors in Merindol. The Bayliff answered, The least of the Inhabitants of Merindol can do it yet more readily than I: but I pray you, question with one or two of these young Children, that you may understand whether they be well taught or no. But the Bishop either knew not how to question with them, or at the least would not.

Then one named Pieron Roy said, Sir, one of these Children may question with another, if you think it so good, and the Bishop was contented. Then one of the Children began to question with his fellows, with such grace and gravity as if he had been a Schoolmaster; and the Children one after another answered to unto the purpose, that it was marvellous to hear: for it was done in the presence of many, among whom there were four Religious Men, that came lately out of Paris, of whom one said unto the Bishop,

I must needs confess, that I have often been at the common Schools of Sorbon in Paris, where I have heard the disputations of the Divines; but yet I never learned so much as I have done by hearing these young Children. Then said William Armand, Did you never read that which is written in the eleventh Chapter of St. Matthew, where it is said, O Father, Lord of Heaven and Earth, I render thanks unto thee, that thou hast hidden these things from the sage and wise Men of the World, and hast revealed them unto young Infants: But behold, O Father, such was thy good will and pleasure. Then every Man marvelled at the ready wit and witty answers of the Children of Merindol.

When the Bishop saw he could not thus prevail, he tried another way, and went about by fair and flattering words to bring his purpose to pass. Wherefore, calling the Strangers to go apart, he said, That he now perceived they were not so evil as many thought them to be; notwithstanding, for the contentation of them which were their persecutors, it was necessary that they should make some small Abjuration, which only the Bayliff, with two Officers, might make generally in his presence, in the name of all the rest, without any Notary to record the same in writing; and in so doing they should be loved and favoured of all Men, and even of those which now persecuted them: and that they should sustain no infamy thereby, for there should be no report thereof made, but only to the Pope, and to the High-Court of Parliament of Provence: And also if any Man in time to come would turn the same to their reproach, or alleged it against them to their hurt or damage, they might utterly deny it, and say they made no Abjuration at all, because there were no records made thereof, or witnesses to prove the same. For this purpose he desired them to talk together, to the end there might be an end made in this matter, without any further business.

The Bayliff, and the two Officers, with divers other Ancients of the Town, answered, That they were fully resolved not to consent to any Abjuration, howsoever it were to be done, except that (which was always their exception) they could make it appear unto them by the Word of God, that they had holden or maintained any Heresy; marvelling much that he would go about to perjure them to lie to God and to the World. And albeit that all Men by nature are Liars, yet they had learned by the Word of God, that they ought diligently to take heed that their Children did not accustom or use themselves to lie, and therefore punished them very sharply, when as they took them with any Lie, even as if they had committed any Robbery; For the Devil is a Liar, and the Father of Lies. Here the Bishop rose up in great anger and indignation, and so departed.

Within a while after the Bishop of Aix solicited Master John Durandus, Counsellor of the Court of the Parliament of Provence, to execute the Commission which was given him; that is, to go unto the place of Merindol, together with the Secretary of the said Court, and there in the presence of the Bishop of Cavaillon, accompanied with a Doctor of Divinity, to declare the Errors and Heresies, which the Bishops pretended the Inhabitants of Merindol to be infected and entangled withal, and according to their duty, to make it appear by the Word of God, and so being convicted, to make them abjure and renounce the said Heresies. Whereupon the said Counsellor Durandus certified the day that he would be present at Merindol, to the end and purpose that none of the Inhabitants should be absent. At the day appointed the said Counsellor Durandus, the Bishop of Cavaillon, a Doctor of Divinity, and a Secretary, came unto Merindol, where were also present divers Gentlemen, and Men of understanding of all sorts, to see this Commission executed. Then they of Merindol were advertised that they should not appear all at once, but that they should keep themselves apart, and appear as they should be called, in such order and number as should be appointed unto them.

After that Durandus, the Bishop of Cavaillon, the Doctor of Divinity, and the Secretary were set in place where Justice was accustomed to be kept, there was called forth Andrew Maynard, the Bayliff of Merindol; Jyon Romane, and Michelle Maynard, Syndiques; John Cabrie, and John Palene, Ancients of Merindol; and John Brunner, Under-bayliff. After they had presented themselves with all due reverence, the Counsellor Durandus spoke thus unto them.

The Youth of Merindol well brought up.

Durand rose up by the Bishop to execute the Commission against the Merindolians.

Durandus the Counsellor came to Merindol.

of Durandus to the Merindolians.

You are not ignorant that, by the Arrest given out by the high Court of Provence, you were all condemned to be burned, both Men, Women, and Children; your Houses also to be beaten down, and your Town to be razed and made desolate, &c. as is more largely contained in the said Arrest. Notwithstanding, it hath pleased the King, our most gracious Prince, to send his Letters unto the said Court, commanding that the said Arrest should not so rigorously proceed against you: but if it could by sufficient Information be proved, that you, or any of you, had swerved from the true Religion, demonstration should be made thereof unto you by the Word of God, whereby you might be reduced again to the Flock of Christ. Wherefore it was determined in the said Court of Parliament, that the Bishop of Cavaillon, with a Doctor of Divinity, should in my presence declare unto you the Errors and Heresies wherewith they say you are infected; and after good demonstration made by the Word of God, you should publicly and solemnly renounce and abjure the said Heresies; and in so doing, should obtain the Grace and Pardon contained in the King's Letters: wherefore shew your selves this day, that you be obedient unto God, the King and the Magistrates. When he had thus spoken, what answer you, said he, to that which I have propounded?

Then Andrew Maynard the Bailiff, desired that they would grant them an Advocate to answer according to the Instructions which they would give him, forasmuch as they were Men unlearned, and knew not how to answer as in such a case was requisite. The Counsellor answered, that he would hear their Answer neither by Advocate nor by Writing, but would hear them answer in their own persons: Notwithstanding he would give them leave to go apart; and talk together, but not to ask any counsel, but only among themselves: and then to answer one after another. Upon this determination, the Bailiff and the two Syndiques, with other two ancient Men, talked together a while and determined that the two Syndiques should speak first, and after them the Bailiff, then the two ancient Men, every Man according as God should give them Grace, and by and by presented themselves. Whereat the Counsellor Durandus was greatly abashed, to see that they had decreed and determined so speedily. Then Michelin Maynard began to answer, desiring the Counsellor and the Bishop, with the other Assiliants, to pardon him, if that he answered over rudely, having regard that they were poor, rude, and ignorant Men. His Answer here followeth.

We are greatly bound, faith he, to give God thanks, that, besides other his Benefits bestowed upon us, he hath now delivered us from these great Assaults, and that it hath pleased him to touch the heart of our Noble King, that our cause might be intreated with justice, and not by violence. In like manner are we also bound to pray for our Noble King, which, following the example of Samuel and Daniel, hath not disdained to look upon the cause of his poor Subjects. Also we render thanks unto the Lords of the Parliament, in that it hath pleased them to minister Justice according to the King's Commandment. Finally, we thank you my Lord Durandus, Commissioner in this present cause, that it hath pleased you in so few words to declare unto us the manner and order how we ought to proceed. And for my part I greatly desire to understand and know the Heresy and Errors wherof I am accused: and whereas they shall make it appear unto me, that I have holden any Errors or Heresies, I am contented to amend the same, as it shall be ordained and provided by you.

After him answered Jean Romine the other Syndique, a very ancient Father, approving all that which his Fellow before had said, giving God thanks that in his time, even in his latter days, he had seen and heard so good News, that the cause of Religion should be decided and debated by the Holy Scriptures, and that he had often heard ancient Men say, that they could never obtain of the Judges, in all their Persecution, to have their Cause debated in such sort.

Then Andrew Maynard the Bailiff answered, saying, That God had given to these two Syndiques the Grace to answer so well, that it was not necessary for him to say or add any more thereunto. Notwithstanding it seemed good that their Answers were put in writing, which was not done by the Secretary, that had done nothing else but mock and jeer at all that had been said: Wherefore he required the Commissioner to look unto the matter.

Then the Commissioner was very angry, and sharply rebuked his Secretary, commanding him to sit nearer and to write their Answers word for word, and he himself with a singular memory repeated their answers, and oftentimes asked if it were not so. The said Answers being thus put in writing, the Commissioner asked the Bailiff, if he had any more to answer, saying, that he had done him great pleasure to shew him his Secretaries Fault, willing him to speak boldly what he thought good for the defence of their Cause. Then the Bailiff said, Forasmuch as it hath pleased you to give me audience and liberty to speak my mind freely: I say moreover, that it seemeth unto me, that there is no due form of Process in this Judgment: for there is no Party here that doth accuse us. If we had an Accuser present, which, according to the rule of the Scripture, either should prove by good demonstration out of the Old and New Testament that wherof we are accused, or, if he were not able, should suffer punishment due unto such as are Hereticks; I think he would be as greatly troubled to maintain his Accusations, as we to answer unto the same.

After that the Bailiff had made this answer, John Palane, one of the Ancients of Merindol, said, that he approved all that had been said by the Syndiques, and that he was able to say no more than had been said by them before. The Commissioner said unto him: You are, I see, a very ancient Man, and you have not lived so long, but that you have something to answer for your part in defence of your cause. And the said Palane answered, seeing it is your pleasure that I should say something, it seemeth unto me impossible that (say what we can) we should have either victory or vantage: For our Judges be our Enemies.

Then John Bruneral, Under-Bailiff of Merindol, answered, That he would very fain know the Authority of the Counsellor Durandus, Commissioner in this Cause, forasmuch as the said Counsellor had given them to understand, that he had Authority of the High Court to make them abjure their Errors, which should be found by good and sufficient information, and to give them, so doing, the Pardon contained in the King's Letters, and quit them of all Punishment and Condemnation. But the said Commissioner did not give them to understand that if it could not be found, by good and sufficient Information, that they were in error, he had any power or authority to quit and absolve them of the said Sentence and Condemnation: wherefore it seemed that it should be more vantage for the said Merindolians, if it should appear that they were Hereticks, than to be found to live according to the Doctrine of the Gospel. For this cause he required, that it would please the said Commissioner to make declaration thereof: Concluding, that if it did not appear, by good and sufficient information against them, that they had swerved from the Faith, or if there were no Accuser that would come forth against them, they ought to be fully absolved, without being any more troubled, either in Body or Goods.

These things were thus in debating, from seven of the clock in the morning until eleven. Then the Commissioner dismissed them till after dinner. At one of the clock at afternoon, they were called for again, and demanded whether they would say any else touching that which was propounded in the morning by the said Commissioner. They answered, No. Then said the Commissioner, What do you conclude for your defence? the two Syndiques answered, We conclude, that it would please you to declare unto us the Errors and Heresies wherof we are accused. Then the Commissioner asked the Bishop of Cavaillon, what information he had against them. The Bishop spake unto him in his ear, and would not answer aloud. This talk in the ear continued almost half an hour, that the Commissioner & all other that stood thereby were weary thereof. In the end, the Commissioner said unto them, That the Bishop of Cavaillon had told him, that it was not needful to make it apparent by information, for such was the common report. Hereunto they answered, That they required the Causes and Reasons alleged by the Bishop of Cavaillon against them, should be put in writing. The Bishop was earnest to the contrary, and would have nothing, that either he said or alleged, to be put in writing. Then John Bruneral required the Commissioner, that at the least he would put in writing, that the Bishop would speak nothing against them that they could understand; and that he would not speak before the Commissioner but only in his ear, Ear. The Bishop on the contrary part defended, that he would not be named in Process. There was great dispute upon this matter, and continued long. Then the Commissioner asked the Merindolians if they had the Articles of their Confession, which they had presented to the high Court of Parliament. Then they required that their Confession might be read, that by the reading thereof, they might understand whether it were the Doctrine which they held; and the Confession which they had presented, or no. Then the Confession was read publicly before them, which they did allow and acknowledge to be theirs. This done, the Commissioner asked the Doctor, If he did find in the said Confession any heretical Opinions, whereof he could make demonstration by the Word of God, either out of the Old or New Testament. Then spake the Doctor in Latin a good while. After he had made an end, Andrew Maynard the Bailiff desired the Commissioner according as he had propounded, to make the Errors and Heresies that they were accused of, apparent unto them by good information, or at the least to mark those Articles of their Confession, which the Bishop and the Doctor pretended to be heretical; requiring him also to put in register the refusal as well of the Bishop as of the Doctor, of whom the one spake in his ear, and the other in Latine, so that they of Merindol could not understand one word. Then the Commissioner promised them to put in Writing all that should make for their Cause. And moreover he said, that it was not needful to call the rest of the Merindolians, if there were no more to be said to them than had been said to those which were already called. And this is the Sum of all that was done at the Afternoon.

Marly which came thither to hear these Disputations, supposing they should have heard some goodly Demonstrations, were greatly abashed to see the Bishop and the Doctor so confounded; which thing afterward turned to the great Benefit of many: for hereby they were moved to require Copies of the Confession of their Faith; by means whereof they were converted and embraced the Truth, and namely three Doctors who went about divers times to disswade the Merindolians from their Faith, whose Ministry God afterwards used in the preaching of his Gospel: Of whom one was Dr. Combaudi Prior of St. Maximin, afterwards a Preacher in the Territory of the Lords of Berne. Another was Dr. Somati, who was also a Preacher in the Bailiwick of Tonon. The other was Dr. Heraudi, Pastor and Minister in the County of Noveselle.

After this the Inhabitants of Merindol were in rest and quietness for a space, inasmuch that every Man feared to go about to trouble them, seeing those which persecuted them did receive nothing but shame and confusion; as it did manifestly appear, not only by the sudden death of the President Cheslane, but also many other of the chiefest Counsellors of the Parliament of Province, whose horrible End terrified many, but especially the strange and fearful Example of that bloody Tyrant John de Roma, set out as a Spectacle to all Persecutors, whereof we have spoken before.

Thus the Lord repressing the rage of the Adversaries for a time, stayed the Violence and Execution of that cruel Sentence or Arrest given out by the Parliament of Province against the Merindolians, until John Miniers, an exceeding bloody Tyrant, began a new Persecution. This Miniers, being Lord of Opede near to Merindol, first began to vex the poor Christians by pilling and polling, by oppression and extortion, getting from them what he could, to enlarge his Seigniorie or Lordship, which before was very bare. For this cause he put five or six of his own Tenants into a Cistern under the ground, and closing it up, there he kept them till they died for hunger, pretending that they were Lutherans and Waldays, to have their Goods and Possessions. By this, and such other Practices this Wretch was advanced in short space to great Wealth and Dignity, and so at length became not only the chief President of the High Court of Parliament, but also the King's Lieutenant General in the Country of Province, in the absence of the Lord Grignan, then being at the Council of Worms in Germany. Now therefore seeing no opportunity to be lacking to accomplish his devilish Enterprize, he employed all his Power, Riches, and Authority not only to confirm and to revive that cruel Arrest given out before by the Court of Parliament, but also (as a right Minister of Satan) he exceedingly increased the Cruelty thereof, which was already so great, that it seemed there could nothing more be added thereunto. And to bring this Mischief to pass, he forged a most impudent Lie, giving the King to understand, that they of Merindol and all the Country near about, to the number of twelve or fifteen thousand were in the field in Armour with their Ensigns displayed, intending to take the Town of Marfalle, and make it one of the Cantons of the Switzers; and to say this Enterprize, he said, it was necessary to execute the Arrest Manu militari: and by this means he obtained the King's Letters Patents, through the help of the Cardinal of Tournon, commanding the Sentence to be executed against the Merindolians, notwithstanding the King had before revoked the said Sentence, and given strict Commandment that it should in no wise be executed, as is before mentioned.

After this he gathered all the King's Army, which was then in Province ready to go against the Englishmen, and took up all besides, that were able to bear Armour, in the chiefest Towns of Province, and joyed them with the Army which the Pope's Legat had levied for that purpose in Avinion, and all the Country of Venice, and employed the same to the Destruction of Merindol, Cabriers, and other Towns and Villages to the number of two and twenty, giving Commission to his Souldiers to spoil, ransack, burn, and to destroy all together, and to kill Man, Woman, and Child without all mercy, sparing none: No, otherwise than the Infidels and cruel Turks have dealt with the Christians, as before in the Story of the Turky you may read.

For as the Papists and Turks are alike in their Religions, so are the said Papists like, or rather exceed them in all kinds of Cruelty that can be devised. But this Archtyrant before he came to Merindol, ransacked and burnt certain Towns, namely La Roch, St. Stephens, Ville Laure, Lormarin, La Motte, Cabrieret, St. Martin, Pipin and other places moe, notwithstanding that the Arrest extended but only to Merindol: Where the most of the poor Inhabitants were slain and murdered without any resistance; Women and Maidens ravished; Women with Child, and little Infants born and to be born, were also most cruelly murdered; the Paps of many Women cut off, which gave sick to their Children, which looking for suck at their Mother's Breast, being dead before, died also for hunger. There was never any such Cruelty and Tyranny seen before.

The Merindolians seeing all on a flaming fire round about them, left their Houses, and fled into the Woods, and remained all that Night at the Village sanfleur, and thereabouts in wonderful tear and perplexity; for the Bishop of Cavaillon, Deputy to the Bishop of Rome's Legat, had appointed certain Captains to go and slay them. The next day they went a little further, hiding themselves in Woods, for there was danger on every side, and Miniers had commanded under pain of death, that no Man should aid them by any means, but that they should be slain without pity or mercy, wherefore they were foomt. The same Proclamation was of force also in the Bishop of Rome's Dominions thereby; and it was said, that the Bishops of that Country did find a great part of the Army. Wherefore they went a tedious and painful Journey, carrying their Children upon their Shoulders, and in their Arms, and in their Swadling-clothes, and many of them also being great with Child, were constrained so to do. And when they were come to the place appointed, thither was already resorted a great number which had lost their Goods, and saved themselves by flight.

Not long after it was shewed them how that Miniers was coming with all his power to give the charge upon them. This was in the evening, and because they should go through rough and cumbersome places, and hard to pass by, they all thought it most expedient for their safety to leave behind them all the Women and Children, with a few other, and among them also certain Ministers of the Church, the residue were appointed to go to the Town of Maffi. And this did they upon hope that the Enemy would shew mercy to the multitude of Women and Children being destitute of all Succour. No Tongue can express what Sorrow, what Tears, what Sighing, what Lamentation mentation there was at that woful departing, when they were compelled to be thus separated afunder, the Husband from his dear Wife, the Father from his sweet Babes and tender Infants, the one never like to see the other again alive. Notwithstanding after the Ministers had ended their ordinary Sermons, with Evening-Prayers and Exhortations, the Men departed that night, to avoid a greater inconvenience.

When they had gone all the night long, and had passed over the great Hill of Libron, they might see many Villages and Farms set on fire. Miniers in the mean time had divided his Army into two parts, marching himself with the one towards the Town of Merindol; and having knowledge by Espial whither the Merindolians were fled, he sent the other part to set upon them, and to shew their accustomed cruelty upon them. Yet before they came to the place where they were, some of Miniers Army, either of good will, or moved with pity, privily conveyed themselves away, and came unto them, to give them warning that their Enemies were coming; and one of them from the top of an high Rock, where he thought that the Merindolians were underneath, casteth down two stones, and afterward, altho he could not see them, he called unto them that they should immediately flee from thence. But the Enemies suddenly came upon them, finding them all assembled together at prayers, and spoiled them of all that they had, pulling off their garments from their backs: some they ravished, some they whipped and scourged, and some they fold away like Cattel, practising what cruelty and villany soever they could devise against them. The Women were in number about five hundred.

In the mean time Miniers came to Merindol, where he found none but a young Man named Maurice Blanc, who had yielded himself unto a Souldier, promising him for his ransom two French Crowns. Miniers would have had him away by force, but it was answered that the Souldier ought not to lose his Prisoner. Miniers therefore, paying the two Crowns himself, took the young Man, and caused him to be tied unto an Olive-Tree, and shot through with Harquebusses, and most cruelly martyred. Many Gentlemen which accompanied Miniers against their wills, seeing this cruel Spectacle, were moved with great compassion, and could not forbear Tears: For albeit this young Man was not yet very well instructed, neither had before dwelt at Merindol, yet in all his torments, having always his eyes lifted up to Heaven, with a loud voice he ceased not still to call upon God: and the last words that he spake were these: Lord God, these Men take away my life full of misery, but thou wilt give unto me life everlasting by thy Son Jesus Christ, to whom be glory. So was Merindol without any resistance valiantly taken, ranck'd, burnt, razed, and laid even with the ground. And albeit there was no Man to resist, yet this valiant Captain of Opede, armed from top to toe, trembled for fear, and was seen to change his colour very much.

When he had destroyed Merindol, he laid siege to Cabriers, and battered it with his Ordnance; but when he could not win it by force, he, with the Lord of the Town, and Poulin his chief Captain, persuaded with the Inhabitants to open their Gates, solemnly promising, that if they would so do, they would lay down their Armor, and also that their Cause should be heard in judgment with all equity and justice, and no violence or injury should be shewed against them. Upon this they opened their Gates, and let in Miniers, with his Captains, and all his Army. But the Tyrant, when he was once entered, falsified his promise, and rag'd like a Beast. For first of all he picked out about thirty Men, causing them to be bound, and carried into a Meadow near to the Town, and there to be miserably cut and hewn in pieces of his Souldiers.

Then, because he would leave no kind of cruelty unattempted, he also exercised his fury and outrage upon poor silly Women, and caused forty of them to be taken, of whom divers were great with child, and put them into a Barn full of Straw and Hay, and caused it to be set on fire at four corners; and when the silly Women, running to the great Window where the Hay is wont to be cast into the Barn, would have leaped out, they were kept in with Pikes and Halberds. Then there was a Souldier which moved with pity at the crying out and lamentation of the Women, opened a door to let them out; but as they were coming out, the Tyrant caused them to be slain and cut in pieces, opening their bellies that their Children fell out, whom they trod under their feet. Many were fled into the Wine-cellar of the Cattle, and many hid themselves in Caves, wherof some were carried into the Meadow, and there stripped naked were slain: Other some were bound two and two together, and carried into the Hall of the Cattle, where they were slain by the Captains, rejoicing in their bloody butchery and horrible slaughter.

That done, this Tyrant, more cruel than ever was Herod, commanded Captain John de Gay with a Band of Ruffians to go into the Church, (where was a great number of Women, Children, and young Infants) to kill all that he found there; which the Captain refused at first to do, saying, that were a cruelty unuseful among Men of War. Whereat Miniers being displeased, charged him upon pain of rebellion and disobedience to the King, to do as he commanded him. The Captain fearing what might ensue, entered with his Men, and destroyed them all, sparing neither young nor old.

In this mean while certain Souldiers went to ranck the Houses for the spoil, where they found many poor Men that had there hidden themselves in Cellars, and other privy places, flying upon them, and crying out, Kill, kill. The other Souldiers that were without the Town, killed all that they could meet with. The number of those that were unmercifully murdered, were about a thousand persons of Men, Women, and Children. The Infants that escaped their fury, were baptized again of their Enemies.

In token of this jolly Victory the Pope's Officers caused a Pillar to be erected in the said place of Cabriers, in the which was engraven the year and the day of the taking, and sacking of this Town, by John Miniers Lord of Opede, and chief President of the Parliament of Provence, for a memorial for ever of that barbarous Cruelty, the like wherof was never yet heard of. Whereupon we with all our posterity have to understand what be the reasons and arguments wherewith the Antichrist of Rome is wont to uphold the impious feat of his abomination; who now is come to such excess and profundity of all kinds of Iniquity, that all Justice, Equity and Verity being set aside, he seeketh the defence of his cause by no other thing but only by force and violence, terror and oppression, and shedding of blood.

In this mean while the Inhabitants of Merindol, and other places thereabout, were among the mountains and rocks, in great necessity of victuals, and much affliction; who had procured certain Men which were in some favour and authority with Miniers, to make request for them unto him, that they might depart safely whither it should please God to lead them, with their Wives and Children, altho they had no more but their Shirts to cover their nakedness. Whereunto Miniers made this answer: I know what I have to do; not one of them shall escape my hands; I will send them to dwell in Hell among the Devils.

After this there was a Power sent unto Costa, which likewise they overcame, and committed there great slaughter. Many of the Inhabitants fled away, and ran into an Orchard, where the Souldiers ravished the Women and Maidens; and when they had kept them there inclosed a day and a night, they handled them so beastly, that those which had great Bellies, and the younger Maidens died shortly after. It were impossible to comprehend all the lamentable and sorrowful examples of this cruel Persecution against the Merindolians, and their Fellows, inasmuch that no kind of cruel Tyranny was unpractised: for they which escaped by Woods, and went wandering by Mountains, were taken and set in Gallies, or else were slain outright.

Many which did hide themselves in Rocks and dark Caves, some were famished with hunger, some were smothered with fire and smoke out unto them. All which may more fully be understood by the Records of the Court, and by the Pleas between them and their Adversaries in the high Consistory of the Court of Paris, where all the doors being set open, and in the publick hearing, of all the People, the cause of this Trouble and Persecution was shortly after solemnly debated between two great Lawyers; the one called Aubrius, which accused Miniers the President committed to prison; [and the other called Robertus, the defendant against him. The cause why this matter of Merindol was brought in plea and judgment to be decided by the Law, was this:

When the Merindolians were taken, their Cause was pleaded.

K. Hen. 8. Henry the second, French King, which newly succeeded Francis his Father above-mentioned, considering how this cruel and infamous Persecution against his own Subjects and People was greatly mistified of other Princes, and also objected both against him & his Father as a note of shameful tyranny, by the Emperor himself Charles the fifth, and that in a publick Council of all the States of Germany, for so murdering and spoiling his own natural Subjects, without all reason and mercy; he therefore, to the intent to purge and clear himself thereof, caused the said matter to be brought into the Court, and there to be decided by order of Justice.

The cause of the Merindolians after their death pleased fifty years in the Court. Which Cause, after it was pleaded to and fro in publick Audience, no less than fifty times, and yet in the end could not be determined, so it brake off & was passed over; and at length Minerius, being loosed out of Prison, was restored to his liberty and possessions again, upon this condition and promise made unto the Cardinal Charles of Lorain, that he should banish and expel these new Christians (terming for the true Professors of the Gospel) out of all Province.

The just stroke of God upon cruel Ministers. Thus Minerius being restored, returned again into Province, where he began again to attempt greater tyranny than before. Neither did his raging fury cease to proceed, before the just Judgment of God lighting upon him, brought him by a horrible Disease unto the torments of death, which he most justly had deserved. For he being stricken with a strange kind of bleeding at the lower parts, in manner of a bloody Flux, and not being able to void any Urine, thus by little and little his Guts within him rotted: and when no Remedy could be found for this terrible Disease, and his Intrails now began to be eaten of Vermin, a certain famous Chirurgeon, named La Mote, which dwelt at Arles, a Man no less godly than expert in his Science, was called for; who after he had cured him of this difficulty of making Water, and therefore was in great estimation with him; before he would proceed further to search the other parts of his putrefied Body, and to search out the inward Cause of his Malady, he desired that they which were present in the Chamber with Minerius, would depart a little aside. Which being done, he began to exhort Minerius with earnest words, saying, How the time now required that he should ask forgiveness of God by Christ, for his enormous Crimes and Caudely, in shedding so much innocent Blood, and declared the same to be the cause of this so strange profusion of Blood coming from him.

Minerius seeketh the Blood of his Subjects. These words being heard, so pierced the impure Conscience of this miserable Wretch, that he was therewith more troubled than with the Agony of his Disease: inasmuch that he cried out to lay hand upon the Chirurgeon as an Heretick. La Mote hearing this, effoons conveyed himself out of fight, and returned again to Arles. Notwithstanding it was not long but he was sent for again, being intreated by his Friends, and promised most firmly, that his coming should be without any peril or danger: and so with much ado, he returned again to Minerius, what time all now was past remedy: and so Minerius raging and casting out most horrible and blaspheming words, and feeling a Fire which burnt him from the Navel upward, with extreme Quench of the lower parts, finished his wretched Life. Whereby we have notoriously to understand, that God through his mighty Arm at length confoundeth such Persecutors of his Innocent and faithful Servants, and bringeth them to nought; to whom be praise and glory for ever.

The just stroke of God upon three Persecutors. Moreover, besides this Justice of God shewed upon Minerius, here also is not to be forgotten that which followed likewise upon certain of the other which were the chief doers in this Persecution under Minerius afore said; namely Levis de Vaine, Brother-in-Law to the said President, and also the Brother and the Son-in-Law to Peter Durand, Master-butcher of the Town of Aix; the which three did lay one another, upon a certain trife that fell upon them. And upon the same day the Judg of Aix, who accompanied Minerius in the same Persecution, as he returned homeward, going over the River of Durance, was drowned. Ex hist. Gallica, Henr. Pantat. & alii.

Notes upon the Story of Merindol, above recited.

Thou hast thou heard (loving Reader) the terrible troubles and slaughters committed by the Bishops and Cardinals, against these faithful Men of Merindol, which for the hainous tyranny, and example of the Fact most unmerciful, may be comparable with many of the first Persecutions in the Primitive Church, done either by Decius, or Dioclesianus.

Now touching the said Story and People of Merindol, briefly by the way is to be noted, that this was not the first time that these Men of this Country were vexed; neither was it of late years that the Doctrine and Profession of them began. For (as by the course of Time, and by ancient Records it may appear) these Inhabitants of Province, and other Coasts bordering about the Confines of France, and Piedmont, had their continuance of ancient Time, and received their Doctrine first from the Waldenses, or Albigenses, which were (as some say) about the year of our Lord 1170; or (as others do reckon) about the year of Lord 1216, whereof thou hast (gentle Reader) sufficiently to understand, reading before.

These Waldenses, otherwise called Paspeper of Lugduno, beginning of one Parus Waldus, Citizen of Lion, as is before shewed, by violence of Persecution being driven out of Lion, were dispersed abroad in divers Countries, of whom some fled to Maffia, some to Germany, some to Sarmatia, Livonia, Bohemia, Calabria, and Apulia; divers strayed to the Countries of France, especially about Province and Piedmont, of whom came these Merindolians above mentioned, and the Angroghians with others of whom now it followeth likewise (God willing) to discourse. They which were in the Country of Tolouse, of the place where they frequented, were called Albii, or Albigenses. Against the which Albigenses, Frier Dominicus was a great doer, labouring and preaching against them ten years together; and caused many of them to be burned, for the which he was highly accepted and rewarded in the Apostolical Court, and at length, by Pope Honorius the third, was made Patriarch of the black Guard of the Dominick Friars. Ex Antonio part. 3. titul. 19. Capitulo 1.

These Albigenses, against the Pope of Rome had set up to themselves a Bishop of their own, named Bartholomew, remaining about the Coasts of Croatia and Dalmatia, as appears by a Letter of one of the Pope's Cardinals above specified. For which Cause the See of Rome took great indignation against the said Albigenses, and caused all their faithful Catholics, and Obedientaries to their Church, to rise up in Armour, and to take the sign of the holy Cross upon them, to fight against them, Anno 1206; by reason whereof great multitudes of them were pitifully murdered, not only of them about Tolouse & Avinion in France, (as is afore to be seen) but also in all quarters, miserable slaughters and burnings of them long continued, from the reign of Frederick the second, Emperor, almost to this present time, through the instigation of the Roman Popes.

Paulus Emilius the French Chronicler, in his sixth Book, writing of these Paspeper of Lugduno, and Humiliati, and dividing these two Orders from Albigenses, reporteth that the two former Orders were rejected of Pope Lucius the third. And in their place other two Orders were approved, to wit, the Order of the Dominick Friars, and of the Franciscans. Which seemeth not to be true, forasmuch as this Pope Lucius was twenty years before Innocent the third: and yet neither in the time of Pope Innocent the Order of the Dominick Friars was approved; but in the time of Pope Honorius the third, who was forty years after Pope Lucius. Again, Bernardus Lutzenbergensis, in Catal. Heret. affirmeth, That these Paspeper of Lugduno, or Waldenses, began first, Anno 1218. Which if it be true, then must the other report of Emilius be false, writing of the Sect of Paspeper of Lugduno, to be refused by Pope Lucius the 3d, who was long before this, in the year of our Lord 1187.

Amongst other Authors which write of these Waldenses, See the Sto. Joannes Sleid. lib. 16. intreating of their Continuance and Doctrine, thus writeth of them. There be, faith he, in the French Province a People called Waldays. These of an ancient trade and custom among them, do not acknowledge the Bishop of Rome, and ever have used a manner of Doctrine, somewhat more pure than the rest, but especially since the coming of Luther, they have increased in more knowledge and perfection of judgment. Wherefore they have been oftentimes complained upon to the King, as tho they contemned the Magistrate, and would move Rebellion, with other such Matters falsely furnished against them, more of despite and malice, than of any just cause of truth. There be of them certain Towns and Villages, among which Merindol is one. Against these Merindolians Sentence was given five years past, at Aix, being the high Tribunal Seat or Judgment Place of Provence, that all should be destroyed without respect of Age or Person, in such sort, as that the Houses being plucked down, the Village should be made plain even with the ground, the Trees also should be cut down, and the place altogether made desolate and desert. Albeit, tho it were thus pronounced, yet was it not then put in execution, by the means of certain that perwaded the King to the contrary, namely, one William Belsay, who was at the same time the King's Lieutenant in Piedmont. But at the last, April 12. 1545. John Minierius President of the Council of Aix, calling the Senate, read the King's Letters, commanding them to execute the Sentence given, &c.

Moreover, concerning the Confession and the Doctrine of the said Merindolians, received of ancient time from their Forefathers the Waldenses, thus it followeth in the said Book and Place of John Sleidan.

At last (saith Sleidan) after he had described what great cruelty was shewed against them, when the report hereof was bruited in Germany, it offended the minds of many: and indeed the Switzers, who were then of a contrary Religion to the Pope, intreated the King, that he would shew mercy to such as were fled. Whereunto the said King Francis made answer in this wise; pretending that he had just cause to do as he did: Inferring moreover, that they ought not to be careful what he did within his Dominions, or how he punished his Offenders, more than he was about their Affairs, &c. Thus hard was the King against them, notwithstanding (saith Sleidan) that he, the year before, had received from the said his Subjects of Merindol, a Confession of their Faith and Doctrine: The Articles whereof were, That they, according to the Christian Faith confessed, nrit God the Father, Creator of all things: The Son, the only Mediator and Advocate of Mankind: The Holy Spirit, the Comforter and Instructor of all Truth. They confessed also the Church, which they acknowledged to be the fellowship of God's Elect, whereof Jesus Christ is head. The Ministers also of the Church they did allow, willing that such as did not their Duty should be removed.

And as touching Magistrates, they granted likewise the same to be ordained of God to defend the Good, and to punish the Transgressors. And how they owe to him, not Love only, but also Tribute and Custom, and no Man here-in to be excepted, even by the Example of Christ, who paid Tribute himself, &c.

Likewise of Baptism, they confessed the same to be a visible and an outward sign, that representeth to us the renewing of the Spirit, and mortification of the Members.

Furthermore, as touching the Lord's Supper, they said and confessed the same to be a Thanksgiving, and a Memorial of the benefit received through Christ.

Matrimony they affirmed to be Holy; and instituted of God, and to be inhibited to no Man.

That good Works are to be observed and exercised of all Men, as Holy Scripture teacheth.

That false Doctrine, which leadeth Men away from the true Worship of God, ought to be eschewed.

Briefly and finally, the order and rule of their Faith they confessed to be the Old and New Testament; professing that they believed all such things as are contained in the Apostolick Creed: Desiring moreover the King to give credit to this their declaration of their Faith; so that whatsoever was informed to him to the contrary, was not true, and that they would well prove, if they might be heard.

And thus much concerning the Doctrine and Confession of the Merindolians out of Sleidan, and also concerning their Descent and Offspring from the Waldenses.

TO proceed now further in the persecution of these Waldos, or Waldenses, you have heard hitherto, first how they dividing themselves into divers Counties, some fled to Provence, to Tolous, of whom sufficient hath been said. Some went to Piedmont, and the Valley of Angrogne, of whom it followeth now to intreat. God willing.

Thus these good Men, by long Persecution, being driven from place to place, were grievously in all places afflicted, but yet could never be utterly dejected, nor yet compelled to yield to the superstitious and false Religion of the Church of Rome: but ever abstinant from their corruption and Idolatry, as much as was possible, and gave themselves to the Word of God, as a Rule both truly to serve him, and to direct their lives accordingly.

They had many Books of the Old and New Testament translated into their Language. Their Ministers instructed them secretly, to avoid the fury of their Enemies which could not abide the light, albeit they did not instruct them with such purity as was requisite. They lived in great simplicity, and with the sweat of their brows. They were quiet and peaceable among their Neighbours, abstaining from blasphemy and prophaining of the Name of God by Oaths, and such other impiety: from lewd games, dancing, filthy songs, and other vices and dissolute life, and conformed their life wholly to the rule of God's Word. Their principal care was always, that God might be rightly served, and his Word truly preached: Inasmuch that in our time, when it pleased God to set forth the Light of his Gospel more clearly, they never spared any thing to establish the true and pure ministry of the Word of God and his Sacraments. Which was the cause that Satan with his Ministers did so persecute them of late more cruelly than ever he did before, as manifestly appeareth by the bloody and horrible Persecutions which have been, not only in Provence, against those of Merindol and Cabriers; also against them of Prague and Calabria, (as the Histories afore written do sufficiently declare) but also against them in the Country of Piedmont, remaining in the Valley of Angrogne, and of Lucerne, and also in the Valley of S. Martin and Perouse, in the said Country of Piedmont. Which People of a long time were persecuted by the Papists, and especially within these few years they have been vexed in such sort, and so diversly, that it seemeth almost incredible: and yet hath God always miraculously delivered them, as hereafter shall ensue.

Albeit the People of Angrogne had before this time certain to preach the Word of God, and minister the Sacraments unto them privately; yet in the year of our Lord 1555, in the beginning of the month of August, the Gospel was openly preached in Angrogne. The Ministers and the People intended at the first to keep themselves still as secret as they might: but there was such concourse of People from all parts, that they were compelled to preach openly abroad. For this cause they built them a Church in the midst of Angrogne, where Assemblies were made, and Sermons preached. It hapned about that time, that one John Martin of Briquerat, a mile from Angrogne, which wanted every where, that he would slit the Minister's nose of Angrogne, was assaulted by a Wolf which bit off his nose, so that he died thereof mad. This was commonly known to all the Towns thereabout.

At this season the French King held these foresaid Valleys, and they were under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Thurin. In the end of Decemb. following, news was brought, that it was ordained by the said Parliament, that certain horsemen and footmen should be sent to spoil and destroy Angrogne. Whereupon some which pretended great friendship to this People, counselled them not to go forward with their Enterprize, but to forbear for a while, and to wait for better opportunity. But they notwithstanding calling upon God, determined with one accord constantly to persist in their Religion, and in hope and silence to abide the good pleasure of God: so that this enterprize against Angrogne was soon dashed. The same time they began also openly to preach in Luserna.

In the month of March 1556, the Ministers of the Valley of St. Martin preached openly. At that time certain Gentlemen of the Valley of St. Martin took a good Man named Bartholomew, a Bookbinder, Prisoner, as he passed by the said Valley, which was sent by and by to Turin; and there with a marvellous constancy, after he had made a good Confession of his Faith, he suffered death: inasmuch that divers of the Parliament were astonished and appalled at his constancy. Yet they of the said Parliament, being fore incensed against the Valdoyes, sent one named the President of St. Julian, associating unto him one called Dr. Ecclesia, and others, to hinder their enterprize. These coming first to the Valley of Perouse, whereas yet no Preachers were, but they were accustomed to resort to the Sermons of Angrogne, very much troubled and feared the poor People there.

From thence they went to the Valley of St. Martin, and remained there a good while, tormenting the poor People, and threatening their utter ruin and destruction. After that they came to Luserna, troubling and vexing the People there in like manner. From thence they went to Angrogne, accompanied with many Gentlemen, and a great rabble of Priests of the said Country. But by the way, the President enquired for one dwelling at St. John near to Angrogne, and examined him, Whether he had not baptized his Child at Angrogne, and wherefore he had so done? The poor simple Man answered, that he had baptized his Child at Angrogne, because Baptism was there ministered according to the institution of Christ. Then the President in great rage commanded him in the King's Name to baptize his Child again, or else he should be burnt. The poor Man desired the President that he might be suffered to make his Prayer to God, before he should make answer therunto. Which after he had done in the Hall, before all the company there present, he required the President that he would write, and sign the same with his own hand, that he would discharge him before God, of the danger of that offence, if he should baptize his Child again, and that he would take the peril upon him and his. The President hearing this, was so confounded, that he spake not one word a good while after. Then said he, in a great fury, Away thou Villain out of my sight; and after that he was never called more.

After they were come to Angrogne, the President having visited the two Temples, caused a Monk to preach in the one, the People being there assembled: who pretended nothing else, but only to exhort them to return to the Obedience of the See of Rome. The foresaid Monk, with the President, and all his whole Retinue, kneeled down twice, and called upon the Virgin Mary: but the Ministers and all the People stood still, and would not kneel, making no sign or token of reverence. As soon as the Monk had ended his Sermon, the People requested instantly, that their Minister might also be suffered to preach, affirming that the said Monk had spoken many things which were not according to the Word of God. But the President would not grant their Request. After that the said President admonished them, in the Name of the King and the Parliament of Thurin, that they should return to the Obedience of the Pope, upon pain of loss of Goods and Life, and utter destruction of their Town. And wihal he recited unto them the pious discomfiture of their Brethren and Friends, which had been done before in Merindol and Cabriers, and other places in the Country of Provence. The Ministers and the People answered, that they were determined to live according to the Word of God, and that they would obey the King and all their Superiors in all things, so that God thereby were not displeased: and furthermore, if it were shewed unto them by the Word of God, that they erred in any point of Religion, they were ready to receive correction, and to be reformed. This talk endured about six hours together, even until night. In the end, the President said there should be a Disputation appointed for those matters. Whereunto the People gladly agreed. But after that there was no more mention made thereof.

Notwithstanding he nothing prevailed with all that he could do: but still they continued constant. In so much that they with one accord presented a brief Confession of their Faith, with an answer to certain Interrogatories propounded by the President. In the which they confessed,

The Articles and Confession of the gnians exhibited to the President.

That the Religion wherein both they and their Elders had been long instructed and brought up, was the same which is contained both in the Old and New Testament, the which is also briefly comprised in the twelve Articles of the Christian Belief.

Also, that they acknowledged the Sacraments instituted by Christ, whereby he distributed abundantly his Graces and great Benefits, his heavenly Riches and Treasures to all those which receive the same with a true and lively Faith.

Furthermore, that they received the Creeds of the four General Councils: that is to say, of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, and also the Creed of Athanasius, wherein the Mystery of the Christian Faith and Religion is plainly and largely set out.

Item, The Ten Commandments expressed in the 20th Chapter of Exodus, and in the 5th of Deuteronomy, in the which the Rule of a godly and holy Life, and also the true Service which God requireth of us, is briefly comprised: and therefore following this Article, they suffered not by any means (said they) any gross Iniquities to reign amongst them; as unlawful Swearing, Perjury, Blaiphemy, Cursing, Slandering, Diffention, Deceit, wrong Dealing, Usury, Gluttony, Drunkenness, Whoredom, Theft, Murder, Sorcery, Witchcraft, or such like; but who ly endeavoured themselves to live in the Fear of God, and according to his holy Will.

Moreover, they acknowledged the Superior Powers, as Princes and Magistrates, to be ordained of God; and that whosoever resisteth the same, resisteth the Ordinance of God; and therefore humbly submitted themselves to their Superiors with all obedience, so that they commanded nothing against God.

Finally, they protested, That they would in no point be stubborn, but if that their Forefathers or they had erred in any one jot concerning true Religion, the same being proved by the Word of God, they would willingly yield and be reformed.

Their Interrogatories were concerning the Mass, Auricular Confession, Baptism, Marriage, and Burials, according to the institution of the Church of Rome.

Their Answers to the Interrogatories.
Mass.

To the first they answered, That they received the Lord's Supper as it was by him instituted, and celebrated by his Apostles: but as touching the Mass, except the same might be proved by the Word of God, they would not receive it.

To the second, touching Auricular Confession, they said, that for their part they confessed themselves daily unto God, acknowledging themselves before him to be miserable sinners, desiring of him pardon and forgiveness of their sins, as Christ instructed his in the Prayer which x John 1. he taught them: Lord forgive us our sins. And as St. John faith: If we confess our sins to God, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. And according to that which God himself faith by his Prophet; O Israel, if thou return, return unto me. And again, O Israel, it is I, it is I which forgive thee thy sins. So that, seeing they ought to return to God alone, and it is he only which forgiveth sins, therefore they were bound to confess themselves to God only, and to no other. Also it appeareth, that David in his Psalms, and the Prophets, and other faithful Servants of God, have confessed themselves both generally and particularly unto God alone: yet if the contrary might be proved by the Word of God, they would (say they) with all humbleness receive the same.

Baptism. Thirdly, As touching Baptism, they acknowledged and received that holy Institution of Christ, and administered the same with all simplicity, as he ordained it in his Holy Gospel, without any changing, adding or diminishing in any point, and that all this they did in their Mother-Tongue, according to the Rule of St. Paul, who willeth that in the Church every thing be done in the Mother-Tongue, for the edification of our Neighbour: but as for their Conjurations, Oiling, and Salting, except the same might be proved by the sacred Scripture, they would not receive them.

The manner of Burials. Fourthly, As touching Burials, they answered, that they knew there is a difference between the Bodies of the true Christians and the Infidels, inasmuch as the first are the Members of Jesus Christ, Temples of the Holy Ghost, and partakers of the glorious Resurrection of the Dead, and therefore they accustomed to follow their Dead to the Grave reverently, with a sufficient company, and exhortation out of the Word of God, as well to comfort the Parents and Friends of the Dead, as also to admonish all Men diligently to prepare themselves to die. But as for the using of Candles or Lights, praying for the Dead, ringing of Bells, except the same might be proved to be necessary by the Word of God, and that God is not offended therewith, they would not receive them.

Objection to Mens traditions. Fifthly, As touching obedience to Mens Traditions, they received and allowed all those Ordinances which (as St. Paul faith) serve for Order, Decency, and Reverence of the Ministry. But as for other Ceremonies, which have been brought into the Church of God, either as a part of Divine Service, or to merit remission of Sins, or else to bind Mens Consciences, because they are repugnant to the Word of God, they could by no means receive them.

Councils not to be preferred before God's Word. And whereas the Commissioners affirmed the said Traditions to have been ordained by Councils: first, they answered, that the greatest part of them were not ordained by Councils. Secondly, That Councils were not to be preferred above the Word of God, which faith, If any Man, yea or Angel from Heaven, should preach unto you otherwise, than that which hath been received of the Lord Jesus, let him be accursed. And therefore (said they) if Councils have ordained any thing dissenting from the Word of God, they would not receive it.

Councils not kept of the Pupils in many points. Finally, they said, That the Councils had made divers notable Decrees concerning the election of Bishops and Ministers of the Church: concerning Ecclesiastical Discipline, as well of the Clergy as of the People; also concerning the distribution of the Goods and Possessions of the Church; and further, that all Pastors which were either Whoremongers, Drunkards, or offensive in any case, should be put from their Office. Moreover, that whosoever should be present at the Mass of a Priest which was an Whoremonger, should be excommunicate. And many such other things which were not in any point observed. And that they omitted to speak of many other things which were ordained by divers Councils, very superfluous, and contrary to the holy Commandments of God, as they would be ready to prove (said they) if they should have occasion and opportunity thereunto.

Disputation required. Wherefore they required the Commissioners, that a Disputation might be had (as by the said President was pretended) publicly, and in their presence, and then if it might be proved by the Word of God, that they erred either in Doctrine, or Conversation and manner of living, they were content with all humbleness to be corrected and reformed, as they had before said. Beseeching them to consider also that their Religion had been observed and kept from their Ancestors, until their time, many hundred years together: and yet for their parts, being convicted by the infallible Word of God, they would not obstinately stand to the defence thereof. Saying moreover, that they, together with the said Lords Deputies, confessed all one God, one Saviour, one Holy Ghost, one Law, one Baptism, one Hope in Heaven; and in sum, they affirmed that their Faith and Religion was firmly founded and grounded upon the pure Word of God: wherefore it is said, that blest are they which bear the same, and keep it.

To be short, seeing it is permitted to the Turks, Saracens, and Jews (which are mortal Enemies to our Saviour Christ) to dwell peaceably in the fairest Cities of Christendom; by good reason they should be suffered to live in the desolate Mountains and Valleys, having their whole Religion founded upon the holy Gospel, and worshipping the Lord Jesus, and therefore they most humbly besought them to have pity and compassion upon them, and to suffer them to live quietly in their Deserts; protesting that they and theirs would live in all fear and reverence of God, with all due subjection and obedience to their Lord and Prince, and to his Lieutenants and Officers.

The President, and the rest of the Commissioners, perceiving that they laboured in vain, returned to Thurin with the Notes of their Proceedings: the which immediately were sent unto the King's Court, and there the matter remained one year before there was any answer made thereunto. During which time the Waldos lived in great quietness, as God of his infinite goodness is wont to give some comfort and refreshing to his poor Servants, after long troubles and afflictions. The number of the faithful so augmented, that throughout the Valleys God's Word was purely preached, and his Sacraments duly administered, and no Mass was sung in Angrogne, nor in divers other places. The year after, the President of St. Julian, with his Associates, returned to Pignoral, and sent for thither the chief Rulers of Angrogne, and of the Valley of Luserne, that is, for six of Angrogne, and for two of every Parish besides, and shewed unto them, how that the last year they had presented their Confession, the which, by a Decree made by the Parliament of Turin, was sent to the King's Court, and there diligently examined by learned Men, and condemned as heretical. Therefore the King willed and commanded them to return to the obedience of the Church of Rome, upon pain of loss, both of Goods and Life: in-joining them moreover to give him a direct answer within three days. From thence he went to Luserne, and caused the householders, with great threatenings, to assemble themselves before certain by him appointed: but they with one assent persisted in their former Confession. And lest they should seem stubborn in the defence of any erroneous Doctrine, they desired that their Confession might be sent to all the Universities of Christendom, and if the same in any part by the Word of God were disproved, it should immediately be amended: but contrariwise, if that were not done, then they to be no more disquieted.

The President not contented with this, the next morning sent for six of Angrogne by him named, and for two out of every other Parish, the which he and the Gentlemen of the Country threatened very sore and warned twelve of the chief of Angrogne, and certain of the other Parishes to appear personally at the Parliament of Thurin, and to bring before the Judges of the said Parliament their Ministers and Schoolmasters, thinking, if they were once banished the Country, that then their enterprise might soon be brought to an end. To the which it was answered, that they could not, nor ought not to obey such a Commandment.

A little while after Proclamation was made in every place, that no Man should receive any Preacher coming from Genova, but only such as were appointed by the Archbishop of Thurin, and other his Officers, upon pain of confiscation of their Goods, and loss of their Lives, and that every one should observe the Ceremonies, Rites, and Religion used in the Church of Rome. Furthermore, if any of the foresaid Preachers of Rome came into those quarters, that they should immediately be apprehended, and by no means their abode there by any one to be concealed, upon the pain aforesaid. And furthermore, the names of those which should disclose any one of them should be kept secret, and and also for their accusation, they should have the third part of the Goods confiscated, with a full pardon, if that the said Accusers were any of those which privily did keep or maintain the said Ministers: and that they and all other, which would return to their Mother the Church, might freely and safely come and recant before the said Commissioners.

The Germans under supplication for the Angrogneans.

At the same season the Princes of Germany, and certain of the Switzers, sent unto the French King, desiring him to have pity on the foresaid Churches; and from that time, until three years after, the People of the foresaid Valleys were not molested by any of the Kings Officers, but they were fore vexed by the Monks of Pignerol, and the Gentlemen of the Valley of St. Martin.

Geffrey Variatilis, a virtuous and learned Man, and fearing God, went to visit certain Churches in those Quarters where he was born, and coming homeward was taken at Berge, and from thence led to Tourin, where he, after he had made a good Confession of his Faith, to the confirmation of many, and to the terror of his Adversaries, most constantly suffered.

A notable example of a good Hangman.

About that time a Minister of Angrogne, named Geffrey Variatilis, born in Piedmont, a virtuous and learned Man, and fearing God, went to visit certain Churches in those Quarters where he was born, and coming homeward was taken at Berge, and from thence led to Tourin, where he, after he had made a good Confession of his Faith, to the confirmation of many, and to the terror of his Adversaries, most constantly suffered.

A few days after a Minister of the Valley of Lusene, returning to Geneva, was taken Prisoner at Suse, and soon after sent to Tourin, and with an invincible constancy made his Confession before those of the Parliament, and in the end was condemned to be burnt. The Hangman at the time of Execution, feigned himself to be sick, and so conveyed himself away. And so likewise another served them, being appointed by the foresaid Count to execute the poor Minister. It is credibly reported that the Hangman, which executed certain Gentians a little before, would by no means do this execution. Whereupon the Minister was sent to Prison again, where after long and painful endurance, seeing the Prison door open, he escaped, and returned to his Cure.

Now four years being past, in such manner, as we have hitherto touched in this story, in the year following, which was 1552, there was a Peace concluded between the French King and the King of Spain. Whereupon the Country of Piedmont (certain Towns excepted) was restored to the Duke of Savoy: under whose Regiment the foresaid Churches, and all other faithful People in Piedmont, continued in great quietness, and were not molested: and the Duke himself was content to suffer them to live in their Religion, knowing that he had no Subjects more faithful and obedient than they were. But Satan hating all quietness, by his Ministers stirred the Duke against the said Churches of Piedmont, his own natural Subjects. For the Pope and the Cardinals, seeing the good inclination of the Duke towards this People, incited him to do that, which otherwise he would not. The Pope's Legat also which then followed the Court and others that favoured the Church of Rome, laboured by all means to persuade the Duke, that he ought to banish the said Waldays, which maintained not the Pope's Religion: alleging, that he could not suffer such a People to dwell within his Dominion, without prejudice and dishonour to the Apostolick See. Also that they were a rebellious People against the holy Ordinances and Decrees of their holy Mother the Church. And briefly, that he might no longer suffer the said People, being so disobedient and stubborn against the holy Father, if he would indeed shew himself a loving and obedient Son.

Such devilish Intigations were the cause of these horrible and furious Persecutions, wherewith these poor People of the Valleys, and the Country of Piedmont, was so long vexed. And because they foresaw the great Calamities which they were like to suffer, to find some remedy for the same (if it were possible) all the said Churches of Piedmont, with one common consent wrote to the Duke, declaring in effect, that the only cause why they were so hated, and for the which he was by their Enemies so fore incited against them, was their Religion, which was no new, or light Opinion, but that wherein they and their Ancestors had long continued, being wholly grounded upon the infallible Word of God, contained in the Old and New Testament. Notwithstanding, if it might be proved by the same Word, that they held any false or erroneous Doctrine, they would submit themselves to be reformed with all obedience.

But it is not certain whether this Advertisement was delivered unto the Duke or no: for it was said that he would not hear of that Religion. But howsoever it was in the month of March following, there was a great Perfection raised against the poor Christians which were at Carignan. Amongst whom there were certain godly Persons taken, and burnt within four days after; that is to say, one named Masharine, and his Wife, and John de Carquignam, dwelling in the Valley of Lusene, taken Prisoner as he went to the Market at Pignerol. The Woman died with great constancy. The good Man, John de Carquignam, had been in Prison divers times before for Religion, and was always delivered by God's singular Grace and Providence. But seeing himself taken this last time, incontinent he said, he knew that God had now called him. Both by the way as he went, and in Prison, and also at his death, he shewed an invincible constancy, and marvellous virtue, as well by the pure Confession which he made touching the Doctrine of Salvation, as also in suffering with patience the horrible torments which he endured, both in Prison, and also at his death. Many at that time fled away: others being afraid of that great cruelty, and fearing also Man more than God, looking rather to the Earth than to Heaven, consented to return to the obedience of the Church of Rome.

Masharine and his Wife John de Carquignam, Martyrs.

Within few days after, these Churches of the said Waldays, that is to say, Le Larch, Moronne, Meane, and Suse, were wonderfully assaulted. To recite all the outrage, cruelty, and villany that was there committed, it were too long: for brevities sake we will recite only certain of the principal and best known. The Churches of Meane and Suse suffered great affliction. Their Minister was taken amongst others. Many fled away, and their Houses and Goods were ransacked and spoiled. The Minister was a good and faithful Servant of God, and ended with excellent Gifts and Graces, who in the end was put to most shameful and cruel death. The great patience which he shewed in the midst of the fire, greatly astonished the Adversaries. Likewise the Churches of Larch and Moronne were marvellously tormented and afflicted. For some were taken and sent to the Gallies, other some consented and yielded to the Adversaries, and a great number of them fled away. It is certainly known, that those which yielded to the Adversaries, were more cruelly handled than the others which continued constant in the Truth. Whereby God declareth how greatly he detesteth all such as play the Apostates, and shrink from the Truth.

Persecution beguneth in the Valleys.

The Minister of Meane, martyr.

But for the better understanding of the beginning of this horrible Persecution against the Waldays, here note, that first of all the Proclamations were made in every place, that none should resort to the Sermons of the Lutherans, but should live after the custom of the Church of Rome, upon pain of forfeiture of their Goods, and to be condemned to the Gallies for ever, or lose their lives. Three of the most cruel Persons that could be found, were appointed to execute this Commission. The first was one Thomas Jacomet a Monk, and Inquisitor of the Romish Faith: a Man worthy for such an Office, for he was an Apostate, and had renounced the known Truth, and persecuted mortally and maliciously the poor Christians, against his own Conscience, and of set purpose, as his Books do sufficiently witness: he was also a Whoremonger, and given over to all other Villanies and filthy living, and in the horrible sin of Sodomy, which he commonly used, he passed all his Fel-lows. Briefly, he was nothing else but a mishapen Monster both against God and Nature. Moreover, he so afflicted and tormented the poor Captives of the said Waldays, by spoiling, robbery, and extortion, that he deserved not only to be hanged, but to be broken upon the Wheel too times, and to suffer so many cruel deaths, if it were possible: so great, so many, and so horrible were the Crimes that he had committed.

God's secret judgement upon those that shrink from his Truth.

Cruel Persecutors. To Jacomet a cruel Apostate.

The second was the Collateral Corbis, who in the Examination of the Prisoners, was very rigorous and cruel: for he only demanded of them, Whether they would go to the Mass, or be burnt within three days? and in very deed executed his sayings. But it is certainly reported, that he seeing the constancy, and hearing the Confession of the poor Martyrs, feeling a remorse, and tormented in Conscience, protested that he would never meddle any more.

The signers of the Waldays.

The

The third was the Provost de la Justice, a cruel and crafty Wretch, accustomed to apprehend the poor Christians, either by night, or early in the morning, or in the highway going to the Market, and was commonly lodged in the Valley of Lusarne, or thereabouts. Thus the poor People were always as the silly Sheep in the Wolves Jaws, or as the Sheep which are led unto the Slaughter-house.

The cruel Monks of Pignrol.

At that season one named Charles de Comptes, of the Valley of Lusarne, and one of the Lords of Angrogne, wrote to the said Commissioners, to use some lenity towards them of the Valley of Lusarne. By reason whereof they were a while more gently entreated than the rest. At that season the Monks of Pignrol, and their Associates, tormented grievously the Churches near about them. They took the poor Christians as they passed by the way, and kept them Prisoners within their Abbey. And having assembled a Company of Ruffians, they sent them to spoil those of the said Churches, and to take Prisoners Men, Women, and Children; and some they so tormented, that they were compelled to swear to return to the Mass; other some also they sent to the Gallies, and other some they burnt cruelly. They which escaped, were afterward so sick, that they seemed to have been poisoned. The same year there were two great Earthquakes in Piedmont, and also many great Tempests and horrible Thunders.

Martyrs

The Gentlemen of the Valley of St. Martin, entreated their Tenants very cruelly, threatening them, and commanding them to return unto the Mass; also spoiling them of their Goods, imprisoning them, and vexing them by all the means they could. But above all the other, two especially, that is to say, Charles Truchet, and Boniface his Brother, the which, the second day of April, before day, with a company of Ruffians, spoiled a Village of their own Subjects, named Renclaret: the which as soon as the Inhabitants of the said Village perceived, they fled into the Mountain covered with Snow, naked and without Victual, and there remained until the third night after. In the morning, certain of his Retinue took a Minister of the said Valley Prisoner, which was come out of Calabria, and was going to visit the poor People of Renclaret, and led him Prisoner to the Abby, where soon after he was burnt, with one other of the Valley of St. Martin.

Ch. Truchet and Boniface his Brother, two cruel Persecutors.

A Minister of Calabria burnt.

The third night after, they of Pragela, having pity upon the poor People of Renclaret, sent about four hundred to discomfit the company of the Truchets, and to restore those which were fled to their Houses. They were furiously assailed by the host of their Enemies, who notwithstanding in the end were put to flight, and but one of the four hundred hurt.

God's people rescued.

About the year before, the said Truchet, being accompanied with a company of Ruffians, arrested Prisoner the Minister of Renclaret as he was at his Sermon. But the People were so moved by his outrageous dealing, and especially the Women, that they had almost strangled the said Truchet; and the rest of them were so canvassed, that they had no list to come there again any more. By reason whereof he vexed them by Processes, that they were compelled to agree with him, and to pay him sixteen hundred Crowns.

A Minister of the Valley of Renclaret taken & wounded.

Soon after the Lords of the said Valley took another Minister of the same Valley, as he was going to preach in a Parish a mile from his house, but the People perceiving that, speedily pursued him and took him. The Enemies, seeing that they were not able to lead him away, wounded him so sore, that they left him for dead. Whereupon they so persecuted the poor People, that they were almost destroyed.

Pale complaints brought to the Duke against the Waldos.

Here is not to be forgotten, that the same night, in the which the company of Truchet was discomfited, was so stormy and terrible, and the Gentlemen of that Country were so terrified, that they thought they should have been all destroyed. Wherefore they used more gentleness towards the people than before. Except Charles Truchet and his Brother, the which went to the Duke, and made grievous complaints against the Waldos, not only for that which was done and past, but also perfwaded the Duke, that they went about to build three Fortresses in the Mountains, and also intended to maintain certain Garrisons of Strangers, charging them further with divers other Crimes, of the which they were in no point guilty. The Duke being moved by these false surmises, gave in charge to the said Accusers, that the Fortres of the Valley of St. Martin, the which about twenty years before was razed by the Frenchmen, should be built again, and that therein should be placed a perpetual Garrison, and that the People should make to plain and wide the rugged ways, that Horsemen might easily pass; with divers such other things. And all this to be done at the costs and charges of those that would not submit themselves to the Obedience of the Roman Church.

Chap. 8. What cruel reports are.

This Commission being sealed, the Gentlemen caused the Fortres to be built again, and put therein a Garrison, and proclaimed the Commission. The poor people being thereat amazed, withstood the Commissioners, and sent certain to the Duke: and immediately after the Commissioners returned to the Dukes Court, being at Nice, to inflame his anger more against them. But God soon prevented this mischief: For the Truchets being at Nice, went to the Sea with divers Noblemen, and immediately they were taken Prisoners by the Turks, put into the Gallies, fore beaten with Ropes, and so cruelly handled, that it was commonly reported that they were dead; and long time after, denying their Nobility, were sent home, having paid 400 Crowns for their ransom. Some say, that the Duke himself was almost taken. But it is sure that he fell sick soon after. In the month of April next following, the Lord of Raconis was present at a Sermon, in a place near unto Angrogne. The Sermon being ended, he talked with the Ministers: and having discountred as well of the Duke's sickness, as also of his clemency and gentleness, he declared to them, that the Persecution proceeded not of him, and that he meant not that the Commission should have been so rigorously executed. After that he demanded of them, what way they thought best to appease the Duke's wrath: they answered, that the People ought not to be moved to seek by any means how to please and appease the Duke, which might displease God. But the best way they knew, was the same wherewith the ancient Servants of God used to appease the Pagan Princes and Emperors, in the time of the great persecutions of the Church: that is to say, to give out and present unto them in writing the Confession of their Faith, and defence of the Religion which they professed, trusting that, forasmuch as the fury of divers prophane and Ethnick Emperors and Princes hath been heretofore appeased by such means, the Duke being endued with such singular Vertues as they said he was, would also be pacified by the like means. And for that cause the poor People had before sent a Supplication, with a Confession of their Faith unto the Duke, but they were not certain whether he had received it or no: wherefore they desired him to present the same unto the said Duke himself. Whereunto he agreed, and promised so to do. Whereupon they sent three Supplications, one to the Duke, the second to the Dutchess, and the third to the Duke's Council: wherein they briefly declared what their Religion was, and the Points thereof, which they and their Ancestors had of a long time observed, being wholly grounded upon the pure Word of God: and it by the same Word it would be proved that they were in error, they should not be obstinate, but gladly be reformed, and embrace the Truth. After this the Persecution seemed to be somewhat asswaged for a little while.

The last judgment of God upon the Truchets, so cruelly vexing, spoiling, and scolding of their poor Waldos.

By what means the Christians for times past have appeased the fury of Pagan Princes.

In the end of June next following, the Lord of Raconis and the Lord of Trinity, came to Angrogne, there to qualify (as they said) the sore Persecution, and caused the chief Rulers and Ministers to assemble together, propounding divers Points of Religion concerning Doctrine, the calling of Ministers, the Mass, and obedience towards Princes and Rulers: and furthermore declared unto them, that their Confession was sent unto Rome by the Duke, and daily they looked for answer. To all these Points the Ministers answered. After this they demanded of the chief Rulers, if that the Duke should cause Mass to be sung in their Parishes, whether they would withstand the same or no? They answered simply, that they would not. Then they demanded of them, if that the Duke would appoint them Preachers, whether they would receive them? They answered, that if they preached the Word of God purely, they would hear them. Thirdly, if that they were content that in the mean time their Ministers should cease, and if they which should be sent preached not the Word of God sincerely, then their Ministers to preach again. If they would agree to this, they were promised that the Persecution should cease, and the Prisoners should be restored again. To this question, after they had conferred with the People, they answered,

The Angrogneans send forth three Supplications.

The Confession of the Angrogneans sent to the Pope. Demands put to the Angrogneans.

R. Hen. S. answered, that they could by no means suffer that their Ministers should forbear preaching.

The two Lords not contented with this Answer, commanded in the Duke's Name, that all the Ministers which were strangers, should out of hand be banished the Country; saying, that the Duke would not suffer them to dwell within his Dominion for that they were his Enemies. Demanding also whether they would foster and maintain the Princes Enemies within his own Land against his own Decree and expresse Commandment? To the which answer was made by the chief Rulers, That they could by no means banish them, unless they were afore convicted of some Heretic or other Crime; for their part they had always found them to be Men of pure and sound Doctrine, and also of godly life and Conversation.

The done, immediately Proclamations were made, and the Persecution began on every side to be more furious than it was before. Amongst others, the Monks of Pignoral at that time were most cruel; for they sent out a Company of hired Ruffians which daily spoiled and ransacked houses, and all that they could lay hands of; took Men, Women, and Children, and led them Captives to the Abby, where they were most spitefully afflicted and tormented. At the same time they sent also a Band of the said Ruffians by night to the Ministers house of St. Germain, in the Valley of Perouse, being led thither by a Traitor that knew the house, and had used to haunt thither secretly; who knocking at the door, the Minister knowing his voice, came forth immediately, and perceiving himself to be betrayed, fled; but he was taken and sore wounded, and yet notwithstanding they pricked him behind with their Halberds to make him hasten his pace. At that time also many they slew, many they hurt, and many also they brought to the Abby, and there kept them in Prison, and cruelly handled them. The good Minister endured sore Imprisonment, and after that a most terrible kind of death with a wonderful Conscience; for they roasted him by a small fire; and when half his body was burnt, he confessed and called upon the Lord Jesus with a loud voice.

The Inquisitor Jacomel, with his Monks, and the collateral Carbis amongst other, slewed one Practice of most barbarous Cruelty against this poor Man; who when he should be burnt, caused two poor Women of St. Germain (which they kept in Prison) to carry Fagots to the fire, and to speak these Words unto their Pastor; Take this thou wicked Heretic, in recompence of thy naughty Doctrine, which thou hast taught us. To whom the good Minister answered; Ah good Woman! I have taught you well, but you have learned ill. To be brief, they so afflicted and tormented those poor People of St. Germain, and the places thereabout, that after they were spoiled of their Goods, and driven from their houses, they were compelled to flee into the Mountain to save their lives. So great was the spoil of these poor People, that many which before had been Men of much Wealth, and with their Riches had ministered great Succour and Comfort to others, were now brought to such misery, that they were compelled to crave Succour and Relief of others.

Now so far as much as the said Monks, with their Troops of Ruffians (which were counted to be in number about three hundred) made such spoil and havock in all the Country, that no Man could there live in safety: It was demanded of the Ministers, Whether it was lawful to defend themselves against the Insolence and furious Rage of the said Ruffians? The Ministers answered, That it was lawful, warning them in any case, to take heed of Bloodshed. This Question being once dissolved, they of the Valley of Luferne and of Angrongne, sent certain Men to them of St. Germain to aid them against the Supporters of these Monks.

In the Month of June the Harvest being then in Primment, divers of the Waldays were gone into the Country to reap and to make provision for Corn, for very little growth upon their Mountains: the which were all taken Prisoners at sundry times and places, not one knowing of another; but yet God so wrought, that they all escaped out of Prison, as it were by a Miracle: whereat the Advocates were marvelously astonished. At the same time there were certain other also which had sustained long Imprisonment, looking for nothing else but death; and yet they after a wonderful sort, by God's merciful Providence, were likewise delivered.

In the Month of July they of Angrongne being in a morning at harvest upon the Hill side of St. Germain, perceived a Company of Soldiers spoiling them of St. Germain; and doubting lest they should go to Angrongne, made an out-cry. Then the People of Angrongne assembled together upon the Mountain, and some ran to St. Germain over the Hill, and some by the Valley. They which went by the Valley met with the Spoilers coming from St. Germain, laden with Spoil, which they had gotten, and being but fifty, set upon the other, amounting to the number of one hundred and twenty Men well appointed, and gave them soon the overthrow. The Passage over the Bridge being stopped, the Enemies were fain to take the River Cluzon, where divers were sore hurt, many were drowned, and some escaped very hardly, and such a Slaughter was made of them, that the River was dyed with the Blood of them which were wounded and slain, but none of the Angrongnians were once hurt. If the said River had been as great as it was wont commonly to be, there had not one Man escaped alive. The noise of the Haxquibasses was great, and within less than one hours space, there was three or four hundred of the Waldays gathered together upon the River; and at the same time they had purposed to fetch away their Prisoners which were in the Abby, but they would not do it without the Counsel of their Ministers, and so deferred the matter until the next day. But their Ministers counselled them not to enterprise any such thing, but to refrain themselves, and so they did. Albeit they doubted not, but if they had gone incontinent after that discomfiture unto the Abby, they might have found all open and easily have entered; for the Monks were so sore afraid, that they fled suddenly to Pignoral, to save their Reliques and Images, which they carried thither. The rest of the Country about were wonderfully afraid, and rang the Bells every where. The greater part of them fled, doubting lest the poor Waldays would have revenged the Wrongs and Outrages done to them.

The next day following, the Commander of St. Anthony de Fossan came to Angrongne, accompanied with divers Gentlemen, saying, that he was sent by the Duke; and having assembled the chief Rulers and Ministers of Angrongne, and of the Valley of Luferne, after he had declared unto them the cause of his coming, he read their Supplication directed to the Duke, which contained their Confession, demanding of them, if it were the fine which they had sent to the Duke? They answered, yea. Then he began to dispute, being sent, as he said, to inform them of their Errors, not doubting but they would amend according to their promise. Then he entered into a Disputation of the Mais, in a great heat, deriving the same from the Hebrew word Massa, which signified (as I have said) a great word, and shewed that this word Massa might be derived out of the Hebrew word; and further, that they did apply the Hebrew word; and further, that they did not of the word Missa, but of that which is signified by the same, the which he ought first to prove by the Word of God, or the ancient Fathers their private Mais, their Sacrifice expiatory or propitiatory, their Transubstantiation, their Adoration, their Application of the same for the quick and the dead, and such other matters which are principal parts of the same Mais. The Commander having here nothing to reply, fell into a marvellous Choller, railing and raging as if he had been stark mad, and told them that he was not come to dispute, but to banish their Ministers, and to place others in their rooms, by the Duke's Commandment, which he could not, unless their Ministers were first driven out of the Country.

From thence he went to the Abby of Pignoral, where he and Jacomel caused a number of the poor Inhabitants of Campillon, and of Fent, which be of the Valley of Luferne, to be taken Prisoners, spoiling them of their Goods, driving away their Cattel, and forcing them to swear and forswear, and in the end ransomed them for great Sums of Money. About that time a Gentleman of Campillon agreed with those which were fled, for thirty Crowns to be paid unto him out of hand, that he would warrant them from any further vexation or trouble, so that they remained quiet at home. But when he had received the Money, he caused the Commander of Fossan with his Men by night to come to his house, and then sent for the poor Men, thinking continually to have delivered them into the hands of their mortal Enemy, following therein the Decree of the Council of Constance, which is, That no promise is to be kept to Hereticks. But God, knowing how to succour his people in their necessity, prevented this danger; for one of them, of great Intelligence of the Commanders coming, and so they were warned. Thereupon they wrote to the Lord of Raconis, declaring unto him the proceedings of the Commander, and that he neither would nor could shew or prove any thing by the Word of God, as he had promised, but threatened them great Wrongs and Injuries, and would not suffer their Ministers to reply or say any thing for the defence of their Cause. And therefore they desired him to signify the same to the Dukes Grace, to the end that he should not be offended, if they persisted still in their Religion, seeing it was not proved unto them by any reason taken out of the Scripture, that they erred.

After this, there were many Commandments and Injunctions given out through all the Country, to banish these poor Waldosy, with the Doctrine of the Gospel, if it were possible, out of the Mountains and Valleys of Piedmont: but the poor people still desired, that according to that which they had so often before protested by Word and Writing, they might be suffered to serve God purely, according to the rule prescribed in his Word: simply obeying their Lord and Prince always, and in all things. Notwithstanding they were still vexed and tormented with all the Cruelty that could be devised, as partly it is already declared; but much more you shall perceive by that which followeth.

In the end of October next following, the rumor went that an Army was levying to destroy them; and in very deed there were certain Bands levied, ready to march at an hours warning. Furthermore, those Malefactors which heretofore were fled or banished for any Offence or Crime committed, were called home again, and pardoned of all together, so that they would take them to their Weapons, and go to destroy the Waldosy. The Ministers and chief Rulers of the Valleys of Luserne and Angrongne, thereupon assembled together oftentimes to take advice what in such an extremity were best to do. In the end they determined, that for certain days following there should be kept a general Fast, and the Sunday after, a Communion. Also that they should not defend themselves by force of Arms, but that every one should withdraw himself to the high Mountains, and every one to carry away such Goods as they were able to bear; and if their Enemies pursued them thither, then to take such advice and Counsel as it pleased God to give them. This Article of not defending themselves seemed very strange to the people, being driven to such an extremity, and the Cause being so just. But yet every one began to carry their Goods and Victuals into the Mountains, and for the space of eight days all the Ways were filled with comers and goers to the Mountains, like unto Ants in Summer, which provide for Winter. All this did they in this great Perplexity and Danger, with a wonderful Courage and Cheerfulness, praising of God, and singing of Psalms, and every one comforting another. Briefly, they went with such joy, and alacrity, that you should not have seen any which grudged to leave their houses, and fair Possessions, but were wholly determined patiently to abide the good pleasure of God, and also to die if he had so appointed.

A few days after, certain other Ministers hearing what they of Angrongne and Luserne had concluded, wrote unto them, that this Resolution seemed very strange to some, that they ought not to defend themselves against the Violence of their Enemies, alledging many reasons, that in such extremity and necessity it was lawful for them so to do, especially the quarrel being so just, that is, for the defence of true Religion, and for the preservation of their own lives, and the lives of their Wives and Children, knowing that it was the Pope and his Ministers which were the cause of all these Troubles and cruel Wars, and not the Duke, who was stirred up thereunto only by their Intigations. Wherefore they might well and with good Conscience withstand such furious and outrageous Violence. For the Proof hereof they also alledged certain Examples.

During this season the Lord of Angrongne named Charles de Compiers of Luserne, laboured earnestly by all means possible to cause them of Angrongne to condescend to the Duke's pleasure, and solicited them to send away their Ministers, promising that he would cause a Mass to be sung at Angrongne, and that the people should not be compelled to be present thereat, hoping that by that means the Duke's wrath would be appeased. The chief of Angrongne thereupon were assembled and made this Answer; That if the Duke would permit them to chafe other Ministers, they were content to send away their foreign Ministers and Strangers. But as touching the Mass, his Highness might well cause it to be sung in their Parishes, but they for their part could not with safe Consciences be present at the same, nor yet give their consent unto it.

The two and twentieth of October the said Lord of Angrongne went from Luserne to Mondevis, where he was then Governour for the Duke, and sent for the chief Rulers of Angrongne at several times, declaring unto them the great perils and dangers wherewith they were environed, the Army being already at hand; yet promising them, if they would submit themselves unto him, he would send immediately to stay the Army. They of Angrongne answered, That they all determined to stand to that which they, two days before in their Assembly, had put in writing. With this Answer he seemed at that present to be content. The next day the rumor was, That they of Angrongne had submitted themselves to the Duke. On the morrow, which was Sunday, you should have seen nothing but weeping and mourning in Angrongne. The Sermon being ended, the Rulers were called before the Ministers and the People, the which affirmed, that they wholly cleaved unto their former writings; and they sent secretly to the Notary for the Copy of that which was passed in the Council-house at their last Assembly before the Lord of Compiers, in which was comprised, That Angrongne had wholly submitted her self to the good pleasure of the Duke. The People hearing that, were sore astonished, and protested rather to dishonour than obey the same. And hereupon it was agreed, that at that very instant (albeit it were very late) certain should be sent to the Lord of Angrongne to signify unto him, that the determination of the Council was falsified, and that it might please him the next morning to come to Angrongne to hear the voices of the People, not only of the Men, but also of the Women and Children. But he himself went not thither, having intelligence of the Uprore, but sent thither the Judge of that place. Then that which had been falsified was duly corrected; the Judge laying all the blame upon the Notary.

During this time the Adversaries cried out through all the Country of Piedmont; To the fire with them, to the fire with them. The Thursday after Angrongne, by Proclamations set up in every place, was expoled to the Fire and Sword. On Friday after, being the second of November, the Army approached to the borders of the Valley of Luserne, and certain Horse-men came to a place called St. John, a little beneath Angrongne. Then the people retired into the Mountains. Certain of St. John perceiving that the Horse-men not only spoiled their Goods, but also took their Fellows Prisoners, set upon them. It is not certain what number of their Enemies were there slain; but suddenly they retired to Bubiane, where their Camp then was, and not one of them of St. John was slain or hurt. It happened at the same time, that two of the aforesaid Horsemen, being sore amazed, galloped before the rest towards the Army, being ready to march towards Angrongne, crying, They come, they come. At whose cry the whole Army was so astonished, that every Man fled his way, and they were all so scattered, that the Captains that day were not able to bring them in order again, and yet no Creature followed them.

On the Saturday in the Morning the Army mustered in the Meadow-ground of St. John, near to Angrongne. They of Angrongne had sent certain to keep the Passages, and stop the Army that they should not enter, if it were possible. In the mean season the people retired into the Meadow of Torre, and little thought of the coming of the Army so soon, or that they would have made such a sudden Assault; for they were yet carrying of Victuals and other stuff, so that few of them kept the Passages. Now they which kept the Straits, perceiving that their Enemies prepared themselves to fight, fell down upon their knees, and made their Prayers unto God, that it would please him to take pity upon them, and not to look upon their sins, but to the Cause which they maintained, to turn the hearts of their Enemies, and so to work, that there might be no effusion of Blood: and if it were his Will to take them, with their Wives and Infants out of this World, that he would then mercifully receive them into his Kingdom. In this sort most fervent Prayers were made of all those that kept the Passages, with Exhortation that they should all together cry unto God, and crave his succour and assistance in this great distress. All this the Lord of Trinity and the Army did well perceive.

Their Prayers thus ended, suddenly they perceived their Enemies coming towards them through the Vines to win the top of the Mountain of Angrogne. In the mean time the Prior of St. John and Jacomet were within the Temple of Angrogne, and communed with the Rulers touching an Agreement. These were sent thither by the Lord of Trinity to keep the People occupied. To be short, the Combat began in divers places, and endured for a long space in the Passages of Angrogne. The poor Waldosy being but few in number, and some of them having but Slings and Cross-bows, were fore pressed with the multitude of their Enemies. At length they retired to the top of the Mountain, where they defended themselves until Night.

When they had found a place where they might withstand their Enemies still pursuing them, they returned themselves, and slew divers of them, and hurt many. When the Evening came, the Enemies rested, and were about to encamp themselves, there to sup and lodge all night. Which thing when the Angrogians perceived, they fell to prayer, desiring God to assist and succour them, but the Enemies flouted them and laughed them to scorn. Then the poor people devised to send a Drum into a little Valley hard by. And as they were making their Prayers unto God, and the Drum sounded in the Valley, the Lord of Trinity caused his Souldiers, which were about to encamp themselves, to remove thence; which was a great vantage unto the poor People, which now were sore wearied with travel, all wet with sweating, and very thirsty, and in great peril, if God had not given them some little breathing-time. Many of the Enemies that day were slain, and many hurt, of the which very few escaped; in-fomuch that they reported that the shot was poisoned, which this poor simple people never used to do in all these Wars. Of the Angrogians that day there were but three slain, and one hurt, which afterwards was well healed again. This Combat gave great courage to the Waldosy, and fore astonished the Adventurers. The same time the Army retiring, burnt many houses, and made great spoil as they went, destroying also the Vines which were in the Prefes.

The said Lord of Trinity with his Army camped in a Village beyond Tours, in the Valley of Lusene, at the foot of the hill, between Angrogne and the other Towns of the Valley of Lusene, which possessed the Gospel. They of the said Village were always fore against the Waldosy, Haters of true Religion, and were glad of this Out-rage and Violence done against the Professors thereof: but they had their just Plague, for they were all destroyed. After this the said Lord of Trinity caused the Fortrefs to be built again, which the Frenchmen had razed, and placed there a Garrison, and after sent another to the Fort of Villars, which is of the Valley of Lusene; and another he sent to the Fortrefs of Peruse, and a fourth Garrison he placed in the Castle of St. Martin. They of Angrogne (seeing themselves to be now, as it were, in a Sea of Troubles) after they had recommended themselves unto God by Prayer, and committed their cause unto him, sent to them of Peruse, St. Martin, and of Proglas, for aid and succour; which sent them all the help they were able.

The next day following there came Letters to Angrogne from the Lord of Trinity: the effect whereof was this; That he was sorry for that which was done the day before, and that he came not thither to make War against them, but only to view if it were a place convenient to build a Fort therein to serve the Duke. Furthermore, that his Souldiers seeing the People assembled, as it were to defend them, upon that occasion only were stirred up to give assault, and to set upon them. Also that he was sorry that such spoil was made of their Goods, and such hurt done by fire. But if they would shew themselves obedient to the Duke, he had good hope that all should be well, and trusted some good Agreement should be made. The Angrogians answered, That they were marvellously aggrieved to be so assaulted, spoiled and tormented by the Subjects of their Leige and natural Prince: And as they had oftentimes before offered themselves to be more obedient and faithful to their Sovereign Prince the Duke, than any of all his Subjects besides; so yet they still offered the same Obedience. Also they most humbly besought him, not to think it strange if they, being constrained by such extreme necessity, defended themselves. Finally, as touching their Religion, they affirmed, that it was the pure Word of God, even as it was preached by the Prophets and Apostles, and the same which their Predecessors had observed for certain hundred years past. Moreover, that the cause was not concerning the Goods of the World, but the Honour and Glory of God, the Salvation or Destruction of the Souls both of them and theirs. And therefore it were much better for them to die all together, than to forsake their Religion. And yet if it might be proved unto them by good Demonstration out of the Word of God, that they were in error; not by force of Arms, by Blood and Fire, they would then yield themselves with all obedience; most humbly beseeching him, and all other the Lords of the Country of Piedmont, to be their Intercessors and Advocates to the Duke in this behalf.

Upon Monday being the fourth day of November, the Lord of Trinity sent his Army to Villars and Tailleur. The lesser Company ascended towards Villars. The People seeing their Enemies approaching, after they had called upon God with fervent Prayer, strongly defended themselves, and slew many: many also were hurt, and the rest fled. The other Company ascended towards Tailleur. And altho they of that place were but few in number, and that part of the Army the greater, yet making their Prayers unto God, and commending their Cause unto him, they defended themselves likewise valiantly.

In the mean season, they of Villars being emboldened by their late Victory, came to assist their Neighbours, and being assembled together, they courageously pursued their Enemies, and put them to flight. In this Pursuit it chanced (which here is not to be forgotten) that this poor people, by an Ambush of their Enemies which came another way, were suddenly enclosed on every side, and like to be destroyed; but yet they all escaped, and not one of them was slain, only three were hurt, which were soon cured again. On the Enemies side there were so many slain, that they were laid together by whole Cart-loads. This was the Reward of those which were desirous to shed innocent Blood. The same day the Inhabitants of Sanfio near to Roccapia, assembled in great number together, and went to a Rich Man's house of Roccapia, and spoiled all that he had. Certain of Roccapia (in number not past seventeen) understanding this, set upon them, and soon put them to flight, took away their Drum, and forced them to leave their Booty behind them.

After that the Lord of Trinity had received the Letters of the Angrogians, he sent unto them his Secretary, named Christopher Galtan, (which said himself, that he favoured the Verity of the Gospel) accompanied with a Gentleman of the said Valley; whose charge was to cause the chief Rulers to send certain to commune with the same Lord of Trinity, saying, that he had good tidings to declare unto them; and moreover, that he would deliver them a safe Conduct to come and go. Whereupon they sent four unto him, whom he intreated very courteously, and rehearsed unto them, how the Duke at his Departure from the Court, told him, that altho the Pope, the Princes and Cities of Italy, yea, his own Council were fully resolved, that of necessity they of the said Religion should be destroyed, yet notwithstanding, God otherwise put into his mind, and that he had taken Counsel of God what he should do in this matter; that is, that he would use them gently. Furthermore, he declared unto them, that the Dutches bear their good affection, and favoured them very much, and that he had commended their Cause unto the Duke, persuading with him to have regard to that poor People, and that their Religion was ancient and old, with many such other things. Moreover, they had, said he, great Friends in the Duke's Court, not doubting but if they should send certain to the Court with a Supplication, they should obtain more than they themselves would require; and he for his part would imply himself in their Affairs to the uttermost of his power: and so he promised that he would retire himself with his Army. This he seemed to speak unfeignedly. The People desiring but to live peaceably in their Religion, and under the Obedience of their lawful Prince, were content to follow his Council.

About this season they of Angrongne perceived that a part of the Army attended the Hill of Tailletes, (which is the half way between Angrongne and those of the Valley of Lufene) and the other part had already gotten away, which led to the Meadow of Toure, by the which they of Angrongne might easily have been inclosed. Therefore they sent certain immediately to keep the Way, who soon after encountered with their Enemies and obtained the Victory, pursuing and chasing them to their Camp, not without great loss of their Men. The number of their Enemies slain, was not known; for their custom was immediately to carry away those which were slain. Not one of Angrongne perished that day, nor yet was hurt. It was feared that this Combat would have hindered the Agreement; but the Lord of Trinity could well dissemble the matter, and excused that days Journey, putting the fault upon them of Tailletes, whom he charged to have slain certain of his Men in the High-way, and amongst other his Barbar.

A combat between the Angrongnians and the Perfidious.

The crafty dissembling of the Lord of Trinity.

On Saturday following, being the ninth of November, the said Lord of Trinity sent again for them of Angrongne, to consult with them touching the Agreement, using the like Communication as before; and added thereunto, that in token of true obedience they should carry their Armour into two of the Houses of the chief Rulers, not fearing, but it should be safe; for it should remain in their own keeping, and if need were, they should receive it again. Also, that he upon Sunday (which was the next day) would cause a Mass to be sung within the Temple of St. Laurance in Angrongne, accompanied with a very few, and thereby the Duke's wrath would be asswaged.

The next morning he went into the Temple (whereat they were fore agrieved, albeit they could not withstand him) his Army marching afore him: and having caused a Mass to be sung, he desired to see the Meadow of Toure, so much spoken of, that thereof he might make a true Report unto the Duke; and thither the Rulers with a great Troop of his own Men went, the residue of his Company remained behind; the which spoiled certain Houses, and seized the Armour which they had delivered up before; but they found no great store, for the People had taken away the greatest Part thereof. The said Lord being entered into the Meadow of Toure, the People began to make a Commotion; whereof he having intelligence, returned immediately. All that day he shewed himself very courteous to all whom he met.

Rebelling the Duke he drew him and dissembling the Perfidious to bring their wicked purpose to pass.

The People in this mean time perceived themselves to be in great danger, and were fore moved at the sight of the Army, the Spoil of the Souldiers, the taking away of their Armour, but especially because the said Lord of Trinity had viewed the Meadow of Toure, foreseeing his traitorous meaning and purpose. A few days after the said Lord of Trinity sent his Secretary Gastaut to Angrongne to talk with them concerning the Agreement, and to make a full Resolution thereof: which was read in the Assembly by the Secretary; the Sum whereof was this: That the People of Angrongne submitted themselves to render all Honour and Reverence to God according to his holy Word, and all due obedience to the Duke their Sovereign Prince, to whom they should send certain Men to demand Pardon of him, concerning their bearing Armour in their extreme necessity, and humbly to beseech him that he would suffer them to live peaceably in their Religion, which was according to the Word of God, not compelling them to do any thing against their Conscience; as it appeareth more amply in the Supplication, which after this the Angrongnians made, and caused to be read before the Secretary in the open Assembly, the which here ensueth.

To the most excellent and worthy Prince, the Duke of Savoy, &c. our Sovereign Lord and natural Prince

K. Hen. 8.

Most Noble and Renowned Prince, we have sent certain of our Men unto your Highness, to give testimony of our humble, hearty, and unfeigned Obedience unto the same, and with all submission desire Pardon touching the bearing of Armour by certain of our People in their extreme necessity, and for all other our Treipasses, for the which your Sovereign Grace might conceive any offence against us.

The Supplication of the Angrongnians to their Duke.

Secondly, To define in most humble wise your said Highness, in the Name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that it would please the same, to suffer us to live with freedom of Conscience in our Religion, which also is the Religion of our Ancestors, observed for certain hundred years past. And we are persuaded, that it is the pure Gospel of our Lord Jesus, the only Verity, the Word of Life and Salvation, which we profess. Also, that it may please your most gracious Clemency not to take in ill part, if we, fearing to offend and displease God, cannot content unto certain Traditions and Ordinances of the Church of Rome, and herein to have pity upon our poor Souls, and the Souls of our Children, to the end that your Highness be not in any wise charged in the just Judgment of God for the same, where all Men must appear to answer for their doings.

A lawful request of the Angrongnians to live after Gods Word.

On our part, we protest that we will seek nothing but to be the true Servants of God, to serve him according to his holy Word; and also to be true and loyal Subjects to your Highness, and more obedient than any other, being always ready to give our Goods, our Bodies, our Lives, and the Lives of our Children, for your Noble Grace, as also our Religion teacheth us to do: only we desire that our Souls may be left at liberty to serve God according to his holy Word.

And we your poor humble Subjects shall most heartily pray our God and Father for the good and long Prosperity of your Highness, for the most virtuous Lady your Wife, and for the Noble House of Savoy.

To this Supplication they of St. John, of Roccapia, of St. Barisalem, and of Perouse, with those of the Valley of Lufene, did agree. For it was concluded, that the Agreement made should extend to all the Confederate of the same Religion. Whiles they were treating of this Agreement, the Lord of Trinity vexed cruelly them of Tailletes, under this pretence, because they had not presented themselves to treat of this Agreement: He commanded them after this sort; first he commanded that all their Armour should be brought before him, and then they on their knees, should ask him pardon, because they came not to treat of the Agreement with the rest; which notwithstanding the most part of them did. Then he commanded them to attend upon him, to know all the Names of those which would be of the foresaid Agreement.

The wicked dealing of the Lord of Trinity against them of Tailletes.

Whereupon the next morning the chief of the Householdiers went to the Village named Bouvet, the place appointed thereunto, and when they had heard a Sermon, and called upon God, they began to write their Names. The unrolling of their Names not being fully ended, word was brought, that the Souldiers had gotten the top of the Mountain, and had taken all the Passages; whereat they of Tailletes were fore amazed, and ran with all speed to defend their Wives and Children. Some they saved, the most part with their Goods, were in their Enemies hands already. At this time with sacking, spoiling and burning, they did much mischief.

After this the Lord of Trinity sent word to them which were fled, that, if they would return, he would receive them to mercy. The poor people for the most part, trusting on his promise, returned to Bouvet, and yet the next morning the Souldiers came thither to apprehend them and their Ministers, and beset the place on every side. Such as were swift of foot, and could shift best, escaped, but very hardly: The rest were all hurt or taken, and yet they all escaped by a marvelous means: for it happened that there was an old Man which could not run fast, to whom one of the Souldiers came with a naked Sword in his hand to have slain him. caught the Souldier by the Legs, overthrew him, and drew him by the heels down the hill.

The Souldier cried out, Help, help, this Villain will kill me. His Fellows hearing him cry, made haste to rescue him; but in the mean time the old Man escaped. The rest seeing what the old Man had done, took heart of Grace, and albeit their Armour and Weapons were taken from them, yet with Stones and Slings they fo beat and discomfited their Enemies, that for that present time they carried no Prisoners away.

The day following the Souldiers returning to the said Tailleur, robbed, spoiled, and carried away all that they could finde, and so continued three days together; which was very easie for them to do, because the poor Men, fearing lest they should be charged with violating the Agreement, made no resistance, but retired towards Villars.

The Village of Tailleur's spoiled.

The fourth day the said Lord of Trinity, to torment the poor Tailleur yet more cruelly, sent his Army again before day to the Mountain, and into the same place, and because the People of the said Village were retired towards Villars, and scattered about the Borders thereof in the high Mountains, the Souldiers not yet satisfied with spoiling and lacking the rest that they found in the said Tailleur, ranging about the Confinies thereof, ravaged and made havoc on every side of whatsoever they could lay hands on, taking Prisoners both Men and Women, which were laden with carriage.

The cruelty of Tailleur's.

The poor Prisoners were cruelly handled. Amongst other there was one, whose Ear a Souldier of Mondeur, in a raging fury, bit clean off, with these words, I will carry, said he, the flesh of this wicked Hereticks with me into my Country. They of Villars also complained of the great Cruelty that was shewed unto them, during the time of the Agreement.

The which when the Lord of Trinity understood, to make a shew that he was offended therewith, he came to his Souldiers (which were so weary that they could scarcely go, not with fighting, but because they were so heavily laden with spoil, that they were not able to carry it) and pretending to be in great choler, he bade them, and some things also of a small value he caused to be restored, but all the rest was kept back and carried away. The same day two Women, the Mother and the Daughter, were found in a Cave in the Mountain, wounded to death by the Souldiers, and died immediately after. So likewise a blind Man, an hundred years of age, which was fled into a Cave with his Son's Daughter being eighteen years old, which fed him, was slain by the Enemies, and as they would have forced the Maiden, the escaped from them, and fell from the top of the Mountain, and died.

Two Women were found in the Cave, the Mother and the Daughter, Martyrs. The Grandfather and his Niece died Martyrs.

At that time also a great Company of Women of Tailleur and Villars were taken as they fled, with their Goods, and brought to the Camp, and sent away empty. There was at the same time a certain Souldier which promised the Lord of Trinity to find out the Minister of Tailleur, and to deliver him into his own hands. And to bring his purpose to pass, he never ceased until he had found him, and after that he pursued him a long time. But as he was pursuing and chaling him, certain at unawares coming out of the Mountain, rescued the poor Minister, and killed the Souldier with stones.

A wicked Pursuer killed with stones.

But this especially is to be noted, that during these troubles divers of the Papiists had sent their Daughters into the Mountains unto the Waldos to be kept, fearing lest they should have been ravished by the Souldiers, being wholly given over as to all Cruelty and Rapine, so to all Villany and Abomination, by whom they were before threatened to be so abused.

All this being done, the said Lord of Trinity caused the head Officers and chieft of the People to assemble together, and declared unto them, that the maintaining of the Army was a great charge to the Duke, and that it was meet that they should bear the one half of the Charges. For this cause he demanded of them twenty thousand Crowns. But by the means of the Secretary Goustant, who was promised a hundred Crowns for his Wine (that is to say, for a Bribe) four thousand of those twenty were abated, so that they granted unto him sixteen thousand, of the which Sum the Duke released the one half. Then the Lord of Trinity pressed this poor People to deliver the eight thousand out of hand, to pay the Souldiers their Wages (as he said) and so withdrew his Army. The year before Corn was exceeding dear, for a Sack was commonly sold for six Crowns; yea, and some for eight Crowns, and also they had very little Corn growing upon their Mountains: wherefore they were now very bare of Money. But they being in this perplexity, and desiring nothing more than to live in peace and quietness, went about to sell their Cattel to pay this Money. But the Lord of Trinity had given out a Commandment, that none should buy any Cattel of the Waldos without his Licence. Then Licence was given out to certain to buy great store of Cattel, and that for a small price; and the common bruit was, that he had part of the Gain. When the Money was paid, yet the Army notwithstanding retired not.

The poor Waldos pressed to deliver the eight thousand out of hand, to pay the Souldiers their Wages (as he said) and so withdrew his Army.

The Duke's fault of price.

After this the Lord of Trinity commanded the Waldos to surrender up all their Armour, to furnish the Duke's Forts, otherwise he threatened to send his Souldiers among them, and indeed he constrained many so to do. Then he demanded moreover the eight thousand Crowns, which the Duke had remitted, and constrained them to promise the payment thereof. After that, he commanded that the Ministers should be sent away, until the matter were determined before the Duke, otherwise he would send his Souldiers to dislodge them out of hand: whereupon, with one common assent and accord, they determined that their Ministers should withdraw themselves for a space, until the Army were retired; which was not done without marvellous Sighs, and Lamentation and Tears. At that season there fell such abundance of Snow, that the like had not been seen of a long time before: so that the People were constrained to make a Way with great travel and pain, through the top of the Mountain of St. Martin, for their Ministers to pass. Now thought the Lord of Trinity so to have inclosed them, he kept the plain, and the Mountains being covered so thick with Snow, that by no means they should have escaped his hands. But the People caused them to pass the top of the Mountain, and at their departure there flocked out of every quarter great multitudes to the Village of Bohy, and came together in a secret place there, called le Puy, not without great Grief and Sorrow; for they found them altogether in tears and mourning, that their Ministers should be so taken from them, and they now left as Lambs amongst Wolves.

The care of the Waldos for their Ministers.

The Army was advertised that the Ministers were assembled together, and incontinent a great Troop of Harquebusses were at hand, which fought them even to the very top of the Mountain, in such sort that if they had remained there but one hour longer, they had been all taken. From that time for certain days after they did nothing but range about in all places, seeking for the Ministers, and there was no House, Chamber, Cave, nor secret Corner into which they did not enter, under pretence to seek for the Ministers. There was neither Chelt, nor any thing else so strong, but they brake it open, saying, that the Ministers were hidden therein, and by that means they took, spoiled, and carried away whatsoever they would.

Gods Providence for his Ministers.

The Lord of Trinity promised oftentimes, that altho if were forbidden to all the Ministers to preach, yet the Minister of Angrougne should be excepted: and furthermore, sent the said Minister word, that if he would demand any thing of the Duke, it should be granted him. Whereupon the said Minister made this Request, That the poor People might live peaceably in their Religion. A while after, he sent for the same Minister to confer with him privately upon certain Points of Religion. The Minister went unto him, having thereto the consent of the People. The Lord of Trinity propounded unto him three Points: The first concerning the Supremacy of the Pope; the other concerning Transubstantiation. Of the which two Points the Minister then immediately declared his Opinion, and he seemed to agree therunto, and required him to put the same in Writing. The last (which was his whole drift) was to persuade the Minister to go to the Duke's Court, and there he to defend the Cause of the People, alledging certain Reasons to persuade him so to do. Whereunto the Minister answered, that he was bound to God and his Church, and if it seemed convenient to the Ministers and People that he should go, he would be content to do the same, and thereof he promised to send him answer immediately, with the which answer he seemed to be contented.

Mark here the false pretence, and traitorous meaning of the L. of Trinity, which by and by after seeketh the death of his good Minister.

Shortly after, the foresaid Lord, and tarrying for an answer, sent his Army to the Temple of St. Lawrence in Angronne, pretending to sing a Mass there, and suddenly the Souldiers besieged the Minister's house. The Minister being warned thereof, assayed to escape. The Souldiers attempted nothing by force, but used gentle persuasions to the contrary, for there were not yet many of them. But the Minister pushed on further, and the Souldiers followed him half a mile, but fearing the People, durst go no further. The Minister withdrew himself into the Rocks upon the Mountain, accompanied with five other. The Army was by and by at his Heels, and fought a good while in the Houses and Cottages on every side, cruelly handling the People whom they took, to make them confess where their Minister was, spoiling their Houses, taking some Prisoners, and beating other some; but yet they could not learn of them where their Minister was. At the length they espied him among the Rocks, where they thought to have enclosed him, and so they pursued him in the Rocks, all covered with Snow, until it was night, and could not take him. Then they returned and spoiled his House, and diligently searched out all his Books and Writings, and carried them to the Lord of Trinity in a Sack, who caused them all to be burnt in his presence; supposing (as it well appeared) that the Letters which he had sent to Angronne, touching the Agreement, should be with the rest burnt: for he did not like the like in the other Ministers Houses. That day they spoiled forty Houses in Angronne, broke their Mills, and carried away all the Corn and Meal that they found.

About midnight the Souldiers returned with Torchlight to the Minister's House to seek him, and searched every Corner. The next morning Commandment was given to the Rulers of Angronne, that within twenty four hours they should deliver their Minister, or else Angronne should be put to the Fire and Sword. The Rulers answered, that they could not do so, for they knew not where he was, and the Souldiers had chafed him over the Mountain. After certain days, when the Souldiers had burned Houses, spoiled the People, broken their Mills, and done what mischief they could, the Army retired. Notwithstanding the Lord of Trinity left Garrisons in the foresaid Fortresses, but all at the coils and charges of the Waldays: the which Garrisons, not contented with their Wages, spoiled continually. Upon a night five Souldiers went with Torches to a rich Man's House of Angronne, and spoiled the same. The good Man of the House hardly escaped with life by the top of the House, for there were twelve Pellets shot off at him. Whereof one touched his Face, and strook his Hat from his Head, without any further hurt.

The Rulers of Angronne, which were gone to the Fortresses to carry thither Victuals and Money, were by the Souldiers retained, and in despite of them and the People caused a Mass to be sung before them, and forced them to be present at it: and because they would not kneel down to it, they were beaten almost to death. The one of them was sent again for mockery; the other with great peril of his life leapt over the Walls, and being pursued to Angronne, escaped.

Certain days after a certain company of Souldiers came unto the midst of Angronne, as tho they would have passed through, and called for Meat and Drink. The poor Men brought that they had unto them in a close Court. When they had eaten and drunken, they caused the Women to avoid, and then bound fourteen of those which had brought them Victuals, by two and two together, and led them away. Their Wives and Children perceiving this, so fiercely pursued them with stones, that they were fain to let go ten of their Prisoners for haste, and had much ado to save themselves. The other four they led away to the Fortresses; of the which two were ransomed: the other two were hanged up by the Feet and the Hands; and having tormented them almost to death, they released them for a great sum of money. The one of the which died the next night; the other lay sick without hope of life a long time after, and his flesh fell from his hands and his feet, and thereof he became lame, and after that his fingers fell off also.

In like manner did the other Garrisons entreat the Villages adjoining unto them.

The Garrison of Touze and of Villars, being assembled together in a night, went to Taillette, to the place called Bouvet, and breaking in at the windows and tops of the houses, breaking open the doors, facking and spoiling all that they could lay hands of, took also 14 Prisoners, and bound them two and two together by the Arms, and so led them to the Fortresses of Touze. But two which were escaped, whilst the Souldiers were taking others, set upon them which led the Prisoners, and so valiantly assaulted and beat them with stones, that they forced them to let go 12 of the Prisoners, the which tumbling and rolling themselves down the Mountain, having their hands bound behind their backs, and fainted two and two together by the arms, were contented rather to die, than to be carried to the Fortresses; and yet in the end they escaped. The other two which were led to the Fortresses, were cruelly tormented, and in the end, the one of them the Captain flogged with his own hands, who was very young, and but a Child: The other which was about threecore years of age, whose name was Odul Genet, suffered a strange and cruel death: for when they had bound him, they took a kind of Beasts which live in Horse-dung, called in French Escarbotes, and put them into his Navel, covering them with a dish, the which within short space pierced into his Belly, and killed him. These and the like, more than barbarous cruelties, have been revealed by the Souldiers themselves.

The poor Waldays were yet in great Captivity and distress, but especially because they had not the preaching of God's Word amongst them as they were wont to have; and therefore taking to them a good courage, they determined to begin preaching again, albeit secretly, for two principal causes: The one for fear of moving the Duke, and hindering the voyage of their Messengers, having yet some hope of good success. The other, that no occasion might be given to the Souldiers of further trouble and courage for that was it which they especially desired. Also they of Angronne were fully determined, as soon as their Messengers were returned from the Duke, to preach openly, what News soever they brought, were they good or evil; and furthermore, not to be Contributors to the finding of the Garrison, neither yet to suffer the same to enter into Angronne.

The Messengers which were sent to the Duke, being at Versale, were there detained fix weeks, and all that while were cruelly handled by the Popish Doctors, and were constrained by force and violence to promise to return to the Mass. Furthermore, they would have constrained them to promise the same in the behalf of the rest, but they would not. After they were presented to the Duke, the Secretary Gallant, took the Supplication of the Waldays out of the Messenger's hands, and delivered another. After they had presented themselves to the Duke, and asked pardon for bearing of Armour; they were constrained also to crave pardon of the Pope's Legat; which at the beginning they would in no case do. Now when these Messengers were returned, bringing these woful News, and the People understood that there was a new Commandment given out, that they should return to the Mass: also that the Popish Preachers were appointed, and ready to come unto them, and they commanded to go to fetch them and entertain them accordingly; there was wonderful lamentation, weeping, and mourning, for this great calamity.

Hereupon, they of the Valley of Luferne and of Boby, being assembled together, by one assent sent two Ministers, with certain other of the People, to the Churches of Pragela (which be in the Country of Dolphine) to signify unto them the pitious estate of the poor Churches of the Valleys of Piedmont, to have their counsel and advice how to prevent the great dangers at hand if it were possible. For this cause they fell all to prayer, and after they had long called upon God desiring his Grace, and the spirit of discretion and counsel, well to consider of those weighty and urgent Affairs wherewith they were oppressed; in the end it was concluded, that all the People dwelling in the said Valleys and Mountains of Piedmont, and those of Dolphine should join in a league together. Whereupon they all promised by God's Grace and Assistance, to maintain the pure preaching of the Gospel, and administration of the holy Sacraments; the one to aid and assist the other, and to render all obedience to their Superiors, so far as they were commanded by the Word of God. Moreover, that it should be lawful for none of the said Vallies to promise or conclude any thing touching the estate of Religion, without the consent of the rest of the Vallies. And for more sure confirmation of the said League, certain of the Ministers and Elders of the Churches of Dolphine were sent to the Valley of Lusferne, to understand if they would give their consent hereto, and ratify the same.

These Messengers, the Ministers and others of Dolphine, being arrived in the Evening at the Village of Boby, and the People being there assembled, word was brought that the next day every Houholder should appear in the Council-House, to know whether they would return to the Ma's or no; and that they which would receive the Ma's, should quietly enjoy their Houses; and they which would not, should be delivered to the Justices, and condemned to be burned, or sent to the Gallies. Wherefore the People was brought to this extremity, either to die, or flee, or else to renounce God. To flee seemed to them best, if the great Snow had not let them; wherefore seeing themselves in such distress, they most gladly consented to the League. After this they exhorted one another, saying: Forasmuch as we shall be all called for to morrow, to renounce and forsake our God, and revolt again to Idolatry, let us now make solemn protestation, that we will utterly forsake the false Religion of the Pope, and that we will live and die in the maintenance and confession of God's holy Word. Let us all go to morrow into the Temple, to hear the Word of God, and after let us call down to the ground all the Idols and Altars. To this every Man agreed, saying, Let us so do, yea, and that very same hour in which they have appointed us to be at the Council-house.

The People of Piedmont brought in to great distress.

The next day after they assembled themselves in the Church of Boby, and as soon as they came into the Temple, without any further delay, they beat down the Images, and cast down the Altars. After the Sermon, they went to Villars to do the like there. By the way they encountered with a Band of Soldiers, which were going to spoil a Village named La Vall Guichard, and to take the poor Inhabitants Prisoners. The Soldiers, seeing them so ill appointed, mocked them, and discharged their Hand-guns upon them, thinking at the first bruit to have put them to flight. But they valiantly defended themselves, and with stones chased them even to the Fortres. When they came to Villars, they beat down their Images and Altars, and afterwards besieged the Fortres, and demanded the Prisoners which were there detained.

Images and Altars cast down in the Church of Villars.

The same day the Judge of Lusferne, called Podesta, went to the Council-house, to enroll the Names of those which would return to the Ma's; but seeing what was done, he was fore afraid, and desired the People to suffer him to return quietly; which they willingly granted unto him. Divers Gentlemen also of the Valley came thither with the Judge, to make their poor Tenants to forsake God; but seeing the Tumult, they were fain to flee into the Castle, where they and the Garrison were besieged ten days together, not without great danger of their Lives. The second day of the Siege, the Captain of Touze went with a Company of Soldiers, thinking to raise the Siege; but they were by those that kept the Passages either slain or discomfited. As much was done the third day. The fourth day he returned with three Bands, and with the Garrison of Touze, which caused a furious Combat, wherein many of the Enemies were slain, and a great number hurt, and yet of those that besieged the Fort there was not one Man hurt.

God giveth victory to his Servants.

Another Combat between the Waldos and their Enemies.

In the time of this Siege they attempted divers means to take the said Fortres, but without Ordinance it was impossible so to do; wherefore they were now past all hope of winning it. Moreover, the Lord of Trinity, returning with his Army, was come to the Valley of Lusferne, and the next day after might easily have raised the Siege. Wherefore when the Garrison (not knowing that the Lord of Trinity was so near) desired that they might depart with Bag and Baggage, they granted their request. In this Siege half of the Soldiers were slain, and many were hurt, as well with Harquebusses as with Stones. During this Siege, the Soldiers for lack of water were constrained to make their Bread with Wine, which tormented their Stomachs, and caused great Dificalties. Here is not to be forgotten, that the Soldiers, which a while before did so cruelly persecute the poor Ministers, seeking by all means possible to destroy them, were now fain to pray them to save their Lives, and to promise them that they should have no hurt, and also to safe-conduct them into a sure place; neither would they depart until they had promised them so to do. Which the Ministers did promise, and also perform very willingly. Then the Soldiers seeing themselves much beholden to the Ministers so gently dealing with them, gave them great thanks, and promised them in recompence thereof all the pleasure that they could bestow them. The same night the Fortres was razed.

How the Ministers of the Gospel promised to their Enemies and enemies, doing good for evil. The Fortres, governed by the Angromnians.

The second day of February the Lord of Trinity camped at Lusferne, and placed a Garrison in the Priory of St. John, a Village of the Waldos between Lusferne and Angrongne. The next day in the morning the said Lord of Trinity sent word unto them of Angrongne, that if they would not take part with the rest, they should be gently handled. All the week before they were solicited by him to consent to the same, but they would give no answer. The same day they of Angrongne, and the rest of the Vallies, fully agreed and determined to defend their Religion by force, and that the one should aid the other, and no agreement to be made by any one without the consent of the rest. About noon the Lord of Trinity marched with his Army by St. John, to enter into the Borders of Angrongne by a place called La Sonnette, where they had fought before. The People had made certain Bulwarks of Earth and Stone, not past three foot high, where they defended themselves valiantly against their Enemies, which assailed them divers ways. When the Enemies were so weary that they could fight no longer, they put fresh Soldiers into their places; so that the Combat endured until night, and all that day the Army could not enter into the Borders of Angrongne. Many of the Enemies were slain, and a great number hurt; and but two of Angrongne slain, of whom the one was slain by his own folly, because he was too greedy upon the spoil. The Army, being now well beaten and tired, rested a while, to make themselves stronger for a further mischief.

God condescendeth his servants to second their Religion by force.

Another Combat between the Lord of Trinity and the Angromnians.

God giveth victory again to his People.

The Friday following, which was the seventh of February, at the break of the day, the Army marched towards Angrongne by five several places. The People of Angrongne were not yet assembled, and none there were to resist, but only a few which kept the Watch; the which seeing their Enemies coming upon them in so many places, and perceiving that they went about to enclose them, after they had valiantly fought for a space, they recoiled by little and little to a high place called La Cass, where the Combat was renewed with a greater fierceness than before. But the Lord of Trinity seeing the loss of his Men, and above all, that one of great credit and authority in the Duke's Court, was wounded to death, blew a retreat, and defended to Angrongne, (the People being fled to the Meadow of Touze) and there spoiled and burnt all the Wines, Victuals, and the rest of the Goods that he could find; so that in a short space he had burned about a thousand Houses of Angrongne.

Another Fight between the Lord of Trinity and the Angromnians.

And here is not to be forgotten, that they oftentimes set fire upon the two Temples of Angrongne, where the Word of God was preached, but they could never burn them. So did they also to the Minister's House, which notwithstanding remained whole, the Houses round about being all consumed with fire. This day none of Angrongne was slain or hurt, saving only one that was hurt in his thigh.

A notable Miracule of God in keeping the Temples of the One's from burning.

There were in all Angrongne but two that were Enemies to the Word of God, which that same day were slain by the Soldiers; not in the Combat, but for their riches which they had about them, as they were running away. The one of them was a very covetous Wretch, and had great store of Gold and Silver, and would spend nothing, either to help himself, or succour others, no not his poor Parents. All this was spoiled by the Soldiers, with a hundred or two hundred Crowns besides, which he had about him. Besides these two there was not one of Angrongne slain that day. All the rest of the People retired to the Meadow of Touze, the situation whereof we will here declare, for the better understanding of that which followeth.

Note again the secret Work of God.

Unkindness to Parents rightly rewarded.

Touze is a little Valley upon the Borders of Angrongne, invironed about with Mountains, two miles in length, but very narrow. On both sides, and in the midst thereof, there be about two hundred small Houses and Cottages, also Meadows, Pastures for Cattel, Ground for Tillage, Trees, and goodly Fountains. On the South-side and the North the Mountains are so high, that no Man can that way approach unto the said Valley. On the other coasts a Man may enter by seven or eight ways. This place is not past two miles from Angrongne; the way thither is very narrow, and ill to pass by because of the Hills which be on both sides. There is also a River hard by, but very small, but the banks thereof be very high in many places. The People had carried thither very few Victuals, partly because the way was so ill, and also through the sudden return of the Army.

The Enemies again driven back.

In the mean time the Lord of Trinity, after he had now twice assailed Angrongne, sent certain to burn Rosa, and to discover the ways which led to the Valley of Lusferne; but the Souldiers were driven back four days together by those which kept the Passages. Whereupon he sent his whole Army, whom they valiantly withstood from the morning till night. Then they of Lusferne sent new Aid. During this Combat, an Ambushment of Souldiers descended from the top of the mountain, by a place so hard to pass by, that no Man would have suspected it. The poor People, seeing themselves so environed of their Enemies, saved themselves, some running through the midst of their Enemies, and other some into the Rocks.

The poor Courtiers run through the Pikes.

The Enemies being entered into Rosa, consumed all with Fire and Sword. The residue of the People fled by the secret way leading to the Valley of Lusferne, and wandered all that night upon the Mountains full of Snow, laden with their stuff, carrying their little Infants in their arms, and leading the other by the hands, with great pain and travel. When they of the Valley saw them, they ran unto them, praising God for their deliverance, for they thought they had been all slain. Albeit this poor People were here in such great extremity, yet they were joyful, and comforted themselves, without any lamentation or mourning, except the little poor Infants which cried out for cold.

The Angrengians with their young Infants flee into the Mountains.

The Waldoys again assailed by the Lord of Trinity.

A few days after the Lord of Trinity entered into the Valley of Lusferne by three several ways, that is to say, by Rosa, by the Plains, and by the sides of Taillera. They which kept the Passages, at the first resisted their Enemies valiantly, but perceiving that they were assailed on every side, they retired to Villars, and there defended themselves awhile. But because they saw that their Enemies had already passed the Plain, and gotten above Villars towards Boby, they gave over, and left Villars, and fled into the Mountains. The Souldiers being entered, burned Houses, and slew all that they could find. The poor People which were fled into the Mountains, seeing the Village on fire, praised God, and gave him thanks, that had made them worthy to suffer for his Name, and for his Cause; and also they were glad to see the Village on fire, lest that their Enemies should encamp there themselves. Then the Souldiers in great rage mounted the Hills on every side, pursuing the poor People in great fury; but a few of them, after they had ardently called upon God, took courage, and beat back their Enemies to Villars. This done, the Army retired.

Few days after the Meadow of Tours was assailed by three several ways on the East side. The Combat endured a long season, where divers of the Enemies were hurt, and many slain. But none of this poor People were slain that day, only two were hurt, which were soon healed again. But to declare the Conflicts, Assaults, Skirmishes, and Alarms, which were at Angrongne and other places thereabouts, it were too long; for brevities sake it shall be sufficient to touch the most principal, and those which are most worthy of remembrance.

On Saturday, which was the 14th day of February, the People which were in the uppermost part of the Meadow of Tours, perceived that a Company of Souldiers were ascended up the Hill to Angrongne, and burning the rest of the Houses there: they doubted that it was a policy of their Enemies to draw them thither, and in the mean time to set on them behind, and so to win the Meadow of Tours from them. Therefore they sent only six Harquebusses against those Souldiers; the which having the higher ground, and not espied of their Enemies, discharged all their Guns together. Whereupon incontinent the Souldiers fled, albeit no Man pursued them; whether they fled of policy, or for fear, it was not known.

The wicked fleeth when no Man pursueth him.

Shortly after they of the Ward of the Meadow of Tours, which were in the Watch on the top of the Mountain, (because every morning there was a Sermon made, wherunto the People resorted, and they might see afar off round about them) espied a Troop of Souldiers marching on that side of the Hill which is between the East and the North, and soon after that discovered another Company, which marched on the North side towards the said Troop. The first were ascended an hour before the other, and fought on the top of the Mountain called Melefe, but they were soon discomfited: and because they could not run fast by means of the deep Snow, and difficulty of the ways, in fleeing they fell often down upon the ground. Whilist they that pursued them were earnest in the chase, and had taken from them their Drum, behold, there came certain unto them, crying out that the other Troop was entered into the Meadow of Tours, by means whereof they gave over the chase, or else not one of their Enemies had escaped, as they which were there reported for a truth. Not one of Angrongne was slain or hurt.

The Persecutors pursued.

The other Troop which came by the North side, took a high Hill in the top of the Mountain, the which seemed to be almost inaccessible, by reason of the Snow and Ice which was there. The chieft of this Company were Lodowick, of Monteil, (which had been before Master of the Camp in the King's Wars) and Charles Truchet. When they were come to the top of the Hill, they caused seven Souldiers to go down the Hill, and to view the way, and to see whether the Troop might defend that way or no. These seven went down almost to the Houses. They sent also other to occupy the rest of the high places which were near to the foot of the Hill and the Rocks. In the mean time the Ministers, and the People which were in the midst of the Valley of the Meadow, saw all this, and were much discouraged therewith; wherefore they fell to prayer, and called upon God ardently, not without great sighs, lamentation and tears, even until night.

God's People pray.

The seven Spies which came down to discover the ways, cried unto their Captain Truchet, Come down, come down, Seigneur Charles, this day Angrongne shall be taken. The other cried to them again, Ascend, ascend, and return, or else you shall be slain every one of you. Immediately issued out five against these Spies, and took certain, and chased the rest. The first of the five which set upon them, cast two of them down upon the ground with a Fork of Fire. Soon after eight of Angrongne issued out against the whole Troop, which was wonderful to see them go with such courage and boldness, to assail such a multitude, and it seemed that they should have been all destroyed and hewn in pieces. The first of the eight went a good way before the other, to discover the Enemies, and carried a great Staff, which they call a Rancon, as is somewhat bigger than an Halbert: the other followed by two and two together, with Harquebusses. These eight went from Rock to Rock, from Hill to Hill, about the Mountain, and chased their Enemies valiantly. Then came twelve other, the which joining with these, fought with a wonderful courages and made great laughter of their Enemies. Soon after there came from the Valley of Lusferne an hundred Harquebusses, with one of their Ministers, according to their manner, which were wont to send out a Minister withal, as well for prayer and exhortation, as to keep the People in order, that they exceed not measure, as it came to pass that day.

The courage of God's People against their Enemies.

At the length they saw them also coming which returned from the discomfiture of the former Troop, making a great noise, and having a Drum sounding afore them, which they had taken from their Enemies; which joined with them of the Valley of Lusferne, and having made their earnest prayer unto God, immediately they came to succour the other that now were encountering valiantly with their Enemies. Then the Enemies seeing such a Company marching against them, with such courage and boldness, after the other had once called upon God, their Hearts were so taken from them, that suddenly they fled, and as soon as the other began to pray, they began also to flee: But because they could not well save themselves by running away, they turned back twice, and fought, and some in the mean time fled.

A Conflict between the Angrengians and their Enemies.

He that carried the Rancon, and discovered the Enemies, was but a very young and a simple Man, and was esteemed to be one that could do nothing but (as they say in their language) handle La Sape, that is to say, a Hatchet, and kept Cattel: and yet he, with those that followed, so discomfited the Enemies, that it was wonderful to behold. He brake his great Rancon with laying load upon them; and and after that he broke also four of their own Swords in pursuing of them. There was a Boy of eighteen years of Age, and of small stature, which alone slew the Lord of Monteil, Master of the Camp (as is said) to the King: wherewith the Enemies were marvelously astonished and discouraged. Another simple Man, who, a Man would have thought, durst not once have looked Charles Truchet in the face (because he was a very big Man, strong and puissant, and one of the chieftest Captains of the whole Army) threw down the said Truchet with the stroke of a Stone. Then a young Man leapt upon him, and slew him with his own Sword, which was four fingers broad, and cleft his head in pieces.

This Truchet was one of the principal Authors of this War, and one of the chieftest Enemies of true Religion, and of the poor Waldoyes, that could then be found. It was said also, that he vaunted and promised before to the said Lord of Trinity, that he would deliver into his hands the Meadow of Touze. But God soon brought his proud brags to naught. And for his spoiling, pilling, and polling of the poor People, he lay spoiled and naked like a Beast in the wild Mountain of Angrogne. Two of the chieftest among them offered to pay a great sum of Crowns for their Ransom, but they could not be heard. They were pursued more than a mile, and were so discomfited, that they fled without any resistance, and if the night had not let them, they had pursued them further.

The Minister, when he saw the great effusion of Blood, and the Enemies to flee, cried to the People, saying, that it was enough, and exhorted them to give thanks unto God. They which heard him, obeyed, and fell to prayer: but they which were further off, and heard him not, chafed their Enemies till dark night. Infomuch, that if the rest had done the like, very few of their Enemies had escaped. That day they had spoiled their Enemies of a great part of their Armour and Munition. So God restored in this Combat, and in others, to the poor Waldoyes, the Armour which the Lord of Trinity had taken from them before. Thanks were given to God in every place; and every Man cried, Who is he which fighteth not that God fighteth for us? This Victory gave great courage to the poor Waldoyes, and greatly astonished the Enemies.

The 18th of February, The Lord of Trinity, not satisfied with burning and destroying the greatest part of Villars, returned to burn all the little Villages round about, which pertain to the same, and especially to pursue the poor People, which were fled up into the Mountains, and dividing his Army into three parts, he entred by three several ways above mentioned. The two first Companies joined together between Villars and Boby, having a great Company of Horsemen. From thence they went to seek the People which were in the Mountain of Combe, by such a way as they did not suspect, and where there were no Warders to defend the place. Notwithstanding, the Warders which were next, seeing their Enemies ascending that way, speedily ran before them, and calling upon God for his aid and succour, they set themselves against their Enemies: and albeit they were but thirty in number, yet they valiantly beat them back twice, coming out of their Bulwarks, that is to say, certain Houses which at that time served them for that purpose, albeit they were not made to that use. Many of the Enemies were slain at those two Combats, and not one of the other side. The Lord of Trinity, seeing his Men so fiercely driven back, sent out the greatest part of his Army, which were esteemed to be 15 hundred Men. There came also about an hundred to succour the Warders. The Combat was very cruel and fierce. At length the poor People were assailed so vehemently, that they were fain to forsake their Bulwarks, losing two of their Men. Then the Enemies thought all to be theirs, and blew their Trumpets, triumphing that they had put the People to flight. But the People, retiring not past a stones cast, took courage, and crying altogether to the Lord for succour, they turned themselves to the face of their Enemies, and with great force and power they hurled stones at them with their slings.

After this the Enemies rested themselves a while, and by and by after they gave a furious assault, but yet they were again mightily repelled. Yet once again the Enemies rested, and in the mean time the People fell to Prayer, calling upon God altogether, with their faces lifted up towards Heaven; which fraied the Enemies more than any thing else. After this, they gave yet another great assault, but God by the hands of a few drove them back. Yea, God here shewed his great Power, even in the little Children also, which fervently called upon God, threw stones at their Enemies, and gave courage also unto the Men. So did also the Women, and the vulgar sort, that is to say, those which were meet for no feats of War, remaining upon the Mountain; and beholding these furious Combats, kneeled upon the ground, and having their faces lifted up towards Heaven, with tears and groanings they cried, Lord help us. Who heard their Prayers.

After that these three Assaults were given, there came one unto them crying; Be of good courage, God hath sent those of Angrogne to succour us. He meant, that they of Angrogne were fighting for them in another place, that is to say, towards Tailletes, where the third part of the Army was. The People perceiving that they of Angrogne were come to that place to succour them, began to cry, Blessed be God, who hath sent us succour: they of Angrogne be here to succour us. The Enemies hearing this, were astonished, and suddenly blew a Retreat, and retired into the Plain.

That Troop which was gone towards Tailletes, divided themselves into three Companies. The first marched by the side of the Mountain, burning many Houses, and joined with the main Army. The second Company, which was of seven score, marched higher, thinking to take the People at unawares. But they were by seven Men strongly repelled and driven back. The third Company attained the top of the Mountain, thinking to inclose the People; but as God would, they of Angrogne, which came to succour them, encountered with them, and with great force put them to flight.

They of Villars, of whom mention is made before, after they had refreshed themselves with a little Bread and Wine, (for the most part of them had eaten nothing all that day) chafed their Enemies till it was almost night, so fiercely, that the Master of the Camp was fain to lead to the Lord of Trinity (which was at Touze) for succour, or else all would have been lost. Which he did; and immediately he rode with all speed to Lusarne to save himself, hearing the Alarm which was given at St. John by those of Angrogne, and fearing lest the way should have been stopped. The Army retired with great difficulty (notwithstanding the new Aid which was sent them) and with great loss of Men. One of their Captains confessed since, that if they had been pursued any further, they had fled all that night long. Since that time they never returned again into the Valley of Lusarne.

On Monday, being the 17th of March next following, the Lord of Trinity, to be revenged of those of the Meadow of Touze, assembled all the Force that he could make with the Gentlemen of the Country. Infomuch that whereas before his Army was commonly but four thousand, it was now between six and seven thousand: and secretly in the night season he encamped with part of his Army in the midst of Angrogne, from whence the poor Inhabitants were fled before. The next morning, after the Sermon and Prayers were ended, they perceived the other part of the Army to be encamped at the foot of the Mountain of Angrogne on the East side. Soon after they perceived how both parts of the Army coasted the Hills side, the one towards the other, being such a multitude, so glittering in their Harneis and marching in such array, that the poor People at the first were astonished therat. Notwithstanding, the Assembly fell down upon their knees three or four times, crying, Help us O Lord; beseeching him to have regard to the glory of his holy Name, to stay the effusion of Blood, if it were his good pleasure, and to turn the hearts of their Enemies to the truth of his holy Gospel. These two parts of the Army joined together near to the Bulwarks of the Meadow of Touze, and gave the assault in three several places. One of the Bands mounted, secretly by the Rocks, thinking, to have inclosed the People in their Bulwarks. But as soon as they which kept the Bulwark below had espied them, they forsook the place, and marched straight towards them; and as they marched, they met with the Aid which was sent unto them from the Valley of Lusarne, very luckily, and coming as it were from Heaven: which joining together, soon discomfited their Enemies with Stones and Harquebusses. They pursued them fiercely in the Rocks, and vexed them wonderfully, because the Rocks are so steep that no Man can ascend or defend without great pain and difficulty. The Captain of this Band was named Bastian of Virgil, a Man very expert in the Affairs of War. He at his going out of his Lodging, threatened that he would do great and terrible things that day. His Hostels hearing that, said unto him, Monsieur, if our Religion be better than theirs, you shall have the Victory; but if theirs be better than ours, you shall not prevail. Shortly after the Captain was brought again into his Inn, so wounded and so feeble, that he was not like to live. Then said his Hostels unto him, Monsieur, it is now well seen that their Religion is better than ours.

There was also another Band which kept the top of the Hill, to assault the Bulwarks from thence. The middlemost Bulwark was then assaulted, in the which were very few to defend the same: the which seeing the number of their Enemies, retired back, leaving therein five only to defend it. There was a huge Rock not far from the foresaid Bulwark, behind the same a great number of the Enemies were hid. And anon there issued out two Ensigns, assuring themselves to win the Bulwark; but immediately one of their Ensign-bearers was wounded to death. Whereupon many recoiled back; the other set up his Ensign upon the Bulwark. They which were within, had neither Halberd, nor any other long Weapon, but only one Pike, and the same without any Iron; the which one of the five took, and threw down the Ensign, and manfully beat back the Scalers, and threw them down to the ground. Divers of the Enemies were entered into the Bulwark by a Dore below, and flew one of the five which kept the middle part of the Bulwark. The other four looked to be destroyed out of hand. Then one of the four chased away those which had entered below, with stones: and the other three, leaving their Hand-guns, defended themselves likewise with great stones: and perceiving the Band which was on the Rocks to flee, they took courage, and withstood their Enemies valiantly till their Companions were returned from the chase.

In the mean time the Bulwark which was upon the side of the Mountain, was furiously assailed by the one half of the Army. Those that were within, suffered their Enemies to approach near to the Bulwark, without any Gunshot or other defence: whereat the Enemies much marvelled; but when they were even at hand, they fell upon them some with throwing of stones, some with rolling down mighty stones, and some with Harquebusses. There was a huge stone rolled down, which passed throughout the whole Army, and slew divers. The Souldiers at that time had won a little Cottage near to the said Bulwark, which did much hurt to the poor Men. But among them one devised to roll down a great huge stone against the Cottage, which so shook it, and amazed the Souldiers, that they thought they had been all destroyed, and incontinent they fled, and never would enter into it again.

Then the Souldiers made certain Fences of wood, five foot long, three foot broad, and of the thickness of three boards; but they were so sore vexed with the shot of the Harquebusses, that they were fain to lay all those Fences aside. The Miners also made others of earth for the Souldiers. But all these Policies of the Enemies availed them nothing: for the slaughter was so great, that in divers places you might have seen three lying dead one upon another. God so wrought with the poor Christians, that the shot of two Harquebusses slew four Men.

It was said for a certain, that the shot of an Harquebuss came so near the Lord of Trinity's head, that it brake a Wand which he bare in his hand, and made him to retire sixscore paces backward; and seeing his Souldiers in such great numbers murthered and wounded on every side, he wept bitterly. Then he retired the rest of his Army. That day he thought assuredly to have entered into the Meadow of Toure. Moreover, he was determined, if that days journey had not succeeded, to incamp thereby, and the next morning very early to renew the Assault. Many Gentlemen and others came thither to see the discomfiture of the poor Waldos; and likewise those of the Plain looked for nothing, but to hear the piteous ruin and delolation of this poor People. But God disposed it otherwise; for the Lord of Trinity had much ado to save himself and his: and seeing the mischief which they intended to do unto others, was fallen now upon their own heads, they were wonderfully astonished. They of the Plain also, when they saw the number of the dead Bodies and the Wounded to be so great (for from noon until the evening they ceased not to carry them away) were likewise exceedingly dismayed. Albeit they carried not away all; for there were many that lay near to the Bulwarks, which the People covered with winding-sheets the next morning. The Souldiers themselves confessed to them of the Meadow of Toure, that if they had pursued them, they had been all slain, they were so tired and clean out of heart.

Many marvelled why the People did not follow the Army, but especially the Souldiers, seeing the great discomfiture which they had done, and that they had gotten such vantage of them already, but this was done for two causes. The one was, because they had already determined not to follow the Army being once retired, to avoid the effusion of blood, meaning only to defend themselves. The other cause was, for that they were weary, and had spent all their Munition: For many of them had shot off about thirty times, and none of them under twenty, spending great store both of Pellets and Hail-shot. The rest of the Army retired, crying with a loud voice, God fighteth for them, and we do them wrong.

The next day one of the principal Captains of the Army furnished his Charge to the Lord of Trinity, laying unto him, that he would never fight against this People any more; and upon that he departed. It is a marvellous thing, and worthy of perpetual Memory, that in that Combat there were but two of the Waldos slain, and two hurt. Through the whole Country of Piedmont, every Man said, God fighteth for them. One of the Captains confessed, that he had been at many fierce Assaults and Combats, and sundry Battels well fought, but yet he never saw Souldiers so fainthearted and amazed: yea, the Souldiers themselves told him, they were so astonished, that they could not strike. Moreover, they said, that this People never shot, but they hurt or killed some of the Souldiers. Some others said, That the Ministers by their Prayers conjured and bewitched them, that they could not fight: and indeed wonderful is it, and marvellous are the Judgments of God, that notwithstanding so many Combats and Conflicts, so great Assaults and Adventures, so much and so terrible shot, continually made against this poor People, yet all in a manner came to no effect: so mightily God's Holy Power wrought for his People. Inasmuch that, for all the said Combats, Skirmishes, and so many Conflicts of all the Angrognians there were but nine only that miscarried, and the whole number of those that were slain were but only fourteen Persons. Where also is to be noted, not without great admiration, how few there were, and those also but poor silly Shepherds and Neatherds, to encounter with such a mighty Power, of so strong and brave Souldiers coming against them with Weapons and Armour, being so well furnished and appointed with Munition, as they were in all points accordingly; and the other on the contrary side being warned, and unprovided of all habilliment of War, having for their defence for the most part nothing else but Slings and Stones, and a few Harquebusses.

The 5th of March there was a hot Skirmish at Angrogne. For three Companies of Souldiers went to Angrogne, to burn and spoil all that remained, and to destroy the Wives which were hidden in the ground. Where, amongst themselves, they mocked and flouted the poor People, saying, Their Lutheran Waldos are valiant Fellows behind their Bulwarks: but if they had been in the plain Field, they had been well vanquished. After this it chanced that thirty of the Waldos went and assailed these foresaid Companies in the plain Field. They fought a long season, and that so near, that some of them fought hand to hand. In this Conflict one of those of Angrogne, wrestled with a Captain of the Enemies, strong and mighty, and cast him down upon the ground. Many of the Souldiers were slain, and many hurt. But of the Angrognians there was but one slain, and another hurt a little, which notwithstanding gave not over to fight manfully. Then the Souldiers, seeing the loss of their Men, retired suddenly.

After that, the Lord of Trinity sent two Gentlemen of the Valley of Luserne to them of Angrogne, to feel them if they would come to any agreement. To whom answer was made, that they would stand to their first Answer. From that time he sent very often to intreat of the Agreement: but what his meaning was, it might well appear. For when the poor People hoped for some agreement, they were most furiously assaulted. Upon this, there was a day assigned in the Valley of Lufene, to confer touching the Agreement with certain Men pertaining to the Lord of Raconis, and a safe Conduct was promised and granted.

The night afore the Ministers and Rulers of Angrogne should take their Journey, they perceived a Company of Souldiers going up a Hill, by the which they of Angrogne should pass, and hid them in Houses on the ways side, thinking to take at unawares them of Angrogne, which were bent to treat of the Agreement. But they, having intelligence of this conspiracy, watched and warded. It was an easy matter, as divers thought, that night to have taken the Lord of Trinity, and have spoiled his whole Camp. But they of Angrogne and Lufene would not execute this enterprise, lest thereby they should offend God, and pass the bounds of their Vocation, taking upon them no more but to defend themselves.

At that time a pitiful case happened in the Meadow of Toure. The Lord of Raconis, seeming to be sorry for this War, sent into the Meadow of Toure an honest Man of Briquerus, named Francis of Gilet, to take advice what means were best to further the Agreement. Who, having consulted with the Ministers and Rulers, returned homeward that day according to his Master's Commandment, and having sent back one which conducted him, was murdered soon after at the foot of Angrogne, by two of Angrogne which otherwise seemed to be honest, and of good Parentage. Soon after, one of the two, which had committed this Fact, entered into the Meadow of Toure, and was immediately apprehended and bound. He confessed the Fact without any further delay. Immediately the other also was taken.

The Waldos were marvellously troubled and aggrieved with this Fact, and wrote to the Lord of Raconis, declaring unto him the whole Circumstance of the Fact, and that they had the Offenders in Ward, and that if it would please him to send certain to examine the matter, they for their part would execute justice in the punishment of them, that their innocency to all Men should appear. The Lord of Raconis wrote unto them that they should deliver unto him the Offenders, and that he would do such justice upon them, as the Case required. To the which they of Angrogne answered, That upon three Conditions they should be delivered according to his request. First, That the Prisoners should be compelled to do nothing against their Consciences; and as touching Religion, nothing should be spoken unto them, but out of the Word of God. Secondly, That speedy and sharp justice should be executed upon them; and that hereafter this should be no prejudice to the Liberties and Privileges of the People of Angrogne. The third, That the execution of them should be upon the Borders of Angrogne, for an example to all other. This being accorded with one assent (yea without contradiction of their Parents) they sent their Prisoners, accompanied with fixty Gunners, to the Confinnes of Lufene, and there delivered them into the hands of the Lord of Raconis. This redounded to the great commendation of them of Angrogne.

After this, the Lord of Trinity, having left certain Garrisons about Angrogne, and the Valley of Lufene, went to Perouse near to the Valley of St. Martin, to favour the Garrison there, being in great danger, and there remained a month. During which time, they of Angrogne, and the Valley of Lufene, lived in more quietness than afore; but yet they were much afflicted, by reason of the scarcity of Victuals which were pressed them, and namely those of the Meadow of Toure, for they were spoiled of their Victuals. This poor People lived with Milk and with Herbs, having very little Bread. But afterwards, when they were even like to be famished, God of his goodness sent them better succour, both of Corn and Bread than they had before. The Enemies thought to have taken the Meadow of Toure by Famine: for they took away the Victuals that were to be had in all places round about. Every Household was suffered to have no more than should sustain them that day, and that also was very little: to the end that they should not succour this poor People.

After that the Lord of Trinity, being returned from Perouse to Lufene, sent certain to intreat of an Agreement, and required to commune with some of the People. Then they began to consult and devise by all means, how they might come to some good Agreement. But on Monday, being the 17th of April, by break of day, he sent certain Bands of Spaniards, which he had there, with the Garrison of Toure, to the Mountain of Tallret, by the way which leadeth to the Meadow of Toure, on the South side.

They murdered Men, Women, and Children of Tallret, whom they found in their Beds. Then they marched on along upon the Mountain, towards the Meadow of Toure. Anon after, the People perceived two other Companies of Souldiers, marching by Angrogne by two several ways, to assault the Meadow of Toure. In the morning as soon as they rose, they blew their Horns, for they saw the Spaniards already entered. When they had made their Prayers, every Man ran to meet the Enemies: some on the East side, and the other on the South. They which first resisted the Spaniards (who were already past the Bulwarks) were in the beginning but twelve Gunners, and a few other, whom they caused to go up to the Hill, and roll down great Stones. These twelve, having found a fit place for their purpose to stay the Spaniards, began to shoot off their Harquebusses at them. The Spaniards seeing themselves to lose assaulted both above and beneath, and the place so narrow & so strait, recoiled back, and retired as fast as they could by the same way by the which they came. If they had tarried a little longer, they had been enclosed between the two Mountains: which place was so strait, that they could not have escaped. The People chased them unto their Camp, which was at Toure. As they fled, they found often some Forts, where they did resist for a little while, but they were always beaten out. In this Combat, God gave victory to the poor Waldos, and great slaughter of the Spaniards, where also very many of them were sore hurt and wounded.

The said Lord of Trinity sent unto the Spaniards, that they should not faint and give over, but stick to it like Men, and he would shortly send them succour; but they would not. Those of the Valley of Lufene, hearing of this conflict, came in the mean time to help their Neighbours. Amongst others, there was one slain in that battle, for whom the Lord of Trinity much lamented, saying, that he would rather have lost a whole Band than that Man. The other two Companies which marched by Angrogne, perceiving the Spaniards to be so beaten and put to flight, and seeing also those of the Meadow of Toure coming to encounter with them, retired in haste. Upon that the Lord of Trinity went to Cavours, three miles from Lufene, being in a great perplexity; and as he was about to send succour to the Spaniards, he heard the found of a Drum above Lufene, and suspected that there was an Army of the Waldos coming against him. Upon this divers of the Souldiers fled away by the Plain, crying that all was lost. It was certainly reported, that if the Waldos had pursued the Army, as they might easily have done, the Camp had that day been chased out of Lufene. The poor people lacked no courage so to do; for albeit they had neither eat nor drunk all the day before, and had so fore travelled and fought, yet they said, that if they had but a little refreshed themselves with a morsel of Bread, and a glass of Wine, they durst take upon them to enter into the Camp of their Enemies.

Within a few days after, they of Angrogne were advertised by the Lord of Trinity's Letters, that he fully determined to cut down their Trees and Vines, and destroy their Corn being on the ground. And furthermore, that two Forts should be built at Angrogne. The day was assigned, and Horsemen appointed, with all speed to execute this mischievous enterprise. The poor people thought that they should be assailed as sore as ever they were, and right as hard as ever they did before. But God prevented this cruel attempt; for the night afore that this should be executed, the Lord of Trinity received certain Letters from the Duke, which said this enterprise. They of the Meadow of Toure being advertised that the Lord of Trinity did now intend to send Ordnance to beat down the Bulwarks which were made of Stones, they made a Bulwark of Earth, which was in compass about 500 paces, which they might easily see from Lufene. They in the Meadow of Toure told the Lord of Trinity's Men, that if they brought any Artillery, they should doy send a Supplication to the Dutchels.

About this season, the chief Rulers and Ministers of the Waldos, requested earnestly the Lord of Racenis to present a Supplication which they had made to the Dutchels of Savoy: for they had intelligence, that she was fore offended that her Subjects were so cruelly handled. In which Supplication they declared the equity of their Cause, protesting all due obedience to the Duke their Sovereign Lord, and if it might be proved by the pure Word of God that they held any Error, they would with all humble submission receive correction, and be reformed, humbly beseeching her Grace to appease the displeasure which the Duke had conceived against them, by the untrue furnishes of their Adversaries; and if there were any thing wherein they had offended him, they most humbly craved his gracious Pardon.

The Lord of Trinity fore
s.k.

About this time the Lord of Trinity, by sickness, was in great danger of his Life. Soon after the Supplication was delivered, the Dutchels sent an Answer to the Waldos, by the said Lord of Racenis. The effect thereof was, That she had obtained of the Duke's Grace all that they demanded in their Supplication, upon such conditions as the said Lord Racenis would propound unto them. But when they understood that the said Conditions were very rigorous, they sent another Supplication unto the Dutchels, wherein they humbly besought her Grace to be a means that the said Conditions and Articles might be moderated; which Articles here follow.

Another
Supplication sent to the Dutchels.

First, That they should banish their Ministers.

Secondly, That they should receive the Mass, and other Ceremonies of the Romish Church.

Thirdly, That they should pay a Ransom to the Souldiers for certain of their Men which they had taken.

Fourthly, That they should assemble and preach no more as they were wont to do.

Fifthly, That the Duke would make Fortresses at his pleasure in all that Country, with other like things.

The Supplication of the Dutchels.

The People made humble request in this their last Supplication, That it would please the said Dutchels to give the Duke her Husband to understand, how that these Conditions were strange and rigorous. And as for their parts, altho they had good trial of their Ministers, that they were good Men and fearing God, of sound Doctrine, of good Life, and honest Conversation; yet nevertheless they were contented so to do, if he would give leave to some of them to remain: requesting this, that it might be permitted unto them to chuse some other good Ministers in their places, before they departed, lest that their Churches should remain without Pastors.

The Condition whereunto the Waldos did agree and consent.

Concerning the Mass, and other Ceremonies of the Church of Rome, if the Duke should cause them to be ministered in their Parishes, they neither would nor could withstand the same, and for their part, they would do no injury or violence to those that should minister them, or be present thereat: notwithstanding they besought him, that they might not be constrained to be present themselves at the ministrations thereof, or to pay any thing to the maintenance of the same, or else to yield either favour or consent thereunto.

As touching the Ransom which was demanded of them for their Prisoners, considering the extreme Poverty that they were in, and the great Calamities and Damages which they had suffered, it was to them a thing impossible. Yea, if his Highness were truly informed what loss they had sustained, by burning, spoiling, and lacking of their Houses and Goods, without all mercy or pity, he would not only not require of them any such thing, but as a gracious and merciful Prince, he would succour and support them, that they might be able to maintain their poor Families, whom they nourished (as they were bound to do) to the Service of God, and of their said Lord and Prince: and therefore they desired that it might please him, that their poor Brethren remaining in Captivity and Prison, and such as were sent to the Gallies for the profession of their Religion, might speedily be delivered and set at liberty.

K.Hen. 8

As for their Assemblies and Preachings, they were contented that they should be kept only amongst themselves, in their accustomed Places, and in other Valleys aforesaid, where any Assembly of the Faithful should be, which were desirous to hear the preaching of the Gospel.

Touching the Fortresses, so far as by those which were already made, they had suffered great molestations and troubles, as well concerning their Goods, as also their Religion: they were assured, that if he should build up new Forts, they should never be able to abide the Troubles, Miseries, and Calamities that would follow thereupon; and therefore they most humbly desired the said Dutchels to be so good and gracious unto them, as to obtain of the Duke, that he would accept their Persons in the stead of Forts; and that, seeing those Places were by Nature and of themselves strong and well fortified, it might please their said Lord the Duke to receive them into his protection and safeguard: and by the Grace and Assistance of God they would serve him themselves for such Walls and Forts, that he should not need to build any other. And because many of these which dwelt near about them had robbed and spoiled them, not only of their household Goods and such other things, but also driven away their Cattel; that it might please him to give them leave to recover the said Goods by way of Justice, and to buy again that which the Souldiers had sold, and that for the same price for the which it was sold.

Briefly, they also besought their said Lord, that it may please him to be so gracious unto them, as to grant them a confirmation of all their Franchises, Immunities, and Privileges, as well general as particular, given unto them as well by him as by his Predecessors: likewise of those which as well they as their Ancestors had bought of their Lords, and to receive them, as his most humble and obedient Subjects, into his protection and safeguard.

And because in time past, in the stead of good and speedy Justice, all iniquity was committed by those that had the administration of Justice in their Valleys, and so far as their Purges were emptied and punished rather than the Malefactors, that it might please him to give order that such Justice might be done amongst them; whereby the Wicked might be punished with all severity, and the innocent defended and maintained in their right.

Finally, so far as divers of this poor People (being astonished at the coming of the Army, and fearing lest they should not only be spoiled of all their Good, but also they with their Wives and Children be utterly destroyed) made promise against their Consciences, to live according to the Traditions of the Church of Rome: they were marvelously troubled and tormented in spirit; and did nothing but languish in that distress. Wherefore they humbly besought the said Dutchels to take pity upon them, and to obtain that they might not be compelled to do any thing against their Conscience; and moreover, that it might please the Duke to permit them to live in liberty and freedom of Conscience; also, that all their poor Brethren, banished for the Cause of Religion, might return home to their Houses; and that all Confiscations and Penalties made against them, might be abolished. And for their part, they promised to give all due reverence and honour to God and his Holy Word, and to be true and faithful Subjects unto their Lord and Prince. Yea, more than any other. Underneath the said Supplication there was written:

Torment of Conscience in sliding from the Truth.

Your faithful and humble Subjects, the poor afflicted of the Valleys of Luserne, Angrogne, St. Martin, and Perouse, and generally all the People of the Waldos, which inhabit the Country of Piedmont.

After that this Supplication was viewed and read of the said Dutchels, she so persuaded with the Duke, that answer was made with these conditions, declared in these Articles following.

Conclusions

K. Hen. 8

Conclusions and Articles lastly agreed upon between the right honourable Lord of Raconis on the part of the Duke's Highness, and them of the Valleys of Piedmont, called the Walldoys.

That there shall shortly be made Letters Patents by the Duke's Highness, by the which it may appear that he hath forgiven and pardoned them of the Valleys of Angrogne, Boby, Villars, Valquichard, Rora, Taileret, La Rua de Bonet (bordering upon Toune) St. Martin, Perouse, Roccapia, St. Baribolomew, and all such as have aided them; of all such Faults as they have committed, as well in bearing Armour against his Highness, as against the Lords and certain other Gentlemen whom he retained and kept in his protection and safeguard.

That it shall be lawful for them of Angrogne, Boby, Villars, Valquichard, Rora, (Members of the Valley of Luserne) and for them of Rodris, Marce, Manailan, and Salva, Members of the Valley of St. Martin, to have their Congregations, Sermons, and other Ministeries of their Religion in places accustomed.

That it shall be lawful for them of Villars (Members of the Valley of Luserne) to have the same, but that only until the time that his Highness doth build a Fort in the same place. But whilst the said Fort is in building, it shall not be lawful to have their Preachings and Assemblies within the said precinct of the place, but it shall be lawful for them to build a place for that purpose near at hand, where they shall think good, on that side towards Boby. Nevertheless it shall be permitted to their Ministers to come within the Precinct aforesaid, to visit the sick, and exercise other things necessary to their Religion, so that they preach not, nor make any Assembly there.

It shall also be permitted to them of Taileret, La Rua de Bonet, bordering upon Toune, to have their Sermons and Assemblies in places accustomed, so that they enter not for that purpose into the rest of the Confines of Toune.

That it shall not be lawful for the said Members of the Valleys of Luserne and St. Martin, to come to the rest of their Borders, nor any other of his Highness Dominions: nor to have their Preachings, Assemblies, or Disputations, out of their own Borders, having liberty to have them therein. And if they be examined of their Faith, it shall be lawful for them to answer without danger of punishment in Body or Goods.

The like shall be lawful for them of the parish of Perouse, which at this present are fled because of the said Religion, and were wont to have their Assemblies and Preachings, and other Ministeries according to their Religion, at the place called le Puis: so that they come not to other places and borders of the said Parish.

It shall be permitted to them of the Parish of Pinachia, of the Valley of Perouse, which at this present be fled because of the said Religion, and were wont to go to Sermons and Assemblies, and other Ministeries of that Religion, to have the like, only at the place called le Grandobion.

It shall be permitted to them of the Parish of S. Germain, of the Valley of Perouse, and to them of Roccapia, which at this present are fled because of the said Religion, and continue in the same, to have one only Minister, which may the one day preach at St. Germain, at the place called le Adornilleux, and the other day at Roccapia, at the place called Vandini only.

It shall be permitted to all them of the Towns and Villages of the said Valleys, which at this present are fled, and continue in the said Religion, notwithstanding any promise or abjuration made before this War against the said Religion, to repair and return to their Houses with their Households, and to live according to the same, going and coming to the Sermons and Assemblies which shall be made by their Ministers in the places above specified; so that they obey that which is above-said.

And because that many of the said Towns and Villages dwell out of the Precinct of the Preaching, having need to be visited, and of other things according to their said Religion, their Ministers, which dwell within the Precinct, shall be suffered, without prejudice, to visit and duly aid them of such Ministeries as shall be necessary for them, so that they make no Sermons or Assemblies.

By especial Grace it shall be permitted to all them of the Valley of Meane, and them of St. Baribolomew, Neighbours to Roccapia, and are fled and continue in the said Religion, peaceably to enjoy the Grace and Liberties granted in the next Article before, so that they observe all which they before promise to observe.

The Goods already seized as forfeit, shall be restored to all the Inhabitants of the said Valleys, and to all that are fled and continue in the said Religion, as well of them of the said Valleys, as of Roccapia, St. Baribolomew, and of Meane, so that they be not seized for any other cause than for the said Religion, and for the War present and lately past.

It shall be lawful for them aforesaid to recover by way of Justice, of their Neighbours, their moveable Goods and Cattel, so it be not of Souldiers: and that which hath been sold, they shall also recover by way of Justice, so that they restore the price for which it hath been sold. Their Neighbours shall have the like against them.

All the Franchises, Freedoms, and Privileges, as well general as particular, granted as well by his Highness Predecessors, as by himself, and obtained of other inferior Lords; whereof they shall make proof by publick writing, shall be confirmed unto them.

The said Valleys shall be provided for, to have good Justice ministered unto them, whereby they may know they are kept in safeguard by his Highness, as well as all his other Subjects.

The Inhabitants of the said Valleys, shall make a Roll of all the Names and Surnames of all them of the said Valleys, which are fled for Religion, as well such as have abjured as others, to the end they may be restored and maintained in their Goods and Households, and enjoy such Grace and Benefits as their Prince and Lord hath bestowed on them.

And inasmuch as it is known to every Man, that the Prince may build Fortresses in his Country, where it shall please him without contradiction, nevertheless to take all suspicion out of the minds of the aforesaid Walldoys, it is declared, that if at any time hereafter his Highness will make a Fort of Villars, the Inhabitants of the said place shall not be constrained to bear the Charges, but only as they shall think good, lovingly to aid their Prince. Which Fort being builded (by God's Aid) a Governor and Captain shall therein be appointed, which shall attempt nothing but the service of his Highness, without offence of the Inhabitants, either in their Goods or Consciences.

It shall be lawful for them, before the discharging of their Ministers, such as it shall please his Highness to have discharged, to chuse and call other in their steads: so that they chuse not Mr. Martin de Pragela, nor change not from one place to another of the said Valleys, any of them which be discharged.

The Mass, and other Service after the usage of Rome, shall be kept in all the Parishes of the said Valleys, where the Sermons, Assemblies, and other Ministeries of their Religion are made; but none shall be compelled to be present thereat, nor to minister aid or favour to such as shall use that Service.

All the Expences and Charges born by his Highness in this War, shall be forgiven and released to them for ever: also the 8000 Crowns wherein the Inhabitants of the said Valleys were behind, as part of 16000 Crowns which they had promised in the War passed. And his Highness will command that the Writings for that cause made, shall be annulled and cancelled.

Furthermore, his Highness shall let order to stay all troubles, inconveniences, secret conspiracies of wicked Persons, after such sort, that they shall remain quietly in their Religion. The honourable Lord of Raconis doth promise, that the Duke's Highness shall confirm and allow the foresaid Conclusions to them, both generally and particularly, at the intercession and special favour of the noble Lady the Princess.

In testimony whereof, the foresaid Lord of Raconis hath confirmed these present Conclusions with his own hand; and the Ministers have likewise subscribed in the name of all the said Vallies; and they which can write, in the name of all their Communalities.

At Cavor, the 5th day of June, 1562.

Philip of Savoy,
Francis Valla, Minister of Villars.
Claudius Burgius, Minister of Taillet.
Georgius Monastierius, Michael Rammet.

This Accord being thus made and passed, by the means of the Dutchess of Savoy, the poor Waldoys have been in quiet until this present: and God of his infinite goodness having delivered them out of so many troubles and conflicts, hath set them at liberty to serve him purely, and with quietness of conscience.

Wherefore there is none at this present, (except he be altogether blind or senseless) but he seeth and well perceiveth, that God would make it known by experience to these poor Waldoys, and all other faithful People, that all things turn to the best to them which love and fear him: For by all these Afflictions which they suffered, (as is before rehearsed) this good heavenly Father hath brought them to repentance and amendment of life; he hath effectually taught them to have recourse to his Fatherly Mercy, and to embrace Jesus Christ for their only Saviour and Redeemer.

Furthermore, he hath taught them to tame the desires and lusts of the Flesh, to withdraw their hearts from the World, and lift them up to Heaven; and to be always in a readiness to come to him, as unto their most loving and pitiful Father. To be short, he hath sent them to the School of his Children, to the end they should profit in patience and hope; to make them to mourn, weep, and cry unto him. And above all, he hath made them so often to prove his succours at time of need, to see them before their eyes, to feel and touch them with their hands (as a Man would say) after such sort, that they have had good occasion, and all the Faithful with them, never to distrust so good a Father, and so careful for the health of his Children, but to assure themselves they shall never be confounded, what thing soever happen.

And yet to see this more manifestly, and that every Man may take profit thereof, it shall be good to understand what this poor People did whilst they were in these Combats and Conflicts. So soon as they saw the Army of their Enemies approach, they cried all together for aid and succour to the Lord; and before they came to defend themselves, they fell to prayer, and in fighting lifted up their hearts, and fought to the Lord. As long as the Enemies were at rest, every one of these poor People on their knees called upon God. When the Combat was ended, they gave him thanks for the comfort and succour which they had felt. In the mean time the rest of the People, with their Ministers, made their hearty prayer unto God, with sighs and tears, and that from the morning until the evening. When night was come, they assembled again together: They which had fought, rehearsed the wonderful aid and succour which God had sent them, and so all together rendred thanks unto him for his fatherly goodness. Always he changed their sorrow into joy. In the morning trouble and affliction appeared before them, with great terror on all sides; but by the evening they were delivered, and had great cause of rejoicing and comfort.

This poor People had two terrible Enemies, War and Famine, which kept them under in such sort, that a Man would have thought they had been utterly lost and destroyed: But God of his endless mercy delivered them from such dangers, and restored them to their houses, where they remained afterwards in peace and quietness; and all they which had declared themselves to be their open Enemies, were brought to confusion, as well those which fought to get their goods, as those which only desired to shed their blood. For proof whereof, the only example of two Gentlemen of the Valley of Luserne shall suffice. These not only moved cruel War against their poor Tenants and others, but most shamefully spoiled them, and took intolerable Fines of all those that disobeyed their Edicts to keep a good Conscience.

Besides this, they went about to seize all their Goods as forfeit, waiting to have the whole forfeiture thereof themselves. And for this cause they did not only incense the Duke with false reports, and with grievous complaints and accusations against these poor Waldoys, but also pursued the same so long, and with such charges, that they were fain to sell their inheritance, in hope to bring their purpose to pass, and to enjoy that goodly Prey, which they thought could not escape their hands. But in the end for their reward they got nothing but shame and confusion.

And as for the Monks and Priests, which by such means thought to advance themselves, and to bring their Turbidity in estimation, they have lost the little Rule which they had over that People, and are confounded, and their Religion brought to disdain. Thus God beareth down those which exalt themselves above measure, and maketh his Adversaries to fall into the pits which they themselves have made. Let us pray unto him therefore, that it would please him likewise to stretch out his puissant Arm at this day to maintain his poor Church now afflicted, and to confound all the devices of Satan and his Members, to the advancement of his Glory and Kingdom.

The Conclusion of the Story.

And thus hast thou, Christian Reader, for thy erudition and comfort, the story and doings discoursed concerning these two Countries, both of Province and also of Piedmont, the one being subject under the dominion of France, the other belonging to the Duke of Savoy; in the which two foresaid Regions and Countries how long the Gospel of Christ hath continued (even from the time of the first Waldenses) the History itself declareth.

Furthermore, what injuries and Wrongs have been done against them for the Gospel's sake, what rigour and cruelty hath been shewed of the adversary part: again, for their part, what patience in their suffering, what constancy in their doctrine, what truth in their words, and simplicity in their deeds, what obedience towards their Magistrates, and faith towards God they have used; and finally, how miraculously and mightily God hath fought for his People, and confounded the Enemies, the said History may give thee full knowledge and experience.

Then they which are in Jewry, let them fly in to the Mountains, Luke 21.

The Walds compelled to defend themselves.

Note how the Lord blessed the Walds, leading to their own defence.

Wherein this thou hast moreover, for thy more learning, to note and consider with thy self, besides many other memorable things in this Story contained, how unwilling this People were at first, and what remorse of Conscience they had for their obedience towards their Magistrates, to lift up any hand or finger for their own defence. And therefore many of them being slain and cruelly murdered, as willingly offering their Throats without any resistance to the cruel hands of their Enemies, the rest were compelled to fly into the Mountains, being spoiled of House, Victual, and Weapon, only to save their poor lives with flying (which otherwise they would not with resisting) in Rocks and Caves, thinking there rather to perish by Famine, than to use that defence for themselves, which Nature giveth to every brute Beast to help it self, as it may, against violence and injury. Yet these poor Walds refusing all resistance, and laying down their own Weapons (for obedience sake) yea, not lifting up their own hands to defend their own heads, only used the poor shift of flying from their Enemies, till at length, the rage of those bloody Persecutors, satisfied with no Blood, nor contented with any reason, ceased not fill most furiously to infect them, yea, to take also the Mountains from them, which he had taken from them their Houses before; neither yet permitting them to live with the wild Beasts in the Desert, which could not live in their Towns at home, till at length, by extreme necessity, the Providence of God so working with them, they were compelled to turn their faces, and to take those Weapons, which the ground gave unto their hands. And with these stones so marvellously the God of Hosts wrought for his People, that they beat, vanquished, and overthrew their Adversaries, they confounded their Pride, they abated their Malice, and at last stayed the intolerable rage of their Persecution. So mercifully and victoriously the Lord God Omnipotent fought with his People, or rather for his People, they but turning almost their faces to their Enemies, no otherwise than he fought in times past with Jehona against the Heathen, with the Israelites against the Philistines, with the Maccabees against Antiochus and the Syrians.

This History carrying with it a true narration of things done in the said Country of Piedmont, and written as it seemeth by certain of the Ministers which were at the doing thereof, with the like faith and simplicity we have collected, partly out of the Italian, and partly out of the French Tongue: for in both Languages it is written, altho in the French Tongue it is much more largely discoursed, which Book most principally herein we have followed; the Title whereof thus beginneth, Histoire des persecutions & Guerres faitz contre le peuple appelle Vauds, &c.

Now that we have finished these Foreign Histories, concerning such Matters as have been passed in other Realms and Nations, of Germany, Italy, Spain, France, and Savoy; consequently it remaineth, after this digress, to return and reduce our story again to our own Country Matters, here done and passed at Home, after that first we shall have added one foreign Story more concerning the martyrdom of a Christian Jew, which suffered about these years in Constantinople among the Turks, in this wise as followeth.

The story of a Christian Jew in Constantinople, martyred by the Turks.

A Jew christened and martyred at Constantinople. Anno 1528.

The Turks of Constantinople.

TO these Foreign Martyrs aforesaid we will adjoin the History of a certain Jew, who in the year of our Lord 1528, dwelling in the City of Constantinople, and there receiving the Sacrament of Baptism, was converted; and became a good Christian. When the Turks understood hereof, they were vehemently exasperated against him, that he forsaking his Jewishness, should be regenerate to the Faith of Christ; and fearing lest his Conversation should be a detriment to their Mahometical Law, they sought means how to put him to death; which in short time after they accomplished. And for the greater infamy to be done to the Man, they cast his dead Corps into the streets, commanding that no Man should be so hardy as to bury the same.

Wherein the marvellous Glory and Power of Christ appeared. For the dead Corps lying so by the space of nine days in the midst of the streets, retained so his native colour, and was so fresh, without any kind of filthiness or corruption, and also not without a certain pleasant and delectable scent or odour, as if it had been lately slain, or rather not slain at all. Which when the Turks beheld, they were thereat marvellously astonished; and being greatly afraid, they themselves took it up, and carried it to a place near without the Town, and buried it.

Antichrist long hid, and now revealed.

Having thus comprehended the Troubles and Persecutions of such godly Saints, and blessed Martyrs, which have suffered in other Forreign Nations above mentioned: here now ending with them, and beginning the eighth Book, we are, God willing, to return again to our own Matters, and to prosecute such Acts and Records, as to our own Countrey of England do appertain. In the process whereof, among many other things, may appear the marvellous Work of God's Power and Mercy in suppressing and banishing out of this Realm, the long usurped Supremacy of the Pope: also in subverting and overthrowing the Houses of Monks and Friars, with divers other matters appertaining to the Reformation of Christ's true Church and Religion. All which things as they have been long wished, and greatly groaned for in times past of many godly learned Men: so much more ought we now to rejoice and give God thanks, seeing these days of Reformation which God hath given us. If John Husse, or good Jerome of Prague, or John Wickliffe before them both, or William Brute, Thorpe, Swinderby, or the Lord Cobham; If Zisca with all the Company of the Bohemians; if the Earl Reymundus, with all the Tholosians; if the Waldos, or the Albigenses, with infinite other, had been either in these our Times now, or else had seen then this ruin of the Pope, and revealing of Antichrist, which the Lord now hath dispensed unto us, what joy and triumph would they have made! Wherefore now beholding that thing which they so long time have wished for, let us not think the benefit to be small, but render therefore most humble thanks to the Lord our God: who by his mighty Power, and the brightness of his Word, hath revealed this great Enemy of his so manifestly to the eyes of all Men, who before was hid in the Church so colourably, that almost few Christians could espy him. For who would ever have judged or suspected in his mind, the Bishop of Rome (commonly received and believed, almost of all Men, to be the Vicar and Vicegerent of Christ here in Earth) to be Antichrist, and the great Adversary of God, whom St. Paul so expressly prophesieth of in these latter days to be revealed by the brightness of the Lord's coming, as all Men now for the most part may see it is come to pass? Wherefore to the Lord, and Father of Lights, who revealeth all things in his due time, be praise and glory for ever. Amen.

During which time their Children were sent for to Gray-Friers in Coventry, before the Warden of the said Friers, called Frier Stafford: who straitly examining them of their Belief, and what Heresies their Fathers had taught them, charged them upon pain of suffering such death as their Fathers should, in no wise to meddle any more with the Lords Prayer, the Creed, and Commandments in English.

so took it from her, and espied that it was the Lords Prayer, the Articles of the Faith, and the Ten Commandments in English. Which when the wretched Sumner understood; Ab Sirrba, said he, Come, as good now as another time; and so brought her back again to the Bishop, where she was immediately condemned, and so burned with the six Men before named, the Fourth of April, in a place thereby called the little Park, Anno 1519.

Robert Silkeby.
At Coventry Anno 1521.

In the same number of these Country Men above rehearsed was also Robert Silkeby, who at the apprehension of these, as is above recited, fled away, and for that time escaped. But about two years after he was taken again, and brought to the said City of Coventry, where he was also burned the morrow after he came thither, which was about the Thirteenth day of January, Anno 1521.

Thus, when these were dispatched, immediately the Sheriffs went to their Houses, and took all their Goods and Cattel to their own use, not leaving their Wives and Children any parcel thereof to help themselves withal. And forasmuch as the people began to grudge somewhat at the cruelty shewed, and at the unjust death of these innocent Martyrs, the Bishop, with his Officers and Priests, caused it to be noised abroad by their Tenants, Servants, and Farmers, that they were not burned for having the Lords Prayer and the Commandments in English, but because they did eat Flesh on Fridays and other Fast days. Which could not be proved either before their death or after, nor yet was any such matter greatly objected to them in their examinations. The witnesses of this History be yet alive, which both saw them and knew them. Of whom one is by name Mother Hall, dwelling now in Bacington, two miles from Coventry. By whom also this is testified of them, that they above all other in Coventry pretended most shew of worship and devotion at the holding up of the Sacrament, whether to colour the matter, or no, it is not known. This is certain, that in godliness of life they differed from all the rest of the City: Neither in their occupying would they use any Oath, nor could abide it in them that occupied with them.

conference and familiarity with learned men, namely with Franciscus Lambertus, so profited in knowledge, and mature judgment in matters of Religion, that he through the incitation of the said Lambert was the first in all that University of Marpurge which publicly did set up Conclusions there to be disputed of, concerning Faith and Works: arguing also no less learnedly than fervently upon the same. What these propositions and conclusions were, partly in his Treatise hereafter following, called Patrick's Places, may appear.

Thus the ingenious wit of this learned Patrick increasing daily more and more in knowledge, and inflamed with godliness, at length began to resolve with himself touching his return into his Country, being desirous to impart unto his Country-men, some fruit of understanding, which he had received abroad. Whereupon, perceiving in his godly purpose, he took one of the three which he brought out of Scotland, and so return home without any longer delay. Where he not sustaining the miserable ignorance and blindness of that people, after he had valiantly taught and preached the truth, and refuted their abuses, was first accused of Heresie, and afterward constantly and stoutly sustaining the quarrel of Gods Gospel, against the High-Priest and Archbishop of Saint Andrews, named James Beton, was cited to appear before him and his College of Priests, the First day of March, Anno 1527. But he being not only forward in knowledge, but also ardent in Spirit, not tarrying for the hour appointed, prevented the time, and came very early in the morning before he was looked for, and there mightily disputing against them, when he could not by the Scriptures be convicted, by force he was oppressed: and so the Sentence of Condemnation being given against him, the same day after Dinner, in all the hot haste, he was had away to the Fire, and there Burned; the King being yet but a Child, which thing made the Bishops more bold. And thus was this Noble Hamelton, the blessed Servant of God, without all just cause, made away by cruel Adversaries, yet not without great fruit to the Church of Christ; for the grave testimony of his blood left the verity and truth of God more fixed and confirmed in the hearts of many, than ever could after be pluckt away: inasmuch that divers afterward, standing in his quarrel, sustained also the like Martyrdom, as hereafter (Christ willing) shall appear, as place and time shall require.

In the mean season we think good to express here his Articles, and Order of his Process, as we received them from Scotland, out of the Registers.

{KING
Hm.8.}

The Articles and Opinions objected against Master Patrick Hamelton, by James Beton Archbishop of Saint Andrews.

Articles out of the Registers.

That Man hath no Free-will.

That there is no Purgatory.

That the Holy Patriarks were in Heaven before Christs passion.

That the Pope hath no power to loose and bind: Neither any Pope had that power after Saint Peter.

That the Pope is Antichrist, and that every Priest hath the power that the Pope hath.

That Master Patrick Hamelton was a Bishop.

That it is not necessary to obtain any Bulls from any Bishop.

That the Vow of the Popes Religion is a Vow of Wickedness.

That the Popes Laws be of no strength.

That all Christians, worthy to be called Christians, do know that they be in the state of Grace.

That none be saved, but they are before Predestination.

Whoever is in deadly sin, is unfaithful.

That God is the cause of sin, in this sense, that is, that he withdraweth his grace from Men, whereby they sin.

That it is diabolical Doctrine, to enjoy to any inner actual penance for sin.

That the said Master Patrick himself doubteth whether all Children, departing incontinent after their Baptism, are saved or condemned.

That Auricular Confession is not necessary to Salvation.

These Articles above written were given in, and laid against M. Hamelton, and inserted in their Registers, for the which also he was condemned, by them which hated him to death. But other learned Men, which commended and reasoned with him, do testify, that these Articles following were the very Articles, for the which he suffered.

1. Man hath no Free-will.

2. A Man is only justified by Faith in Christ.

3. A Man so long as he liveth, is not without sin.

4. He is not worthy to be called a Christian, which believeth not that he is in grace.

5. A good Man doth good Works: good Works do not make a good Man.

6. An evil Man bringeth forth evil Works: evil Works, being faithfully repented, do not make an evil Man.

7. Faith, Hope, and Charity be so linked together, that one of them cannot be without another in one Man in this Life.

And as touching the other Articles, whereupon the Doctors gave their Judgments, as divers do report, he was not accused of them before the Bishop. Albeit in private disputation he affirmed and defended the most of them.

Here followeth the Sentence Pronounced against him.

The sentence is given by Patrick
Hamelton.

Christi nomine invocato: We James, by the mercy of God, Archbishop of Saint Andrews, Primate of Scotland, with the Council, Decree, and Authority of the Most reverend Fathers in God, and Lords, Abbots, Doctors, of Theology, Professors of the Holy Scripture, and Masters of the University, assisting us for the time, sitting in Judgment within our Metropolitan Church of Saint Andrews, in the cause of Heretical gravity, against Master Patrick Hamelton, Abbot or Penitentiary of Fettes, being summoned to appear before us, to answer to certain Articles affirmed, taught, and preached by him, and so appearing before us, and accused, the merits of the cause being ripely weighed, discussed, and understood by faithful Inquisition made in Lent last past: We have found the same Master Patrick many ways infamed with Heresie, disputing, holding and maintaining divers Heresies of Martin Luther, and his Followers, repugnant to our Faith, and which are already * condemned by general Councils, and most famous Universities. And he being under the same Infamy, we deeming before him to be summoned and accused upon the Premises, he of evil mind (as may be presumed) passed to other parts forth of the Realm, suspected and noud of Heresie. And being lately returned, not being admitted, but of his own head, without licence or prorsenledge, hath presumed to preach wicked Heresie.

We have found also, that he hath affirmed, published, and taught divers Opinions of Luther, and wicked Heresies, after that he was summoned to appear before us, and our Council: That Man hath no Free-will: That Man is in sin so long as he liveth: That Children, incontinent after their Baptism, are sinners: All Christians, that be worthy to be called Christians, do know that they are in grace: No man is justified by works, but by faith only: Good works make not a good man, but a good man doth make good works: That Faith, Hope, and Charity are so knit, that he that hath the one hath the rest, and he that wanteth the one of them wanteth the rest, &c. with divers other Heresies and detestable Opinions: and hath persisted so obstinate in the same, that by no counsel nor persuasion he may be drawn therefrom to the way of our right faith.

All these premises being considered, we having God and the integrity of our Faith before our eyes, and following the council and advice of the Professors of the Holy Scripture, Men of Law, and other assisting us for the time, do pronounce, determine, and declare the said Master Patrick Hamelton, for his affirming, confessing, and maintaining of the foresaid Heresies, and his pertinacity (they being condemned already by the Church, general Councils, and most famous Universities) to be an Heretick, and to have an evil opinion of the Faith, and therefore to be condemned and punished like as we condemn, and define him to be punished, by this our sentence definitive, depriving and sentencing him to be deprived of all Dignities, Orders, Offices, and Benefices of the Church, and therefore do judge, and pronounce him to be delivered over unto the secular Power, to be punished, and his goods to be confiscated.

This our sentence definitive was given and read at our Metropolitan Church of St. Andrews, the last day of the Month of February, Anno 1527, being present the Most reverend Fathers in Christ, and Lords, Gawand, Bishop of Glasgow, George, Bishop Dunkeld, John Bishop of Brechin, William Bishop of Dunblane, Patrick Prior of Saint Andrews, David Abbot of Abbotrothke, George Abbot of Dunfermeling, Alexander, Abbot of Caumbus Kineth, Henry Abbot of Lendons, John Prior of Peterweme, the Dean and SubDean of Glasgow, M. Hugh Spens, Thomas Ramfay, Allane Meldrum, &c. in the presence of the Clergy and the People.

After the condemnation and Martyrdom of this true Saint of God was dispatched by the Bishops and Doctors of Scotland, the Rulers and Doctors of the University of Louvaine, hearing thereof, received such joy and consolation at the shedding of that innocent Blood, that for the abundance of heart they could not stay their Pen to utter condign thanks, applauding and triumphing in their Letters sent to the aforesaid Bishop of Saint Andrews, and Doctors of Scotland, at the worthy and famous deservings of their achieved enterprise in that behalf; as by the Tenour of their said Letter may appear, which here followeth.

The copy of a Letter congratulatory, sent from the Doctors of Louvaine to the Archbishop of Saint Andrews and Doctors of Scotland, commending them for the death of M. Patrick Hamelton.

Your excellent Vertue (most honourable Bishop) hath a Letter, &c. so deserved, that albeit we be far distant both by sea and land, without conjunction of familiarity, yet we desire with all our hearts to thank you for your worthy deed, by whose works that true Faith, which not long ago was tainted with Heresie, not only remaineth unburnt, but also is more confirmed. For as our dear Friend

The which thing as it is thought commendable to us, so the manner of the proceeding was no less pleasant, that the matter was performed by so great consent of so many States, as of the Clergy, Nobility, and vulgar People, not rashly, but most prudently, the Order of Law being in all points observed. We have seen the sentence which ye pronounced, and always do approve the same, not doubting but that the Articles which be inserted are Erroneous: so that whosoever will defend for a truth any one of the same, with pertinacity, should be esteemed an enemy to the Faith, and an adversary to the holy Scripture. And albeit one or two of them appear to be without Error, to them that will consider not the bare words: as for example, Good Works make not a good Man, but a good Man worketh good Works: yet there is no doubt but they contain a Lutheran sense, which in a manner they signifie, to wit, that Works done after faith and justification make not a Man the better, nor are worthy of any reward before God. Believe not that this example shall have place only among you, for there shall be among extrene Nations which shall imitate the same, &c.

Certainly ye have given us great courage, so that now we acknowledge your University, which was founded according to the example of our University of Lovaine, to be equal to ours, or else above; and would God occasion were offered of testifying our minds toward you. In the mean time let us labour with one consent, that the ravening Wolves may be expelled from the Sheepfold of Christ, while we have time. Let us study to Preach to the People more learnedly hereafter, and more wisely. Let us have Inquisitors, and espies of Books containing that Doctrine, especially that are brought in from far Countries, whether by Apostate Monks, or by Merchants, the most suspected kind of Men in these days. It is said, That since Scotland first embraced the Christian Faith, it was never defiled with any Heresie. Persevere therefore, being moved therunto by the example of England your Neighbour, which in this most troublous time is not changed, partly by the working of the Bishops, among the which * Rollensis hath shewed himself an Evangelical Phoenix, and partly of the King, declaring himself to be another Matthias of the New Law, pretermittin nothing that may defend the Law of his Realm. Let your reverend Fatherhood take this little testimonial of our duty toward you in good part, whom we wish long and happily well to fare in Christ.

From Lovain, Anno 1528. April 21.

By the Masters and Professors of Theology in the University of Lovaine.

Yours to command.

In this Epistle of the Lovainian Doctors I shall not need (gentle Reader) to note unto thee, what a penititious thing in a Common-wealth is blind ignorance, when it falleth into cruel Hearts. Which may well be compared to a Sword put into the Hands of one that is both Blind and Mad. For as the blind Man, having no sense to see and judge, knoweth not whom he slinketh: so the madman, being cruel and furious, hath no compassion in sparing any. Whereupon it happeneth many times with these Men, as it did with the Blind furious Pharisees, that as they having the Sword of Authority in their hands, in stead of Malefactors and false Prophets, slew the true Prophets of God, and at last Crucified the King of Glory: so these Catholick Lovainians, and followers of their Messias of Rome, take in their hands the Sword of Jurisdiction, who neither seeing what to spare, nor caring whom to smite, under the stile and pretence of Heretics, murder and blaspheme, without mercy, the true Preachers of the Gospel, and the holy Anointed of the Lord.

But to return to the matter again of M. Hamelton; here is moreover to be observed, as a note worthy of memory, that in the year of our Lord 1564, in the which year this present History was Collected in Scotland, there were certain faithful Men of credit then alive, who being present the same time when M. Patrick Hamelton was in the Fire, heard him to cite and appeal the Black-frier called Cambel, that accused him to appear before the high God, as general Judge of all Men, to answer to the innocency of his death, and whether his accusation was just or not, between that and a certain day of the next Month, which he there named. Moreover, by the same witness it is testified, that the said Frier died immediately before the said day came, without remorse of conscience that he had persecuted the innocent. By the example whereof divers of the people the same time much moved, and firmly believed the Doctrine of the forefraid Matter Hamelton to be good and just.

Herunto I thought good to adjoin a certain godly and profitable Treatise of the said M. Patrick Hamelton, written first by him in Latin, and afterward translated by John Frith into English; which he names Patrick's places: not unprofitable in my mind, to be seen and read of all Men, for the pure and comfortable Doctrine contained in the same, as not only by the Treatise it self may appear, but also by the preface of the said John Frith, prefixed before, which also I thought not inconvenient to insert with the same, as here followeth.

A brief Treatise of M. Patrick Hamelton, called Patrick's places, Translated into English by John Frith, with the Epistle of the said Frith prefixed before the same, as followeth.

John Frith unto the Christian Reader.

Blessed be God of our Lord Jesus Christ, which in these last days and perilous times hath stirred up in all Countries witnesses unto his Son, to testify the truth unto the unfaithful. To save at the least some from the snares of Antichrist, which lead to perdition, as ye may here perceive by that excellent and well learned young Man, Patrick Hamelton, born in Scotland of a noble Progeny: who to testify the truth sought all means, and took upon him Prisonhood (even as Paul circumcised Timothy, to win the weak Jews) that he might be admitted to Preach the pure Word of God. Notwithstanding, as soon as the Chamberlain and other Bishops of Scotland had perceived that the Light began to shine, which disclosed their falsehood that they conveyed in darkness, they laid hands on him, and because he would not deny his Saviour Christ at their instance, they burnt him to ashes. Nevertheless, God of his bounteous mercy (to publish to the whole World what a Man these Monsters have murdered) hath reserved a little Treatise, made by this Patrick, which places, if ye list, ye may call Patrick's Places: for it treateth exactly of certain Common places, which knowen, ye have the pith of all Divinity. This Treatise I have turned into the English-Tongue, to the profit of my Nation: to whom I beseech God to give light, that they may eschew the deceitful paths of perdition, and return to the right way which leadeth to life everlasting. Amen.

The Ten Commandments of God.

A division of the Commandments.
Ex. 20.

1. Thou shalt Worship but one God.
2. Thou shalt make thee no Image to worship it.
3. Thou shalt not swear by his Name in Vain.
4. Hold the Sabbath day Holy.
5. Honour thy Father and thy Mother.
6. Thou shalt not kill.
7. Thou shalt not commit adultery.
8. Thou shalt not steal.
9. Thou shalt not bear false witness.
10. Thou shalt not desire ought that belongeth to thy Neighbour.

All these Commandments are briefly comprised in these two bere under ensuing.

Love thy Lord God with all thine Heart, with all thy Soul, and with all thy Mind, This is the first, and great Commandment. The second is like unto this, that is, Love thy Neighbour as thy self. On these two Commandments hangeth all the Law and the Prophets.

Mat. 22.

Certain General Propositions proved by the Scripture.

The first Proposition.

He that loveth God loveth his Neighbour.

The first Proposition.
The love of God.

This Proposition is proved 1 John 4. If a Man say, I love God, and yet hateth his Brother, he is a lyer. He that loveth not his Brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?

The second Proposition.

He that loveth his Neighbour as himself, keepeth all the Commandments of God.

This Proposition is proved Mat. 7. Rom. 13. Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, even so do to them. For this is the Law and the Prophets, Mat. 7.

He that loveth his Neighbour, fulfilleth the Law. Thou shalt not commit adultery: Thou shalt not kill: Thou shalt not steal: Thou shalt not bear false witness: Thou shalt not desire, &c. And if there be any other Commandment, all are comprehended in this saying, Love thy neighbour as thy self, Rom. 13.

All the Law is fulfilled in one word, That is, Love thy Neighbour as thy self. Galatians 5.

Gal. 5.

Argument.

Major. Bar- He that loveth his Neighbour keepeth all the Commandments of God. Romans 13.
Minor. ba- He that loveth God, loveth his Neighbour. 1 John 4.
Conclusion. ra. Ergo, he that loveth God keepeth all the Commandments of God.

The fourth Proposition.

He that hath Faith loveth God.

The third
Proposition.
The love of God.

My Father loveth you, because you love me, and believe that I come of God. John 16.

Argument.

Major. Bar- He that keepeth the Commandments of God hath the love of God.
Minor. ba- He that hath Faith keepeth all the Commandments of God.
Conclusion. ra. Ergo, he that hath Faith loveth God.

The fourth Proposition.

He that keepeth one Commandment of God, keepeth them all.

This Proposition is confirmed, Heb. 11. It is impossible for a Man without Faith to please God, that is, To keep any one of Gods Commandments, as he should do. Then whosoever keepeth any one Commandment hath Faith.

Hebr. 11.

Argument.

Bar- He that hath Faith keepeth all the Commandments of God. Major.
ba- He that keepeth one Commandment of God hath Faith. Minor.
ra. Ergo, he that keepeth one Commandment, keepeth them all. Conclusion.

The fifth Proposition.

He that keepeth not all the Commandments of God, keepeth not one of them.

The fifth Proposition.

Argument.

He that keepeth one Commandment of God, keepeth all. The Law requires perfect obedience.
Ergo, he that keepeth not all the Commandments of God, keepeth not one of them. Conclusion.

The sixth Proposition.

It is not in our power to keep any one of the Commandments of God.

The sixth Proposition or assertion.

Argument.

Bar- It is impossible to keep any of the Commandments of God, without grace. Major.
ra- It is not in our power to have Grace. Minor.
co. Ergo, it is not in our power to keep any of the Commandments of God. Conclusion.

And even so may you reason concerning the Holy Ghost and Faith, forasmuch as neither without them we are able to keep any of the Commandments of God, neither yet be they in our power to have. Non est volentis neque currentis, &c. Rom. 9.

The seventh Proposition.

The Law was given us to shew our sin.

By the Law cometh the knowledge of sin; Rom. 3. I knew not what sin meant, but through the Law: For I had not known what lust had meant, except the Law had said, Thou shalt not lust. Without the Law sin was dead, that is, It moved me not, neither wist I that it was sin, which notwithstanding was sin, and forbidden by the Law; Rom. 7.

Rom. 7.

The eighth Proposition.

The Law biddeth us do that thing which is impossible for us.

The eighth Proposition.

Argument.

Da- The keeping of the Commandments is to us impossible. Major.
ri- The Law commandeth to us the keeping of the Commandments. Minor.
i. Ergo, the Law commandeth unto us that is impossible. Conclusion.

Objection.

Objection.

But thou wilt say: Wherefore doth God bid us do that is impossible for us?

Answer.

Answer.

I answer, to make thee know that thou art but evil, and that there is no remedy to save thee in thine own hand: and thou maiest seek remedy at some other: for the Law doth nothing else but command thee.

The Law, ordained to bring us to Christ.

The Doctrine of the Gospel.

The Gospel is as much to say in our Tongue, as good tydings; like as these be here-under following, and such other.

Luke 2. Christ is the Saviour of the World.

Esey 53. Christ bare our sins on his back.
1 Tim. 1. Christ came into this World to save Sinners.
1 Job. 3. Christ came into this World to take away our sins.
1 Tim. 2. Christ was the price that was given for us and our sins.
Rom. 8. Christ was made Debtor for us.
Col. 2. Christ hath payed our Debt, for he died for us.
1 Cor. 7. Christ made satisfaction for us and our sins.
1 Cor. 1. Christ is our Righteousness.
1 Cor. 1. Christ is our Sanctification.
Eph. 2. Christ is our Redemption.
Rom. 5. Christ is our Peace.
1 Cor. 3. Christ hath pacified the Father of Heaven for us.
Coloss. 2. Christ is ours and all his.
1 Job. 1. Christ hath delivered us from the Law, from the Devil and from Hell.
 The Father of Heaven hath forgiven us our sins, for Christs sake.
 Or any such other like to the same, which declare unto us the mercy of God.

The Nature and Office of the Law and of the Gospel.

The Law sheweth us our sin.
Rom. 3. The Gospel sheweth us Remedy for it.
Job. 1. The Law sheweth us our Condemnation.
Rom. 7. The Gospel sheweth us our Redemption.
Col. 1. The Law is the word of Ire.
Rom. 4. The Gospel is the word of Grace.
Act. 14. 20 The Law is the word of Despair.
Deut. 27. The Gospel is the Word of Comfort.
Rom. 7. The Law is the word of Unrest.
Luke 2. The Gospel is the Word of Peace.
Eph. 6.

¶ A Disputation between the Law and the Gospel, where is shewed the difference or contrariety between them both.

The Law faith, Pay thy Debt.
 The Gospel faith, Christ hath paid it.
 The Law faith, Thou art a Sinner, despair, and thou shalt be damned.
 The Gospel faith, Thy sins are forgiven thee, be of good comfort, for thou shalt be saved.
 The Law faith, Make amends for thy sins.
 The Gospel faith, Christ hath made it for thee.
 The Law faith, The Father of Heaven is angry with thee.
 The Gospel faith, Christ hath pacified him with his Blood.
 The Law faith, Where is thy Righteousness, Goodness, and Satisfaction?
 The Gospel faith, Christ is thy Righteousness, thy Goodness, Satisfaction.
 The Law faith, Thou art bound and obliged to me, to the Devil, and to Hell.
 The Gospel faith, Christ hath delivered thee from them all.

The Doctrine of Faith.

Faith is to believe God, like as Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for Righteousness.
 To believe God, is to believe his Word, and to recount it true that he saith.
 He that believeth not Gods Word, believeth not God himself.

He that believeth not Gods Word counteth him false and a liar, and believeth not that he may and will fulfil his Word, and so he denieth both the might of God, and God himself.

The ninth Proposition.

The ninth Proposition

¶ Faith is the Gift of God.

Argument.

Da-ri-i. Every good thing is the Gift of God.
 Faith is good.
 Ergo, Faith is the Gift of God.

Major.
Minor.
Conclusion.

The tenth Proposition.

The tenth Proposition.

¶ Faith is not in our power.

Argument.

Da-ri-i. The Gift of God is not in our power.
 Faith is the Gift of God.
 Ergo, Faith is not in our power.

Major.
Minor.
Conclusion.

The eleventh Proposition.

The eleventh Proposition.

¶ He that lacketh Faith cannot please God.

Without Faith it is impossible to please God, Rom. 14. all that cometh not of Faith is sin; for without Faith can no man please God, Heb. 11.

Induction.

An argument called Inductive.

He that lacketh Faith trusteth not God; he that trusteth not God, trusteth not his Word; he that trusteth not his Word, holdeth him false and a liar; he that holdeth him false and a liar believeth not that he may do what he promiseth, and so denieth he that he is God.

Ergo, a primo ad ultimum, he that lacketh Faith cannot please God.

If it were possible for any man to do all the good deeds that ever were done, either of Men or Angels, yet being in this case it is impossible for him to please God.

The twelfth Proposition.

The twelfth Proposition.

¶ All that is done in Faith pleaseth God.

Right is the Word of God, and all his Works in faith, Psal. 33.
 Lord thine eyes look to Faith: That is as much to say, as, Lord thou delightest in Faith, Jer. 5.

The thirteenth Proposition.

The thirteenth Proposition.

¶ He that hath Faith is just and good.

Argument.

Da-ri-i. He that is a good Tree bringing forth good fruit, is just and good.
 He that hath Faith is a good Tree bringing forth good fruit.
 Ergo, He that hath Faith is just and good.

Major.
Minor.
Conclusion.

The fourteenth Proposition.

The fourteenth Proposition.

¶ He that hath Faith, and believeth God, cannot displease him.

Induction.

Inductive.

He that hath Faith believeth God; he that believeth God believeth his Word; he that believeth his Word wotteth well that he is true and faithful, and may not lie, knowing that he both may and will fulfil his Word.

Ergo, a primo ad ultimum, he that hath Faith cannot displease God, neither can any man do a greater honour to God, than to count him true.

Objection.

PRINCIPLE
1. Hm. 8. 1
Objection.

Objection.

Thou wilt then say, That Theft, Murder, Adultery, and all Vices please God.

Answer.

Nay verily, for they cannot be done in Faith: For a good Tree beareth good fruit, Mat. 7. 12.

The 15th Proposition

The fifteenth Proposition.

A definition of Faith, Heb. 11.

¶ Faith is a certainty or assuredness.

Faith is a sure confidence of things which are hoped for, and certainty of things which are not seen, Hebrews 11.

The same Spirit certifieth our spirit, that we are the Children of God, Rom. 8. Moreover, he that hath faith worketh well that God will fulfil his Word. Whereby it appeareth, that Faith is a certainty or assuredness.

A man is justified by Faith.

Justification by Faith.

Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness, Rom. 4.

We suppose therefore, that a man is justified by Faith, without the deeds of the Law, Rom. 3. Gal. 2.

He that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the wicked, his faith is counted to him for righteousness, Rom. 4.

The just liveth by his Faith, Abac. 2. Rom. 1.

We wot that a man is not justified by the deeds of the Law, but by the Faith of Jesus Christ, and we believe in Jesus Christ, that we may be justified by the Faith of Christ, and not by the deeds of the Law, Gal. 2.

Faith in Christ what is it.

What is the Faith of Christ?

The Faith of Christ is to believe in him; that is, to believe his Word, and believe that he will help thee in all thy need, and deliver thee from all evil.

Thou wilt ask me, What Word? I answer, The Gospel.

He that believeth in Christ shall be saved, Mark 16.

He that believeth the Son hath everlasting life, John 3.

Verily I say unto you, he that believeth in me hath everlasting life, John 6.

This I write unto you, that you believe on the Son of God, that ye may know that you have eternal life, 1 John 5.

Thomas, because thou hast seen me, therefore hast thou believed: Happy are they which have not seen, and yet have believed in me, John 22.

All the Prophets to him bear witness, that whosoever believeth in him shall have remission of their sins, Acts 10.

What must I do that I may be saved? The Apostles answered, Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, Acts 16.

If thou acknowledge with thy mouth that Jesus is the Lord, and believest with thine heart that God raised him from death, thou shalt be safe, Rom. 10.

He that believeth not in Christ shall be condemned. He that believeth not the Son shall never see life, but the ire of God biddeth upon him, John 3.

The Holy Ghost shall reprove the World of sin, because they believe not in me, John 16.

They that believe in Jesus Christ are the Sons of God.

We are all the Sons of God, because ye believe in Jesus Christ, 1 John 3.

He that believeth that Christ is the Son of God is safe, John 1.

Peter said, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God. Jesus answered and said unto him, Happy art thou Simon the Son of Jonas, for flesh and blood hath not opened to thee this, but my Father that is in Heaven, Matth. 16.

We have believed and know that thou art Christ the Son of the living God.

I believe that thou art Christ the Son of God, which should come into the World, John 11.

These things are written that ye might believe, that Jesus is Christ the Son of God, and that ye in believing might have life, John 20.

I believe that Jesus is the Son of God, Acts 8.

The sixteenth Proposition.

He that believeth the Gospel believeth God.

The sixteenth Proposition.

Argument.

Da- He that believeth Gods Word believeth God.

ri- The Gospel is Gods Word.

i. Ergo, He that believeth the Gospel believeth God.

Major.

Minor.

To believe the Gospel is this, That Christ is the Saviour of the World, John 4.

Christ is our Saviour, Luke 2.

Christ bought us with his blood, Heb. 13. 1 Pet. 1.

Apoc. 5.

Christ washed us with his blood, Apoc. 1.

Christ offered himself for us, Heb. 9.

Christ bare our sins on his own back, &c. 1 Pet. 2.

Conclud.

The seventeenth Proposition.

¶ He that believeth not the Gospel believeth not God.

The seventeenth Proposition.

Argument.

Fe- He that believeth not Gods Word, believeth not God himself.

ri- The Gospel is Gods Word.

i. Ergo, he that believeth not the Gospel believeth not God himself; and consequently he that believeth not those things above written, and such other, believeth not God.

Major.

Minor.

Conclud.

The eighteenth Proposition.

He that believeth the Gospel shall be saved.

The eighteenth Proposition.

Go ye into all the World, and preach the Gospel unto every Creature: he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved: but he that believeth not shall be condemned, Mark 16.

¶ A Comparison between Faith and Incredulity.

Faith is the root of all good.

Incredulity is the root of all evil.

Faith maketh God and man good Friends.

Incredulity maketh them Foes.

Faith bringeth God and man together.

Incredulity sundreth them.

All that Faith doth, pleaseth God.

All that Incredulity doth, displeaseth God.

Faith only maketh a man good and righteous.

Incredulity only maketh him unjust and evil.

Faith maketh a man a Member of Christ.

Incredulity maketh him a Member of the Devil.

Faith maketh him Inheritor of Heaven.

Incredulity maketh a man the Inheritor of Hell.

Faith maketh a man the Servant of God.

Incredulity maketh him the Servant of the Devil.

Faith sheweth us God to be a sweet Father.

Incredulity sheweth him a terrible Judge.

Faith holdeth stiff by the Word of God.

Incredulity wavereth here and there.

Faith counteth and holdeth God to be true.

Incredulity holdeth him false and a liar.

Faith knoweth God.

Incredulity knoweth him not.

Faith loveth both God and his Neighbour.

Incredulity loveth neither of them.

Faith only saveth us.

Incredulity only condemneth us.

A comparison between Faith and Incredulity.

Faith

Faith extollet God and his deeds.
Incredulity extollet her self and her own deeds.

Of Hope.

What Hope is.

Hope is a trusty looking, after the thing that is promised us to come as we hope after the everlasting Joy, which Christ hath promised unto all that believe in him.

We should put our hope and trust in God alone, and in no other thing.

IT is good to trust in God and not in man, Psal. 118.

He that trusteth in his own heart is a Fool, Prov. 28.

It is good to trust in God, and not in Princes, Psal. 118.

They shall be like unto the Images which they make, and all that trust in them, Psal. 115.

He that trusteth in his own thoughts doth ungodly, Prov. 12.

Cursed is he that trusteth in man, Jer. 17.

Bid the rich men of this World that they trust not in their unstable riches, but that they trust in the living God, 1 Tim. 6.

It is bad for them that trust in money to enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, Luke 18.

Moreover we should trust in him only, that may help us, God only may help us, therefore we should trust in him only.

Well are they that trust in God, and woe to them that trust not in him, Psal. 2. Jer. 17.

Well is that man that trusteth in God, for God shall be his trust, Psal. 14. Eccles. 34.

He that trusteth in him shall understand the verity, Sap. 3.

They shall rejoyce that trust in thee: they shall ever be glad, and thou wilt defend them, Psal. 5.

Of Charity.

The rule of Charity.

Charity is the love of thy Neighbour. The rule of Charity is this; Do as thou wouldst be done to: for Christ holdeth all alike, the Rich, the Poor, the Friend and the Foe, the Thankful and Unthankful, the Kinsman and Stranger.

A Comparison between Faith, Hope, and Charity.

A difference between Faith, Hope and Charity.

Faith cometh of the Word of God, Hope cometh of Faith, and Charity springeth of them both.

Faith believeth the Word, Hope trusteth after that that is promised by the Word; Charity doth good unto her Neighbour, through the love that it hath to God, and gladness that is within her self.

Faith looketh to God and his Word; Hope looketh unto his Gift and Reward; Charity looketh on her Neighbours profit.

Faith receiveth God; Hope receiveth his Reward; Charity loveth her Neighbour with a glad heart, and that without any respect of reward.

Faith pertaineth to God only; Hope to his Reward, and Charity to her Neighbour.

The Doctrine of Works.

No manner of Works make us righteous.

What good Works do.

WE believe that a man shall be justified without Works, Rom. 3.

No man is justified by the deeds of the Law, but by the Faith of Jesus Christ, and we believe in Jesus Christ that we may be justified by the Faith of Christ, and not by the deeds of the Law: for if righteousness come by the Law, then died Christ in vain, Gal.

That no man is justified by the Law is manifest; for as Al. 17. righteous man liveth by his Faith, but the Law is not of Faith.

Moreover, sith Christ the Maker of Heaven and Earth, and all that is therein, behoved to die for us, we are compelled to grant that we were so far drowned and sunk in sin, that neither our deeds, nor all the Treasures that ever God made or might make, could have holpen us out of them: therefore, no Deeds or Works may make us righteous.

ARGUMENT
Hm. 8. }
Works do not make us righteous.

No Works make us unrighteous.

IF any evil Works make us unrighteous; then the contrary Works should make us righteous. But it is proved that no Works can make us righteous: therefore no Works make us unrighteous.

ARGUMENT
Hm. 8. }
Works do not make us unrighteous.

Works make us neither good nor evil.

IT is proved that Works neither make us righteous nor unrighteous: therefore no Works make us either good or evil; for righteous and good are one thing, and unrighteous and evil likewise one.

ARGUMENT
Hm. 8. }
Works make us neither good nor evil before God.

Good works make not a good man, nor evil works an evil man: but a good man bringeth forth good works, and an evil man evil works.

Good fruit maketh not the tree good, nor evil fruit the tree evil: But a good tree beareth good fruit, and an evil tree evil fruit.

ARGUMENT
Hm. 8. }
The goodness of the tree good before his fruit.

A good man cannot do evil works, nor an evil man good works: for a good tree cannot bear evil fruit, nor an evil tree good fruit.

A man is good ere he do good works, and evil ere he do evil works: for the tree is good ere it bear good fruit, and evil ere it bear evil fruit.

Every man, and the works of man, are either good or evil.

Every tree, and the fruits thereof, are either good or evil. Either make ye the tree good, and the fruit good also, or else make the tree evil, and the fruit of it likewise evil, Mat. 12.

ARGUMENT
Hm. 8. }
Good fruits are signs of a good tree, but not the cause thereof.

A good man is known by his works: for a good man doth good works, and an evil man evil works. Ye shall know them by their fruit; for a good tree beareth good fruit, and an evil tree evil fruit. A man is likened to the tree, and his works to the fruit of the tree.

Beware of the false Prophets, which come to you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly they are ravening Wolves: Ye shall know them by their fruits, Luke 7.

None of our Works either save us or condemn us.

IF works make us neither righteous nor unrighteous, then thou wilt say, It maketh no matter what we do. I answer, If thou do evil, it is a sure argument that thou art evil, and wastest Faith. If thou do good, it is an argument that thou art good, and hast Faith; for a good tree beareth good fruit, and an evil tree evil fruit. Yet good fruit makes not the tree good, nor evil fruit the tree evil; so that man is good ere he do good deeds, and evil ere he do evil deeds.

ARGUMENT
Hm. 8. }
Works do not save or condemn.

The man is the tree, his works are the fruit.

Faith maketh the good tree, and Incredulity the evil tree: such a tree, such fruit, such a man, such works. For all things that are done in Faith please God, and are good works; and all that are done without Faith displease God, and are evil works.

ARGUMENT
Hm. 8. }
Faith maketh the man good. A good man maketh good works.

Whoever believeth or thinketh to be saved by his works, denieth that Christ is his Saviour, that Christ died for him, and all things that pertain to Christ. For how is he thy Saviour, if thou mightest save thy self by thy works, or whereto should he die for thee, if any works might save thee?

ARGUMENT
Hm. 8. }
To say that our Works do save us, is to deny that Christ is our Saviour.

What is this to say, Christ died for thee? Verily that thou shouldst have died perpetually; and Christ to deliver thee from death died for thee, and changed thy perpetual death, into his own death: for thou madest the fault, and he suffered the pain, and that for the love he had to thee before thou wast born, when thou hadst done neither good nor evil.

Now

{ KING } Now seeing he hath paid thy debt, thou needest not, { Hm. 8. } neither canst thou pay it; but shouldst be damned if his blood were not. But sith he was punished for thee, thou shalt not be punished.

Finally, he hath delivered thee from thy condemnation and all evil, and deliveth nought of thee, but that thou wilt acknowledge what he hath done for thee, and bear it in mind, and that thou wouldst help other for his sake both in word and deed, even as he hath holpen thee for nought, and without Reward.

O how ready would we be to help other, if we knew his goodness and gentleness towards us, he is a good and a gentle Lord, for he doth all for nought. Let us, I beseech you, therefore follow his footsteps, whom all the World ought to praise and worship. Amen.

¶ He that thinketh to be saved by his Works calleth himself Christ.

No Saviour but Christ. FOr he calleth himself the Saviour, which pertaineth to Christ only.

What is a Saviour, but he that saveth? and he saith, I saved my self, which is as much to say as, I am Christ; for Christ only is the Saviour of the World.

¶ We should do no good Works for the intent to get the Inheritance of Heaven, or remission of sin.

No remission but in Christ. FOR whosoever believeth to get the Inheritance of Heaven, or Remission of Sin, through Works, he believeth not to get the same for Christs sake; and they that believe not that their sins are forgiven them, and that they shall be saved for Christs sake, they believe not the Gospel: for the Gospel saith, You shall be saved for Christs sake, your sins are forgiven for Christs sake.

He that believeth not the Gospel, believeth not God. So it followeth, that they which believe to be saved by their works, or to get remission of their sins by their own deeds, believe not God, but recount him as a Liar, and so utterly deny him to be God.

Objection.

Thou wilt say, Shall we then do no good deeds?

Answer.

Good works excluded not to be left undone, but not to justify us, when they are done. I say not so, but I say we should do no good Works to the intent to get the Inheritance of Heaven, or Remission of Sin. For if we believe to get the Inheritance of Heaven through good Works, then we believe not to get it through the promise of God. Or if we think to get Remission of our Sins by our deeds, then we believe not that they are forgiven us, and so we count God a Liar. For God saith, Thou shalt have the Inheritance of Heaven for my Sons sake. Thy sins are forgiven thee for my Sons sake: and you say it is not so, But I will win it through my Works.

Not the doing of good works, but the trusting in good works condemned. Thus you see I condemn not good deeds, but I condemn the false trust in any works; for all the works wherein a man putteth any confidence, are therewith poisoned, and become evil.

Wherefore thou must do good works, but beware thou do them not to deserve any good through them; for if thou do, thou receivest the good not as the Gifts of God, but as debt to thee, and makest thy self Fellow with God, because thou wilt take nothing of him for nought. And what needeth he any thing of thine, which giveth all things, and is not the poorer?

Therefore do nothing to him, but take of him, for he is a gentle Lord, and with a gladder will giveth us all that we need, than we can take it of him; if then we want ought, let us thank our selves.

Pres not therefore to the Inheritance of Heaven through presumption of thy good works; for if thou do, thou countest thy self holy and equal to God, because thou wilt take nothing of him for nought; and so shalt thou fall as Lucifer fell for his pride.

FINIS.

¶ Certain brief Notes or Declarations upon the foresaid places of Master Patrick.

THis little Treatise of Master Patricks Places, albeit in quantity it be short, yet in effect it comprehendeth matter able to fill large Volumes, declaring to us the true Doctrine of the Law, of the Gospel, of Faith, and of Works, with the nature and properties, and also the difference of the same. Which difference is thus to be understood, that in the cause of Salvation, in the office of justifying, these are to be removed and separated asunder, the Law from the Gospel, and Faith from Works: otherwise in the person that is justified, and also in order of Doctrine, they ought commonly to go necessarily together.

Therefore, wheresoever any question, or doubt riseth of Salvation, or our justifying before God, there the Law and all good works must be utterly excluded and stand apart, that Grace may appear free, the promise simple, and that Faith may stand alone, which Faith alone without Law or Works, worketh to every man particularly his Salvation, through meer promise, and the free Grace of God. This word particularly, I add, for the particular certifying of every mans heart, privately and peculiarly, that believeth in Christ. For as the Body of Christ is the cause efficient of the redemption of the whole World in general: so is Faith the instrumental cause, by which every man applyeth the said Body of Christ particularly to his own Salvation. So that in the action and office of justification, both Law and Works here be utterly secluded, and exempted, as things having nothing to do in this behalf. The reason is this, for seeing that all our Redemption universally springeth only from the Body of the Son of God crucified, then is there nothing that can stand us in stead, but that only wherewith this Body of Christ is apprehended. Now, forasmuch as neither the Law nor Works, but Faith only is the thing which apprehendeth the Body and Death of Christ, therefore Faith only is that matter which justifieth every Soul before God, through the strength of that object which it doth apprehend. For the object only of our Faith is the Body of Christ, like as the brazen Serpent was the only faueth object only of the eyes of the Israelites looking, and not of their hands working: by the strength of which object, through the promise of God, immediately proceeded health to the beholders. So the Body of Christ, being the object of our Faith, striketh righteousness to our Souls, not through working, but believing only.

Thus you see how Faith, being the only eye of our Soul, standeth alone with her object in case of justifying; but of necessity, in the body she standeth not alone: for besides the Eye, there be also Hands to work, Feet to walk, Ears to hear, and other Members more, every one convenient for the service of the Body, and yet there is none of them all that can see, but only the eye. So in a Christian mans life, and in order of Doctrine, there is the Law, there is Repentance, there is Hope, Charity, and deeds of Charity; all which in Life and in Doctrine are joyed, and necessarily do concur together, and yet in the action of justifying there is nothing else in man, that hath any part or place but only Faith apprehending the Object, which is the Body of Christ Jesus for us crucified, in whom consisteth all the worthiness and fulness of our Salvation, by Faith; that is, by our apprehending and receiving of him according as it is written, John 1. Whosoever received him he gave them power to be made the Sons of God, even all such as believed in his Name, &c. Also Eley 53. And this just Servant of mine in the knowledge of him shall justify many, &c.

As many as received him, to them he gave power, that they should become the Sons of God, to them that believe in his Name, &c. John 1. And he that receiveth him, that he give power, that they should become the Sons of God, to them that believe in his Name, &c. Eley 53.

Argument.

Da- Apprehending and receiving of Christ only maketh us justified before God, John 1.
si- Christ only is apprehended and received by Faith.
fi. Ergo, Faith only maketh us justified before God.

Argument.

Argument.

- Be- Justification cometh only by apprehending and receiving of Christ, Eph 53.
 ro. The Law and Works do nothing pertain to the apprehending of Christ.
 co. Ergo, the Law and Works pertain nothing to Justification.

Argument.

- All our righteousness, is as filthy rags, Eph 64.
 Ce- Nothing which is unjust of it self can justify us before God, or help any thing to our Justifying.
 lo- Every work we do is unjust before God, Eph 64.
 rs. Ergo, no work that we do can justify us before God, nor help any thing to our justifying.

Argument.

- When ye have done all that is commanded you, say we are unprofitable servants, Luke 17. Without me ye can do nothing, John 15.
 Co- If works could any thing further our Justification, then should our works something profit us before God.
 me- No works, do the best we can, do profit us before God, Luke 17.
 rs. Ergo, no works that we do can any thing further our Justification.

Argument.

- Be- All that we can do with God, is only by Christ, Joh 15.
 ro. Our works and merits be not Christ, neither any part of him.
 co. Ergo, our works and merits can do nothing with God.

Argument.

- The Law worketh anger, Rom 4.
 Da- That which is the cause of condemnation, cannot be the cause of justification.
 ri- The Law is the cause of condemnation, Rom 4.
 in. Ergo, it is not the cause of Justification.

A Consequent.

- Now are we quit and delivered from the Law, being dead to that wherein we were once holden, Rom 7.
 We are quit and delivered from the Law, Rom 7.
 Ergo, we are not quit and delivered by the Law.
 Forasmuch therefore as the truth of the Scripture in express words, hath thus included our Salvation in Faith only, we are enforced necessarily to exclude all other causes and means in our Justification, and to make this difference between the Law and the Gospel, between Faith and works, affirming, with Scripture and word of God, that the Law condemneth us, our works do not avail us, and that Faith in Christ only justifieth us. And this difference and distinction ought diligently to be learned and retained of all Christians, especially in conflict of conscience between the Law and the Gospel, Faith and Works, Grace and Merits, Promise and Condition, Gods free election and mans Free-will: so that the light of the free Grace of God in our Salvation may appear to all consciences, to the immortal Glory of Gods holy Name. Amen.

The order and difference of places.

Antithesis.
 The Law to be discerned from the Gospel.

The Gospel. { Faith. Promise. }
 { Grace. Election. }

The Law. { Works. Condition. } { Merits. Mans free-will. }

- 'The difference and repugnance of these forefald places being well noted and expended, it shall give no small light to every faithful Christian, both to understand the Scriptures, to judge in cases of Conscience, and to reconcile such places in the Old and New Testament, as else may seem to repugn, according to the rule of S. Augustine, saying, Distingue tempora, & conciliabis Scripturas, &c. Make distinction of times, and thou shalt reconcile the Scriptures, &c. Contrariwise where men be not perfectly in these places instructed, to discern between the Law and the Gospel, between faith and works, &c. So long they can never rightly establish their minds in the free Promises of Gods Grace: but walk confidently without order, in all matters of Religion. Example whereof we have too much in the Romish Church, who confounding these places together without distinction, following no method, have perverted the true order of Christian Doctrine, and have obscured the sweet comfort and benefit of the Gospel of Christ, not knowing what the true use of the Law was of the Gospel meaneth.

The ignorance and blindness of the Popes Churches in confounding these places.

¶ In the Doctrine of the Law three things to be noted.

'In the Law therefore three things are to be considered. First, what is the true vigour and strength of the Law, which is, to require full and perfect obedience of the whole man, not only to restrain his outward actions, but also his inward motions, and inclinations of will and affection from the appetite of sin. And therefore saith St. Paul, The Law is spiritual, but I am carnal, &c. Rom 7. Whereupon rightly this Proposition, That it is not in our nature and power to fulfil the Law, item, the Law commandeth that which is to us impossible, &c.

The first point to be noted in the Doctrine of the Law.

The strength of the Law.

'2. The second thing to be noted in the Doctrine of the Law, is, to consider the time and place of the Law, what they be, and how far they extend. For as the surging Seas have their banks and bars to keep them in; so the Law hath its times and limits, which it ought not to pass. If Christ had not come and suffered, the time and dominion of the Law had been everlasting. But now seeing Christ hath come, and hath died in his righteous Flesh, the power of the Law against our sinful flesh doth cease. For the end of the Law is Christ, Rom 10. that is, the death of Christs Body is the death of the Law to all that believe in him: so that whosoever repent of their sins, and flee to the death and passion of Christ, the condemnation and time of the Law to them is expired. Wherefore this is to be understood as a perpetual rule in the Scripture, that the Law with all his Sentences and Judgments, wherefore they are written, either in the Old Testament or in the New, do ever include a privy exception of repentance and belief in Christ, to the which always it giveth place, having there his end, and can proceed no further: according as St. Paul doth say, The Law is our Schoolmaster until Christ, that we might be justified by Faith, Gal 3.

The due time and place of the Law.

The death of Christ is the death of the Law, that is, of the condemnation of the Law.

'Moreover, as the Law hath its time how long to reign, so also it hath its proper place, where to reign. By the reign of the Law here is meant the condemnation of the Law: for as the time of the Law ceaseth when the Faith of Christ in a true repenting heart beginneth; so hath the Law no place in such as be good and faithful; that is, in Sinners repenting and amending, but only in them which be evil and wicked. Evil men here I call such, which walking in sinful flesh, are not yet driven by earnest Repentance to flee to Christ for Succour. And therefore saith St. Paul, To the just man there is no Law but, set, but to the unjust and disobedient, &c. 1 Tim 1. By the just man here is meant, not he which never had disease, but he who knowing his disease seeketh out the Physician, and being cured, keepeth himself in health, as much as he may, from any more Surfeits. Notwithstanding he shall never so keep himself, but that his health (that is, his new Obedience) shall always remain frail and imperfect, and shall continually need the Physician. Where by the way these three things are to be noted; first, the sickness it self: secondly, the knowing of the sickness: thirdly, the Physician. The sickness is sin. The knowing of the sickness is repentance, which the Law worketh. The Physician is Christ. And therefore although in remission of our sins repentance is joyed with faith, yet it is not the dignity or worthiness of Repentance that causeth remission of sins, but only the worthiness of Faith, whom faith only apprehendeth no more than the feeling of the disease is the cause of health, but only the Physician. For else when a man is cast and condemned by the Law, it is not Repentance that can save or deserve life, but if his pardon come, then is it the grace of the Prince, and not his Repentance that saveth.

The time of the Law how long it lasted, Gal 3.

Justi non est in seipsa, sed in iustitia, &c. iustitia, &c. iustitia, &c.

1 Tim. 1.

'The third point to be considered in the Doctrine of the Law, is, this, that we mark well the end and purpose why the Law is given which is not to bring us to Salvation, but to bring us to Christ. The third point to be considered in the Doctrine of the Law, is, this, that we mark well the end and purpose why the Law is given which is not to bring us to Salvation, but to bring us to Christ.

In remission of sins three things to be noted.

1. The sickness. 2. The knowing of the disease. 3. The Physician. Repentance is joyed with faith, yet it is in no cause of Salvation.

The third point to be noted in the Doctrine of the Law.

tion, nor to work Gods favour, nor to make us good : but rather to declare and convict our wickedness, and to make us feel the danger thereof, to this end and purpose, that we seeing our condemnation, and being in our selves confounded, may be driven thereby to have our refuge to Christ the Son of God, and to submit our selves to him, in whom only is to be found our remedy, and in none other. And this end of the Law discreetly ought to be pondered of all Christians. Otherwise they that consider not this end and purpose of the Law, fall into manifold Errors and Inconveniences. First, they pervert all order of Doctrine. Secondly, they seek that in the Law which the Law cannot give. Thirdly, they are not able to comfort themselves, nor other. Fourthly, they keep mens Souls in an uncertain doubt and dubitation of their Salvation. Fifthly, they obscure the light of Gods Grace. Sixthly, they are unkind to Gods Benefits. Seventhly, they are injurious to Christs Passion, and Enemies to his Cross. Eighthly, they stop Christian liberty. Ninthly, they bereave the Church, the Spouse of Christ, of her due comfort, as taking away the Sun out of the World. Tenthly, in all their doings they shoot at a wrong mark : for where Christ only is set up to be apprehended by our Faith, and so freely to justify us ; they leaving this Justification by Faith, set up other marks, partly of the Law, partly of their own devising, for men to shoot at. And here cometh in the manifest and manifold Absurdities of the Bishop of Romes Doctrine, which (the Lord willing) we will rehearse, as in a Catalogue here following.

1. They erroneously conceive opinion of Salvation in the Law, which only is to be sought in the Faith of Christ, and in no other.
2. They erroneously do seek Gods favour by works of the Law : not knowing that the Law in this corrupt nature worketh only the anger of God, Rom. 3.
3. They err also in this, that where the Office of the Law is divers and contrary from the Gospel, they without any difference confound the one with the other, making the Gospel to be a Law, and Christ to be a Moses.
4. They err in dividing the Law unskillfully into three parts, into the Law-Natural, the Law-Moral, and the Law-Evangelical.
5. They err again in dividing the Law-Evangelical into Precepts and Counsels, making the Precepts to serve for all men, the Counsels only to serve for them that be perfect.
6. The chief substance of all their teaching and preaching resteth upon the works of the Law, as may appear by their Religion, which wholly consisteth in rites, Merits, Traditions, Laws, Canons, Decrees, and Ceremonies.
7. In the Doctrine of Salvation, of Remission, and Justification, either they admit the Law equally with the Gospel, or else, cleaving the Gospel, they teach and preach the Law, so that little mention is made of the Faith of Christ, or none at all.
8. They err in thinking, that the Law of God requireth nothing in us under pain of damnation, but only our obedience in extern actions : as for the inward affections and conscience they esteem but light matters.
9. They, not knowing the true nature and strength of the Law, do erroneously imagine that it is in mans power to fulfil it.
10. They err in thinking, that it is in mans power not only to keep the Law of God, but also to perform more perfect works than be in Gods Law commanded, and these they call the works of perfection. And hereof rise the works of Supererogation, of Satisfaction, of Congruity and Congnity, to store up the Treasure-house the Popes Church, to be sold out to the people for money.
11. They err in saying, that the State Monastical is more perfect for keeping the Counsels of the Gospel, than other States be in keeping the Law of the Gospel.
12. The Counsels of the Gospel they call the vows of their religious men, as profound Humility, perfect Chastity, and wilful Poverty.

13. They err abominably, in equalling their Laws and Constitutions with Gods Law, and in saying, that mans Law bindeth under pain of damnation, no less than Gods Law.

14. They err unskillfully, in punishing the Transgressors of their Laws more sharply than the Transgressors of the Law of God, as appeareth by their Iniquities, and their Canon-Law, &c.

15. Finally they err most horribly in this, that where the free promise of God ascribeth our Salvation only to our Faith in Christ, excluding works : they contrary ascribe Salvation only, or principally to works and merits, excluding Faith. Whereupon ariseth the application of the sacrifice of the Mass, Ex opere operato, for the quick and dead, application of the Merits of Christs Passion, in Bulls, application of the merits of all religious Orders, and such other more, above specified more at large in the former part of this History.

Here follow three Cautions to be observed and avoided in the true understanding of the Law.

The first Caution.

First, That we, through the mis-understanding of the Scriptures, do not take the Law for the Gospel, nor the Gospel for the Law ; but skillfully discern and distinguish the voice of the one from the voice of the other. Many there be, which reading the Book of the New Testament, do take and understand whatsoever they see contained in the said Book, to be only and merely the voice of the Gospel. And contrariwise, whatsoever is contained in the compals of the Old Testament ; that is, within the Law, Stories, Psalms, and Prophets, as well the word and voice of the Law. Wherein they are deceived ; for the preaching of the Law and of the Gospel are mixed together in both the Testaments, as well the Old as the New. Neither is the order of these two Doctrines to be distinguished by Books and leaves, but by the diversity of Gods Spirit speaking unto us. For sometimes in the Old Testament God doth comfort as he comforted Adam with the voice of the Gospel. Sometimes also in the New Testament he doth threaten and terrify, as when Christ threatened the Pharisees. In some places the Old Testament, Moses and the Prophets play the Evangelists : in some other places the Evangelists play the Prophets, as when he called Elijah a Prophet or an Evangelist. In some places likewise Christ and the Apostles supply the part of Moses : And as Christ himself until his death was under the Law (which Law he came not to break, but to fulfil) so his Sermons made to the Jews, run all for the most part upon the perfect Doctrine and Works of the Law, shewing and teaching what we ought to do by the right Law of Justice, and what danger ensueth in not performing the same. All which places of the Scriptures are to be referred to the Law, and vnto the Gospel, where Christ thus preacheth, Blessed be they that be pure of heart, for they shall see God, &c. Mat. 5. Again, Except ye be made like these Children ye shall not enter, &c. Mat. 18. Item, But he that doth the will of my Father shall enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, &c. Mat. 7. Item, the Parable of the unkind Servant, justly cast into prison for not forgiving his Fellow, &c. Mat. 18. The Mat. 18. calling of the rich Glutton into Hell, &c. Luke 16. Item, Luke 16. He that denieth me here before men, I will deny him before my Father, &c. Luke 12. With such other places of like condition. All these (I say) pertaining to the Doctrine of the Law, do ever include in them a secret exception of earnest Repentance and Faith in Christs precious Blood. For else, Peter denied, and yet repented. Many Publicans and Sinners were unkind, unmerciful, and hard-hearted to their fellow Servants, and yet many of them repented, and by Faith were saved, &c. The Grace of Christ Jesus work in us earnest Repentance and Faith in him unfeigned.

Three cautions to be avoided concerning the right understanding of the Law.

The voice of the Gospel foundeth itself sometimes in the Old Testament.

The voice of the Law sometimes is used in the New Testament.

What places of the Scriptures are to be referred to the Law, and vnto
the Gospel.

Briefly, to know when the Law speaketh, and when the Gospel speaketh, and to discern the voice of the one from the voice of the other, this may serve for a note, That when there is any moral work commanded to be done, done, either for eschewing of punishment, or upon promise of any reward temporal or eternal, or else when any promise is made with condition of any work commanded in the Law, there is to be understood the voice of the Law.

The promise of the Gospel is without condition. Free without merit, simple without condition.

Contrary, where the promise of life and salvation is offered unto us freely, without all our merits, and simply without any condition annexed, of any Law, either Natural, Ceremonial, or Moral: all those places, whether they be read in the Old Testament or in the New, are to be referred to the Voice and Doctrine of the Gospel. And this promise of God freely made to us by the Merits of Jesus Christ, so long before prophesied to us in the Old Testament, and afterward exhibited in the New Testament, and now requiring nothing, but our faith in the Son of God, is called properly the Voice of the Gospel, and differeth from the voice of the Law in this, that it hath no condition adjoined of our meriting, but only respecteth the Merits of Christ the Son of God; by whole Faith only we are promised of God to be saved and justified according as we read, Rom. 3. The righteousness of God cometh by Faith in Jesus Christ; in all and upon all that do believe, &c.

What is the Gospel properly.

Rom. 3.

The second caution.

The second caution or danger to be avoided, is, that we now knowing how to discern rightly between the Law and the Gospel, and having intelligence not to mistake the one for the other, must take heed again that we break not the Order between these two, taking and applying the Law where the Gospel is to be applied, either to our selves or toward other. For albeit the Law and the Gospel many times are to be joyned together in order of Doctrine: yet care may fall sometimes, that the Law must be utterly sequestered from the Gospel. As when any person or persons do feel themselves with the Majesty of the Law and Judgment of God so terrified and oppressed, and with the burthen of their sins overweighed and thrown down into utter discomfort, and almost even to the pit of Hell, as happeneth many times to soft and timorous consciences of Gods good Servants: when such mortified hearts do hear, either in preaching or in reading, any such example or place of the Scripture which pertaineth to the Law, let them think the same nothing to belong to them, no more than a mourning-weed belongeth to a Marriage-Feast: and therefore removing utterly out of their minds all cogitation of the Law, of fear, of judgment, and condemnation, let them only set before their eyes the Gospel, the sweet comforts of Gods promise, free forgiveness of sins in Christ, Grace, Redemption, Liberty, rejoicing, Praises, Thanks, Singing, and a Paradise of Spiritual Iocundity, and nothing else: thinking thus with themselves, that the Law hath done his office in them already, and now must needs give place to his better: that is, must needs give room to Christ the Son of God, who is the Lord and Master, the Fulfiller and also the Finisher of the Law; for the end of the Law, is Christ,

Who they be to whom the Gospel only be longeth.

A Mourning Gown in a place of marriage doth not agree.

Christ the Fulfiller, and also the Finisher of the Law.

Rom. 10.

The third caution. How to separate the Law from the Gospel.

The third danger to be avoided, is, that we do not use or apply; on the contrary side, the Gospel in stead of the Law. For as the other before was even as much as to put on a Mourning-Gown in the Feast of a Marriage: so is this but even to cast Pearls before Swine. Wherein is a great abuse among many. For commonly it is seen that these worldly Epicures and secure Mammonists, to whom the Doctrine of the Law doth properly appertain, do receive and apply to themselves most principally the sweet Promises of the Gospel: and contrariwise, the other contrary and bruiled hearts, to whom belong only the joyfull tidings of the Gospel and not the Law, for the most part receive and retain to themselves the terrible Voice and Sentences of the Law. Whereby it cometh to pass, that many do rejoice where they should mourn; and on the other side many do fear and mourn where they need not. Wherefore to conclude, in private use of life, let every person discreetly discern between the Law and the Gospel, and apply apply to himself that which he seeth convenient.

How to joyn both the Law and the Gospel.

And again, in publick order of Doctrine, let every discreet Preacher put a difference between the broken heart of the mourning Sinner, and the unrepentant Worldling, and so conjoyn both the Law with the Gospel, and the Gospel with the Law, that in throwing down the wicked ever he spare the weak-hearted; and again, to spare the weak, that he do not encourage the ungodly. And thus much concerning the conjunction and difference between the Law and the Gospel, upon the occasion of Mr. Patrick's Places.

James Beton
Archbishop of St. Andrews.

Within few years after the Martyrdom of Master Patrick Hamelton, one Henry Forest, a young man born in Lothburgh, who a little before had received the Orders of Bennet and Collet (as they term them) affirmed, and said, That Master Patrick Hamelton died a Martyr, and that his Articles were true: for the which he was apprehended, and put in prison by James Beton Archbishop of Saint Andrews. Who, shortly after, caused a certain Frier, named Walter Laing, to hear his Confession. To whom when Henry Forest in secret confession had declared his conscience, how he thought Master Patrick to be a good man, and wrongfully to be put to death, and that his Articles were true and not heretical, the Frier came and uttered to the Bishop the confession that he had heard, which before was not thoroughly known.

Whereupon it followed, that his Confession being brought as sufficient probation against him, he was therefore convened before the Council of the Clergy and Doctors, and there concluded to be an Heretic, equal in iniquity with Master Patrick Hamelton, and there decreed to be given to the secular Judges to suffer death.

When the day came of his death, and that he should first be degraded, and was brought before the Clergy in a green place, being between the Castle of Saint Andrews and another place called Monymail, as soon as he entered in at the door, and saw the face of the Clergy, perceiving whereunto they tended, he cried with a loud voice, saying, Fie on falsehood, Fie on false Friars, Revealers of Confession: after this day let no man ever trust any false Friars, Contemners of Gods Word, and Deceivers of men. And so they proceeding to degrade him of his small Orders of Bennet and Collet, he said with a loud voice, Take from me not only your own Orders, but also your own Baptism; meaning thereby whatsoever is besides that which Christ himself instituted, whereof there is a great rabblement in Baptism. Then after his degradation, they condemned him as an Heretic equal with Master Patrick aforesaid: and so he suffered death for his faithful Testimony of the truth of Christ and of his Gospel, at the North Church-fille of the Abbey-Church of Saint Andrews, to the intent that all the people of Angush might see the fire, and to might be the more feared from falling into the like Doctrine, which they term by the name of Heretic. Ex Scriptis Testimonii Scriptorum.

Within a year after the Martyrdom of Henry Forest, or thereabout was called James Hamelton of Kyncligow, his Sister Katharine Hamelton, the Spouse of the Captain of Dunbar, also another honest Woman of Lieth, David Straton of the House of Lawrie, and Master Norman Gurley. These were called to the Abby Church of Halyroodhouse in Edinburgh by James Hay Bishop of Ross, Commissioner to James Beton Archbishop, in presence of King James the fifth of that name; who, upon the day of their accusation, was altogether clad in red apparel. James Hamelton was accused as one that maintained the opinion of Master Patrick his Brother. To whom the King gave counsel to depart, and not to appear; for in case he appeared, he could not help him; because the Bishops had periwaded him, that the cause of Heretic did in no wise appertain unto him. And so James fled, and was condemned as an Heretic, and all his Goods and Lands confiscated, and disposed unto others.

Katharine Hamelton his Sister, appeared upon the Scaffold, and being accused of an horrible Heretic, to wit, that her own works could not save her, she granted the same; and after long reasoning between her and Master John Spens the Lawyer, the concluded in this manner. Work here. Work there, what kind of working is all this? I know perfectly, that no kind of works can save me, but only the works of Christ my Lord and Saviour. The King hearing these words, turned him about and laugh, and called her unto him, and caused her to recant, because she was his Aunt, and she escaped.

The Woman of Lieth was detected hereof, that when the Midwife in time of her labour, bad her say, Our Lady help me; she cried, Christ help me, Christ help me, in whose help I trust. She also was caused to recant, and so escaped without confiscation of her goods, because she was married.

Master Norman Gurley, for that he said, there was no such thing as Purgatory, and that the Pope was not a Bishop, but Antichrist, and had no Jurisdiction in Scotland.

Also David Straton, for that he said There was no Purgatory, but the Passion of Christ, and the tribulations of this World; and because that when Master Robert Lawson Vicar of Eglesprig, asked his Tith-Filh of him, he did call them to him out of the Boat, so that some of them fell into the Sea. Therefore he accused him, as one that should have said, that no Tithes should be paid. These two, because after great solicitation made by the King, they refused to abjure and recant, were therefore condemned by the Bishop of Ross as Heretics, and were burned upon the Green side, between Lieth and Edenburgh, to the intent that the Inhabitants of Piffie seeing the fire, might be stricken with terror and fear, not to fall into the like. Ex eodem scripto.

dwelling at Chesham in Bucking-

Anno 1553.

Thomas Harding dwelling at Chesham in the County of Buckingham, with Alice his Wife, was first abjured by William Smith Bishop of Lincoln, Anno 1506, with divers other more, which the same time, for speaking against idolatry and superstition, were taken and compelled, some to bear Fagots, some were burned in the Cheels with hot irons, some condemned to perpetual Prison, some thrust into Monasteries, and spoiled clean of all their Goods, some compelled to make Pilgrimage to the great Block, otherwise called our Lady of Lincoln, some to Walsingham, some to Saint Romuld of Buckingham, some to the Rood of Wendover, some to Saint John Sborne, &c. Of whom mention is made in the Table before.

Of this Thomas Harding much rehearsal hath been made before.

First, This Thomas Harding, with Alice his Wife, being abjured and enjoined Penance, with divers other more, by William Smith Bishop of Lincoln, afterward by the said Bishop was released again, in the year of our Lord 1515, of all such Penance as was enjoined him and his Wife at their Abjuration, except these three Articles following, and were discharged of their Badges, or signs of their Fagot, &c. Only this Penance following the Bishop continued. sub pena relapsi.

First, That neither of them during their life should dwell out of the Parish of Amerham.

Item, That either of them during their life should fast Bread and Ale every Corpus Christi Even.

Item, That either of them should during their lives, upon Corpus Christi day, every year go in Pilgrimage to Atheridge, and there make their offerings, as other people did, but not to do Penance. Also they were licensed by the said Bishop to do their Pilgrimage at Atheridge, on Corpus Christi Even, or Corpus Christi day, or some other, upon any cause reasonable.

This Penance being to them enjoined, Anno 1515, they observed till the year of our Lord 1522, save only in the last year the foresaid Alice his Wife omitted her Pilgrimage going to Atheridge upon Corpus Christi day. Also the said Thomas Harding, being put to his Oath to detect other, because he contrary to his Oath dissembled, and did not disclose them, was thereto enjoined, in Penance for his Perjury, to bear upon his right sleeve, both before and behind, a badge or patch of green Cloth, or Silk, embroidered like a Fagot during his whole life, unless he should be otherwise dispensed withal. And thus continued he from the year one thousand five hundred twenty two, until the year 1532.

At last the said Harding in the year above said 1532, about Easter Holy days, when the other people went to the Church to commit their wonted idolatry, took his way into the Woods, there solitarily, litarly to worship the true living God, in spirit and truth : Where, as he was occupied in a Book of English Prayers, leaning or sitting upon a Stile by the Woods side, it chanced that one did espy him where he was, and came in great haste to the Officers of the Town, declaring, that he had seen Harding in the Woods looking on a Book. Whereupon immediately a rude Rabble of them, like mad men, ran desperately to his house to search for Books, and in searching went so nigh, that under the Boords of his Floor they found certain English Books of holy Scripture. Whereupon this godly Father, with his Books, was brought before John Longland, Bishop of Lincoln, then lying at Woolburn. Who with his Chaplains, calling Father Harding to examination, began to reason with him, proceeding rather with checks and rebukes than with any sound arguments. Thomas Harding, seeing their folly and rude behaviour, gave them but few words, but fixing his trust and care in the Lord, did let them say what they would. Thus at last they sent him to the Bishops Prison, called little-cage, where he did lie with hunger and pain enough for a certain space, till at length the Bishop, sitting in his Tribunal Seat like a Potentate, condemned him for relapse to be burned to ashes, committing the charge and oversight of his Martyrdom to Rouland Messenger, Vicar of great Wickham. Which Rouland at the day appointed, with a rabble of other like to himself, brought Father Harding to Cheesham again. Where, the next day after his return, the said Rouland made a Sermon in Cheesham Church, causing Thomas Harding to stand before him all the preaching time ; which Sermon was nothing else, but the maintaining of the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Rome, and the late of his Apostolical See, with the idolatry, fancies and traditions belonging unto the same. When the Sermon was ended, Rouland took him up to the high Altar, and asked, whether he believed that in the Bread, after the consecration, there remained any other substance than the substance of Christs natural Body born of the Virgin Mary. To this Thomas Harding answered, The Articles of our Belief do teach us, That our Saviour Christ was born of the Virgin Mary, and that he suffered death under Pilate, and rose from death the third day ; that he then ascended into Heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God in the glory of his Father.

Then was he brought into a mans house in the Town, where he remained all night in prayer and godly meditations. So the next morning came the foresaid Rouland again, about ten of the Clock, with a company of Bills and Staves, to lead this godly Father to his burning. Whom a great number both of men and women did follow. Of whom many bewailed his death, and contrary, the wicked rejoiced thereat. He was brought forth, having thrust in his hands a little Crofs of wood, but no Idol upon it. Then he was chained unto the Stake, and desiring the people to pray for him, and forgiving all his enemies and persecutors, he commended his Spirit to God, and took his death most patiently and quietly, lifting up his hands to Heaven, saying, Jesus, receive my spirit.

When they had set fire on him, there was one that threw a Billet at him, and dashed out his Brains ; of what purpose he so did, it is not known ; but as it was supposed, that he might have forty days of pardon, as the Proclamation was made at the burning of William Tilsforth above mentioned ; whereas Proclamation was made the same time, That whosoever did bring a Fagot or a Stake to the burning of an Heretick, should have forty days of pardon. Whereby many ignorant people caused many of their children to bear Billets and Fagots to their burning.

In fine, when the Sacrifice and Burnt-offering of this godly Martyr was finished, and he burnt to ashes, in the Dell, going to Boley, at the North end of the Town of Cheesham, Rouland the Ruler of the roff, commanding silence, and thinking to fend the people away with an Isa, missa est, with a loud voice said to the people these words, not advising belike, what his Tongue did speak, Good People, when ye come home, do not say that you have been at the burning of an Heretick, but of a good true Christian man, and so they departed to Dinner, Rouland with the Rabble of other Priests much rejoicing at the burning of this good man. After Dinner they went to Church to Even-song, because it was Corpus Christi Even, where they fell to singing and chanting, with ringing and piping of the Organs. Well was he that could reach the highest Note, so much did they rejoyce at this goods mans burning. He should have been burned on the Ascension Even, but the matter was deferred unto the Even of Corpus Christi, because they would honour their bready Messias with a bloody Sacrifice. Thus Thomas Harding was consumed to ashes, he being of the age of sixty years and above. Ex testimonio Scrip. Civium Amarhamensium.

I find in the Records of Lincoln, about the same time, and in the said County of Buckinghamshire, in the which the foresaid Thomas Harding did suffer, that divers other for the like Doctrine were molested and troubled, whose names with their causes hereunder followeth.

Elizabeth Wigthbill being brought before Doctor London, in the Parlorage at Stamton Harecourt, and there put to her Oath, deposed against Mistress Alice Doly her Mistis, That the said Mistress Doly, speaking of John Hacker of Colemanstree in London, Water-bearer, said, That he was very expert in the Gospels, and all other things belonging to Divine Service, and could express and declare it, and the Pater noster in English, as well as any Priest, and it would do one good to hear him : saying moreover, That she would in no case that this were known, for hurting the poor man ; commanding moreover the said Elizabeth, that she should tell no man heretof : affirming at that same time, that the foresaid Hacker could tell of divers Prophecies, what should happen in the Realm.

Over and besides, the forenamed Elizabeth deposed, That the said Mistress Doly her Mistis shewed unto her, that she had a Book which held against Pilgrimages ; and after that, she caused Sir John Booth Parson of Briwel, to read upon a Book which he called Legenda aurea ; and one Saints life he read which did speak against Pilgrimages. And after that was read, her Mistis said unto her, Lo Daughter, now ye may hear as I told you, that this Book speaks against Pilgrimages.

Furthermore, it was deposed against Mistress Doly by the said Elizabeth, that she being at Sir William Barentens place, and seeing there in the Closet Images new gilded, said to the said Elizabeth, Look here be my Lady Barentens Gods. To whom the said Elizabeth answered again, That they were fit for remembrance of good Saints. Then said she, If I were in an house where no Images were, I could remember to pray unto Saints as well as if I did see the Images. Nay (said the other) Images do provoke devotion.

It was testified against John Ryburn, by his Sister Elizabeth Ryburn, being put to her Oath, That the coming to him upon the Assumption Even, found him at Supper with Butter and Eggs, and being bid to sit down and eat with him, she answered, that it was no convenient time then to eat. To whom he said again, That God never made such fasting days; but you (quoth he) are so far in Limbo Patrum, that you can never turn again. And in further communication, when she said that she would go on Pilgrimage to the holy Crofs at Wenderover; he said again, that she did naught: For there is never a step (said he) that you set in going on Pilgrimage, but you go to the Devil; and you go to Church to worship that the Priest doth hold above his head, which is but bread; and if you cast it to the Mouse he will eat it; and said, that he would never believe that the Priest hath power to make his Lord.

Item, It was testified by another

ALTHOUGH it be not greatly pertinent unto this our History, nor greatly requisite, in these so weighty matters entreating of Christs holy Martyrs; to discourse much of Thomas Wolsey Cardinal of York: Notwithstanding forsomuch as there be many, which being carried away with a wrong opinion, and estimation of that false glittering Church of Rome, do think that Holiness to be in it, which indeed is not: To the intent therefore, that the vain pomp and pride of that ambitious Church, so far differing from all pure Christianity and godliness, more notoriously may appear to all men, and partly also to refresh the Reader with some variety of matter, I thought compendiously to express the ridiculous and pompous qualities, and demeanor of this forefaid Thomas Wolsey, Cardinal and Legat of Rome, in whom alone the image and life of all other such like followers and professors of the same Church, may be seen and observed. For like as the Lacedaemonians in times past were accustomed to shew and demonstrate drunken men unto their children, to behold and look upon, that through the fowls of that Vice, they might enflame them the more to the stiddy and desire of Sobriety; even so I sholl not be hurtful sometimes to set forth the examples which are not honest, that others might thereby gather the instructions of better and more upright dealing.

Wherefore thou shalt note here (good Reader) in this History, with all judgment, the great difference of life and conversation between this Church and the other true humble Martyrs and Servants of God, whom they have and do yet persecute. And first to begin with the first meeting and coming in of this Cardinal, and his fellow Cardinal Campeius into England: It was about the time when Pope Leo, intending to make War against the Turks, sent three Legates together from Rome, whereof one went into Germany, another into France: Laurentius Campeius was appointed to come into England. When he was come to Calis, and that the Cardinal of York had understanding thereof, he sent certain Bishops and Doctors, with as much speed as he could, to meet the Legat, and to shew him, that if he would have his Embassage effect, he should send in Post to Rome, to have the said Cardinal of York made Legat, and to be joyned with him in Communion. Which thing he much affected, misdoubting lest his authority thereby might perhaps be diminished through the coming of the Legat; and therefore required to be joyned with him in like degree of the Embassage. Campeius being a man light of belief, and suspecting no such matter, gave credit unto his words and sent unto Rome with such speed, that within thirty days after the Bull was brought to Calis, wherein they were both equally joyned in Communion; during which time the Cardinal of York sent to the Legat at Calis red Cloth to cloath his Servants withal, which at their coming to Calis were but meanly apparelled.

When all things were ready, Campeius passed the Seas and landed at Dover, and so kept forth his journey toward London. At every good Town as they passed, he was received with Procession, accompanied with all the Lords and Gentlemen of Kent. And when he came to Black-beath, there met him the Duke of North-folk, with a great number of Prelates, Knights and Gentlemen, all richly apparelled, and in the way he was brought into a rich Tent of Cloth of Gold, where he shifted himself into a Cardinals Robe furred with Ermines, and so took his Mule, riding toward London. Now mark the great humillity in this Church of the Pope, and compare the same with the other Church of the Martyrs, and see which of them is more Gospell-like.

This Campeius had eight Mules of his own, laden with divers Farthels and other preparations. The Cardinal of York, thinking them not sufficient for his estate, the night before he came to London, sent him twelve Mules more, with empty Coffers covered with red to furnish his carriage withal. The next day these twenty Mules were led through the City, as though they had been laden with treasures, apparel and other necessities, to the great admiration of all men, that they should receive a Legat as it were a God, with such and so great treasure and riches. For so the common people do always judge and esteem the majesty of the Clergy, by no other thing than by their outward shewes and pomp; but in the midst of this great admiration there happened a ridiculous spectacle, to the great derision of their pride and ambition. For as the Mules passed through Chesapside, and the people were pressing about them to behold and gaze (as the manner is) it happened that one of the Mules breaking his Collar that he was led in, ran upon the other Mules, whereby it happened, that they so running together, and their Girts being loosed, overthrow divers of their burthens, and so there appeared the Cardinals gay treasure, not without great laughter and scorn of many, especially of Boys and Girls, whereof some gathered up pieces of Meat, other some pieces of Bread and roasted Eggs, some found Horse-shoes and old Boots, with such other Baggage, crying out, Behold here is my Lord Cardinals treasure. The Mulsters being therewithal greatly abashed, gathered together their treasure again as well as they could, and went forward.

About three of the Clock at afternoon, the 29th day of July, the Cardinal himself was brought through the City, with great pomp and solemnity, unto Pauls Church, where when he had blessed all men with the Bishops blessing (as the manner is) he was guided forth unto the Cardinal of Yorks House: where he was received by the said Cardinal, and by him on the next day, being Sunday, was conducted unto the King, to fulfil his Embassage against the Turk, which might have destroyed all Hungary, in the mean time whilst they were tudyng with what solemnity to furnish out their Embassage.

When the Cardinal of York was thus a Legat, he set up a Court, and called it the Court of the Legat, and proved Testaments, and heard causes, to the great hindrance of all the Bishops of the Realm. He visited Bishops, and all the Clergy, exempt, and not exempt; and under colour, of Reformation, he got much treasure, and nothing was reformed, but came to more mischief; for by example of his pride, Priests and all spiritual persons waxed so proud, that they wore Velvet and Silk, both in Gowns, Jackets Doublets and Shoes, kept open lechery, and so highly bare themselves, by reason of his authorities and faculties, that no man durst once reprove any thing in them, for fear to be called Heretick, and then they would make him smoke, or bear a Fagot. And the Cardinal himself was so elated, that he thought himself equal with the King; and when he had said Mass, he made Dukes and Earls to serve him of Wine with Affay taken, and to hold the Basin at the Lavatories.

Furthermore, As he was Embassador sent to the Emperor at Brussels, he had over with him the Great Seal of England, and was served with his Servitors kneeling on their Knees, and many Noblemen of England waiting upon him, to the great admiration of all the Germans: that beheld it; such was his monstrous pomp and pride. This glorious Cardinal in his tragical doings did exceed so far all measure of a good Subject, that he came more like a Prince than a Priest; for although the King bore the sword, yet he bare the stroke, making (in a manner) the whole Realm to bend at his beck, and to dance after his Pipe. Such practices and fetches he had, that when he had well stored his own Coffers, first he fetched the greatest part of the Kings treasure out of the Realm, in twelve great Barrels full of Gold and Silver, to serve the Popes Wars; and as his avaricious mind was never satisfied with getting, so his restless head was so buisie, ruffling in publick matters, that he never ceased before he had set both England, France, Flanders, Spain and Italy together by the ears.

Thus this Legate well following the steps of his Master the Pope, and both of them well declaring the nature of their Religion, under the pretence of the Church practised great hypocrisie, and under the authority of the King he used great extortion, with excessive taxes and loans, and valuation of every mans substance, so pilling the Commons and Merchants, that every man complained, but no redress was had. Neither yet were the Church-men altogether free from the pillax and pollax, from the pilling and polling (I mean) of this Cardinal, who under his power Legantine gave by preventions all Benefices belonging to spiritual persons; by which, hard it is to say, whether he purchased to himself more riches, or hatred of the Spirituality. So far his licence stretched, that he had power to suppress divers Abbys, Priories and Monasteries; and so he did, taking from them all their goods, moveables and unmoveables, except it were a little pension, left only to the heads of certain houses. By the said power Legantine he kept also general Visitations through the Realm, sending Doctor John Alein his Chaplain, riding in his Gown of Velvet, and with a great train, to visit all Religious Houses, whereat the Friars observants much grudged, and would in no wise condescend therunto; wherefore they were openly accused at Pauls-Cross, by Frier Forrest one of the same Order; so that the Cardinal at length prevailed both against them and all other. Against whom great disdain arose among the people, perceiving how he by Visitations, making of Abbots, Probats of Testaments, granting of Faculties, Licences, and other pollings in his Courts Legantine, had made his treasure equal with the Kings, and yet every year he sent great sums to Rome. And this was their daily talk against the Cardinal.

Besides many other matters and grievances which stirred the hearts of the Commons against the Cardinal, this was one, which much pinched them, for that the said Cardinal had sent out certain straight Commissions in the Kings name. That every man should pay the sixth part of his goods. Whereupon there followed great muttering amongst the Commons, in such sort, that it had almost grown to some riotous commotion or tumult, especially in the parts of Sussex, where not the Dukes of Norfolk and Sussex with wisdom and gentleness stept in and appeased the same.

Another thing that rubbed the stomachs of many, or rather which moved them to laugh at the Cardinal was this, to see his insolent presumption, so highly to take upon him, as the Kings chief Counsellor, to set a Reformation in the order of the Kings Household, making and establishing new Ordinances in the same. He likewise made new Officers in the House of the Duke of Richmond, which was then newly begun. In like manner he ordained a Council, and established another Household for the Lady Mary, then being Princess; so that all things were done by his consent, and by none other. All this, with much more, took he upon him, making the King believe that all should be to his honour, and that he needed not to take any pain, inasmuch that the charge of all things was committed unto him; whereat many men smiled, to see his great folly and presumption.

At this time, the Cardinal gave the King the Lease of the Mannor of Hampton Court, which he had of the Lord of Saint Johns, and on which he had done great cost. Therefore the King again, of his gentle nature, licensed him to lie in his Mannor of Richmond, and so he lay there certain times. But when the Common people, and especially such as were King Henry the 7th's servants, saw the Cardinal keep house in the Royal Mannor of Richmond, which King Henry the Seventh so much esteemed, it was a marvel to hear how they grudged, saying, See a Butchers Dog ly in the Mannor of Richmond. These with many other opprobrious words were spoken against the Cardinal, whose pride was so high, that he regarded nothing; yet was he hated of all men.

And now to expresse some part of the ruffling practices and busie intermeddlings of this Cardinal in Princes Wars, first here is to be noted, that after long Wars between England and France, 1524. (in the which Wars King Henry, taking the Emperors part against France the French King, had waged with his money the Duke of Bourbon, and a great part of the Emperors Army, to invade and disturb certain parts of France) it hapned that the French King, coming with his Army toward Millain at the Siege of Pavia, was there taken by the Duke of Bourbon, and Viceroy of Naples, and so led Prisoner into Spain.

Where note by the way, that all this while the Cardinal held with the Emperor, hoping by him to be made Pope; but when that would not be, he went clean from the Emperor to the French King, as, the Lord willing, you shall hear.

After this Victory gotten, and the French King being taken Prisoner, who remained in custody about a year and half; at length through great labour and sollicitation, as well of other, as namely of the Cardinal and King Henry, an order was taken, and conditions propounded between the French King and the Emperor; among which conditions it was agreed, that they should resit the Turks, and oppress the Lutherans, and so was the King set at liberty, leaving behind him his two eldest Sons for pledges. But shortly after he revoked his Oath, being absolved by the Bishop of Rome, and said that he was forced to swear, or else he should never have been delivered. Which was Anno 1526. Pope Clement the Seventh, seeing the French King restored to liberty, and misdoubting the puissance and domination of the Emperor in Italy so near under his Nose, absolveth the French King from his Oath, also joyneth together a Confederacy of Venitians, and other Princes against the Emperor, bearing great hatred against all them that any thing favoured the Emperors part, especially the Family of Columna in Rome, which Family was then Imperial; and therefore to shew his hatred against them, he said to Pompey, Cardinal of the same Family, in threatening words, That he would take away his Cardinals Hat. To whom it was answered again of the Cardinal, That if he so did, he would put on a Helmet to overthrow the Popes Triple Crown. Whereby it may appear here by the way, what holiness and vertue lieth in the Pope and Cardinals of that Catholicke See of Rome.

Thus the false Pope, under the lying Title of Holiness, was the Father of much mischief and of great Wars, which after ensued. For the Duke of Bourbon, and other of the Emperors Captains, having intelligence of the Popes purpose and confederacy, gathered their Army together, and after much bloodshed and fighting, about Millain, Harold and Cremona, at length they approached and bent their Siege against Rome, and after three sharp assaults, obtained the City, with the whole spoil thereof; where also they besieged the foresaid Pope with his Cardinals, in the Mount of Adrian, and took him Prisoner An. 1527. As touching the cause of the besieging of Rome, now you have heard; for the manner of the taking of Rome, and of the Pope, the order thereof is thus described in Hall and other.

The Sacking of Rome, and taking of Pope CLEMENT.

THE Emperors Army departing from Florence to the City of Seynes, where they lost their Ordnance, took counsell there to go to Rome, and so much they travelled by night and day, commonly passing forty Miles day and night (their good will was such) that the sixth day of May, with Banners displayed they came before the City of Rome, being Saturday; the same day, and on Sunday, the Romans made Bulwarks, Rampiers, and other defences, and layed Ordnance on the Walls, and shot at them without, fiercely.

The Duke of Bourbon determined that it was not best to lie still without, and be slain with Ordnance, considering that they were all naked people, and without great Ordnance; wherefore he determined to take the chance, and to give the assault, and so manfully they approached the Walls between the Burgo Novo and old Rome. But the Romans valiantly defended them with Hand-guns, Pikes, Stones, and other Weapons, so that the enemies were faine to retreat. Then the Romans were glad and set many fair Banners on their Towers and Bulwarks, and made great shouts; which the Duke of Bourbon seeing,

KING cried to a new Assault. Then the Drumblades strook and every man with a Ladder mounted; and at the first encounter, again the Romans put them a little back, which the Duke of Bourbon perceiving, cried God and the Emperor. Then every man manfully set on. There was a fore fight, many an Arrow shot, and many a man felled; but at last the Emperors men got the Wall, and between every assault fell a Mist, so that they within could not see what part they without would assail, which was profitable to the Emperors party. At the three assaults were slain three hundred Switzers of the Popes Guard. In this last assault was the Duke of Bourbon stricken in the Thigh with a Hand-gun, of the which he shortly after died in a Chappel of St. Siff, whither his Souldiers had brought him; and this chance notwithstanding, the Army entered into Rome, and took the Popes Palace, and set up the Emperors Arms.

that came to play laden with Plate, went again almost naked, and then fell to rifling again. Many of the Citizens, which could not patiently suffer that vexation, drowned themselves in Tyber. The Soldiers daily, that lay at the Siege, made jests of the Pope. Sometime they had one riding like the Pope, with a Whore behind him, sometime he blessed, and sometime he cursed, and sometime they would with one voice call him Antichrist; and they went about to undermine the Castle, and to have thrown it down on his head, but the water, that environeth the Castle, disappointed their purpose.

The Pope besieged and taken.

In this season the Duke of Urbine, with fifteen thousand men, came to aid the Pope; but hearing that Rome was taken, he tarried forty Mile from Rome, till he heard other word. The Marquels of Saluce, and Sir Frederico de Badjo, with fifteen thousand footmen, and a thousand Horsemen, were at Vitarbe the 10th day of May; where they hearing that the City of Rome was taken, also tarried. The Cardinal of Colame came with an Army of Neapolitans to help the Emperors men, but when he saw the cruelty of the Soldiers, he did little to help them, but he hated them much.

The Bishop of Rome was thus besieged till the 8th of the Ides of July; at which day he yielded himself for necessity and penury of all things in the Castle; and then he was restored to give Graces, and grant Bulls as he did before; but he tarried still in the Castle of Saint Angel, and had a great number of Almains and Spaniards to keep him; but the Spaniards bare most rule in the Castle, for no man entered, nor came out of the Castle but by them. When the Month of July came, Corn began to fail in Rome, and the Pestilence began to wax strong; wherefore the great Army removed to a place called Narvia forty Miles from Rome, leaving behind them such as kept the Bishop of Rome.

War and pestilence in Rome.

When they were departed, the Spaniards never were contented till they had gotten the Almains out of the Castle of S. Angel, and so they had the whole custody of the Pope. And thus much for the sacking of Rome. See Paralip. Abb. Urser.

When the Cardinal here in England heard how his Father of Rome was taken Prisoner, he began to stir Coals, and hearing of his Captivity, he laboured with the King all that he might, to stir him up to fight with the said Pope against the Emperors; and to be a defender of the Church, which if he would do, the Cardinal perswaded him that he should receive great reward at Gods hand. To whom the King answered again, and said in this manner, My Lord, I more lament this evil chance, than my Tongue can tell; but where you say I am the defender of the Faith, I assure you, that this War between the Emperor and the Pope is not for the Faith, but for the temporal Possessions and Dominions; and now sit Pope Clement is taken by men of War, what should I do? My person nor my people cannot rescue him; but if my Treasure may help him, take that which seemeth to you most convenient.

The Cardinal bettered him for the Pope.

The Pope's eighth for temporal possessions.

Thus the Cardinal when he could not obtain at the Kings hands what he would, in stirring him up to mortal War, he made out of the Kings Treasure twelve hundred thousand pounds, which he carried over the Sea with him. After this, the Cardinal sent his Communion as Legate, to all the Bishops, commanding Fastings and solemn Processions to be had, wherein they did sing the Letany after this sort, Sancit Maria, ora pro Clemente Papa, Sancte Petre, ora pro Clemente Papa, and so forth all the Letany.

Twelve hundred thousand pounds conveyed out of England by the Cardinal.

A new found Letany of the Lord Cardinals against the King.

This Cardinal, passing the Seas with the foresaid sums of money, departed out of Calis, accompanied with Cuthbert Tonstal Bishop of London, the Lord Sands the Kings Chamberlain, the Earl of Darby, Sir Henry Guildford, and Sir Thomas More, with many other Knights and Squires, to the number of twelve hundred Horse, having in his carriage fourscore Wagons, and threecore Mules and sumpter Horses.

It were long to discourse in this place the manifold abuses and Treasons which he practised when he came to the French Court at Amias, converting the great sums of money which before you heard he had obtained of the

King

King for the relief and ranfome of Pope Clement, which at that time was prisoner in the Emperours army, and bestowing the fame in the hiring of Soldiers, and furnishing out the French Kings army; appointing also certain English Captains in the King of England's name, to go against the Emperor, to rescue the Pope, all which army was paid with the King of England's money.

Besides that, he privily by his Letters caused Clarentius King at Arris, to joyn with the French Herald, and openly to defie the Emperor; whereby there began great displeasure to rise between the Emperor and the King; but that the Emperor of his Politick nature would take no occasion of displeasure against the King of England.

Now again he uttered another of his practices: for upon the said defiance, the Cardinal furnishing and whispering in the Kings ear, that the Emperor had evil intreated and imprisoned the Kings Embassadors in Spain, caused Hugo de Mendoza, the Emperours Embassador in England, to be attached, and put in safe keeping, and his house with all his goods to be seized. Which so remained, until that manifest Letters came of the gentle intreaty of the Kings Embassadors in Spain, and then he was again set at liberty. When as the Embassador complained hereof to the Cardinal, he laid all the fault upon Clarentius; saying also, that Clarentius had defied the Emperor, without the Kings knowledge, at the request of the Herald of France: wherefore at his return he should lose his head at Calais. Whereof Clarentius being advertised by the Captain of Balaon, in his return took shipping at Bullen, and so privily came into England, and by means of certain of his friends of the Kings Privy-chamber he was brought into the Kings presence before the Cardinal knew of it. Whereas he flewed unto the King the Cardinals Letters of Commission, and declared the whole order and circumstance of their gentle entreaty. When the King heard the whole circumstance thereof, and had a while mused thereupon, he said, O Lord Jesus, he that I trusted most, told me all these things contrary. Well Clarentius, I will no more be so light of credence hereafter; for now I see well that I have been made believe the thing that was never done: and from that time forward the King never put any more confidence or trust in the Cardinal.

The cause why the Cardinal should bear the Emperor all this malice and grudge, after some writers, appeareth to be thus: At what time as Pope Clement was taken prisoner, (as is before said) the Cardinal wrote unto the Emperor, that he should make him Pope. But when he had received an answer that pleased him not, he waxed furious mad, and sought all means to displease the Emperor, writing very sharply unto him many menacing Letters, that if he would not make him Pope, he would make such a ruffling betwixt Christian Princes as was not this hundred years before, to make the Emperor repent, yea though it should cost the whole Realm of England.

Whereunto the Emperor made answer in a little Book, Imprinted both in Spanish and Dutch, answering unto many menaces of the Cardinal, and divers of his Articles; but specially to that his ruffling threat, wherein he menaced him, that if he would not make him Pope, he would set such a ruffling betwixt Christian Princes as was not this hundred years, though it should cost the whole Realm of England. Whereunto the Emperor answering again, biddeth him look well about him, lest through his doings and attempts he might bring the matter in that case, that it should cost him the Realm of England in deed.

You have heard before, how that when Pope Clement was prisoner in the Emperours army, the Cardinal required the King, because he did bear the Title of Defender of the Faith, that he would rescue the Pope. Also what the Kings answer was thereunto, and what sums of money he had obtained of the King. Now because you shall not also be ignorant, by what means, and upon what occasion this Title of the Defender of the Faith was given unto the King, we think it good somewhat to say in this place. When as Martin Luther had uttered the abomination of the Pope and his Clergy, and divers Books were come into England, our Cardinal here thinking to find a remedy for that, sent immediately unto Rome for this Title of Defender of the Faith: which afterward the Vicar of Croyden preached, that the Kings Grace would not lose it for all London and twenty miles about it. Neither is it marvel, for it cost more than London and forty miles about it, considering the great sums which you have heard the Cardinal obtained of the King for the Popes relief, besides the effusion of much innocent blood.

When this Glorious Title was come from Rome, the Cardinal brought it unto the Kings Grace at Greenwich; and though that the King had it already, and had read it, yet against the morning were all the Lords and Gentlemen that could in so short space be gathered, sent for, to come and receive it with honour. In the morning the Cardinal gat him through the backside into the Friars Observants, and part of the Gentlemen went round about, and welcomed him from Rome: part met him half way, and some at the Court-gate. The King himself met him in the Hall, and brought him up into a great Chamber, where was a feat prepared on high for the King and the Cardinal to sit on whilst the Bull was read. Which pomp of all men of wisdom and understanding laughed to scorn.

This done, the King went to his Chappel to hear Mass, accompanied with many Nobles of his Realm, and Embassadors of sundry Princes. The Cardinal being revealed to sing Mass, the Earl of Essex brought the Basin of water, the Duke of Suffolk gave the Aftay, and the Duke of Norfolk held the Towel, and so he proceeded to Mass. When Mass was done, the Bull was again published, the Trumpets blew, the Shalms and Sackbuts played in honour of the Kings new title. Then the King went to dinner, in the midst whereof the King of Heralds and his Company began the Larged, crying, Hiericus, Dei Gratia, Rex Anglie & Francie, Defensor Fidei, & Dominus Hibernie. Thus were all things ended with great glory.

Not much unlike to this was the receiving of the Cardinals Hat; which when a Russian had brought unto him to Westminster under his Cloak, he clothed the messenger in rich array, and sent him back again to Dover; appointing the Bishop of Canterbury to meet him, and then another Company of the Lords and Gentlemen, I wot not how often, before it came to Westminster; where it was set upon a Cupboard, and Tapers round about it, so that the greatest Duke in the land must make courtesy thereunto, and to his empty seat, he being away.

And so far as we are in hand with the acts and doings of Cardinal Wolsey, among many other things which of purpose we overpass, this is not to be exempted out of memory, touching his uncourteous, or rather churlish handling of Richard Pacy, Dean of Pauls. This Pacy, being the Kings Secretary for the Latin Tongue, was of such ripeness of wit, of learning and eloquence, alio in foreign languages so expert, that for the one he was thought most meet to succeed after John Coles, in the Deanry of Pauls: beside which he was also preferred to the Deanry of Exeter. For the other he was sent in the Kings affairs Ambassador to Venice. Which function there he so discharged, that it is hard to say whether he procured more commendation or admiration among the Venetians, both for dexterity of his wit, and specially for the singular promptness in the Italian Tongue, wherein he seemed nothing inferior, neither to Peter Vanne here in England, the Kings Secretary for the Italian Tongue, nor yet to any other, which were the best in that Tongue in all Venice. For opinion and fame of learning, he was so notoriously accepted, not only here in England with Linacre, Grocynus, More and other, but also known and reported abroad in such sort, that in all the great heap of Erasmus Epistles, he wrote almost to none so many, as he wrote to this Richard Pacy.

As the said Pacy was Resident Ambassador at Venice, the King having War the same time with Francis the French King (as is afore-rehearsed) through the conducting of the Duke of Bourbon, whom he then waged with his expences, sent commandment to Pacy to give attendance to the Duke of Bourbon, concerning the receipt of that money and other necessities and exploits { KING } to that expedition appertaining. In the mean while, as the { Hen. 8. } French King with his Army, and the Duke of Bourbon were approaching in Battel together, near about the City of Pavia, it so happened (some think through the crafty packing of the Cardinal) that the Kings money was not so ready as it was looked for. By reason whereof the Duke of Bourbon, perceiving his Soldiers about to shrink from him to the French King for lack of payment, called to him the Embassador, complaining unto him, how the King of England had deceived him, and broke promise with him, to his great dishonour and utter undoing. Pacie then being sure of the Kings will, and suspecting the crafty fetch of the Cardinal, desired the Duke not to take discomfort, nor any diffidence of the Kings assured promise, excusing the delay of the money as well as he could, by intercession, or other causes by the way incident, rather than for any lack of fidelity on the Kings behalf: adding moreover, that if it would please him happily to proceed, as he had courageously begun, he should not stay for the Kings money: so sure he was of the Kings mind therein, that he would supply the lack of that payment upon his own credit, among his friends at Venice, and so he did. Whereupon the Soldiers being sufficiently satisfied with payment of their wages, proceeded forth with the Duke unto the Battel. In the which Battel the foresaid French King, the same time before the City of Pavia, was taken prisoner, as is before declared. Which being effusions known to the King of England, Pacie had both condign thanks for his faithful service, and also his money repayed again with the utmost, as he well deserved. But as the laud and the renowned praise of men for their worthy prowesses, commonly in this world never go unaccompanied with some privy canker of envy and disdain following after, so the singular industry of Pacie, as it won much commendation with many, so it could not avoid the secret sting of some Serpents. For the conceived hatred of this Cardinal so kindled against him, that he never ceased, till first he brought him out of the Kings favour, and at last also out of his perfect wits.

The occasion how he fell beside himself was this, for that the Cardinal after the death of Pope Adrian hoping no less but that he should have been advanced unto the Papacy, and yet missing thereof, he supposed with himself the fault chiefly to rest in Pacies negligence, by whose great wit and learning, and earnest means and lute, he thought easily he might have achieved and compassed the Triple Crown. Wherefore he seeing it otherwise come to pass, and inflamed against Pacie for the same, wrought such ways and means, that by the space almost of two years, Pacie continuing at Venice, had neither writing from the King, nor his Council, what he should do; nor yet any manner of allowance for his diet (although he wrote, and sent Letters for the same to England very often) for the Cardinal had altogether incensed the King against him. Whereupon the said Pacie took such an inward thought and conceit, that his wits began to fail him, he being notwithstanding in sure favour among the Senators of Venice, that neither for gold nor silver he could there have lacked. By some it was reported that the Venetian Legate here in England coming to the Cardinal, required if he would command any thing to the English Embassador at Venice? To whom he should answer again in high words, saying, Pacens decepti Regem. Which words coming to Pacies ears, so deeply pierced his stomach, that he fell quite besides himself. I heard it moreover of another thus testified, who had a Brother the same time dwelling with Pacie: that the Cardinal about the returning of Pacie from Venice, sent him a Letter so powdered (with what Spices I cannot tell) that at the reading thereof Pacie being then in the fields, fell suddenly in such a mighty running for the space of two miles, that his servants had much ado to take him, and bring him home.

This piteous case of Pacie was not a little lamented by the whole Senate, and chief Learned men in Venice, in so much that the King was not only certified thereof by Thomas Lupset (who then was chief man about Pacie, and his Secretary for that Embassage) but also the said Senate of Venice wrote, in such sharp and vehement wise unto their Embassador then being in England, that he should signify unto the King touching Pacies case, that thereby the King knowing the truth, and the whole circumstance of the matter, was not a little sorrowful therefore. Whereupon Pacie was forthwith sent for home, and when he came to England, he was commanded by the King to be specially well tended and to lack no keeping. In so much that within a small process of time he was prettily well come again to his wits, and began to study the Hebrew Tongue with Wakefield, so that (the Cardinal then being absent) such ways were found by his friends, that he was brought to the King, lying then at Richmond, where he and the King secretly communed together by the space of two hours and more, not without great rejoicing to the King as it was perceived, to see him so well amended, and returned to himself again, giving likewise strict charge and commandment, that he should lack nothing. The Cardinal being then not present, when he heard of this, fearing lest he had disclosed somewhat to the King, which he would not have known, and doubting that the King should cast his favour again unto Pacie, began within a while after to quarrel, and pick matters, and to lay certain things to Pacies charge, whereas he rather should have cleared himself of those things which Pacie laid unto him before the King, which was contrary to all good form and order of justice. For where the King had willed the Cardinal to purge himself of those things which Pacie had rightly charged him withal, he sitting in judgment with the Duke of Norfolk, and other States of the Realm, not as a Defendant, but as a Judge in his own cause, to bare out himself and weighed down Pacie, that Pacie was commanded to the Tower of London as prisoner: where he continued by the space of two years, or thereabout, and afterward by the Kings commandment was discharged. But he being there prisoner, was therewith so deadly wounded and stricken, that he fell worse from his wits than ever he was before, being in such a Phrensie or Lunacy, that to his dying day he never came perfectly to himself again. Notwithstanding this in him was no perpetual Phrensie, but came by fits; and when the fit was past, he could look on his Book, and reason and talk handsomely, but that now and then he shewed his disease. And thus much between the Cardinal and Pacie.

By the story of Pacie, and also by other passages above mentioned, ye may partly conceive how greedy this Cardinal was to be made Pope. Touching which matter here by the way something to intreat, first it is to be understood, that so far as Pacie either would not or could not serve the Cardinals purpose herein, he thought to accomplish his desire by other means, and namely by Stephen Gardener, who was then shortly after sent Embassador to Rome by the King and the Cardinal, in the time of Pope Clement the Seventh; and that for two special causes, one was about the divorcement, the other for promoting the Cardinal to be Pope. As touching the Divorcement we will speak (the Lord willing) hereafter. In the mean time as concerning the advancement of the Cardinal, great labour was made, as in Letters may appear, sent from the Cardinal to the said Stephen Gardener; in the which Letters he did sollicite the said Gardener, by all means to pursue the suit, willing him to stick for no cost, so far as six or seven thousand pounds would stretch; for more he said he would not give for the Triple Crown. Mark here (Christian Reader) what an holy Catholick Church this is, which rather may be called a Barge, or Mart of Merchants (Ne quid dicam durius) than any true form of a Church.

Many both of his, and also of the Kings Letters, I could here insert; but for growing of the Volume, I let them pass. One for examples sake, sent by the Cardinal to Gardener, another also from the King to the said Gardener, shall at this time suffice concerning this matter. And first the Copy of the Cardinals ambitious Letter here in form followeth.

The Copy of an ambitious Letter written by Tho. Wolfsey Cardinal of York, unto Stephen Gardener, one of King Henries Orators in the Court of Rome, for the procuring of the Papal dignity to the said Cardinal.

A Letter of the Cardinal to Stephen Gardener at Rome.

M After Stephen, albeit ye shall be sufficiently, with your Colleagues, by such Instructions as be given to Monsieur Vincent, informed of the Kings mind and mine, concerning my advancement unto the dignity Papal, not doubting but that for the singular devotion which you bear towards the King and his affairs, both general and particular, and perfect love which ye have towards me, ye will omit nothing that may be excogitate to serve and conduce to that purpose: yet I thought convenient, for the more fervent expression of my mind in that behalf, to write unto you (as to the person whom I do most entirely trust, and by whom this thing shall be more pitifully set forth) these few words following of mine own hand, I doubt not but ye do profoundly consider as well the state wherein the Church and all Christendom doth stand now presently, as also the state of this Realm, and of the Kings secret matter: which if it should be brought to pass by any other means than by the authority of the Church, I account this Prince and Realm utterly undone. Wherefore it is expedient to have such a one to be Pope, and common Father of all Princes, as may, can, and will give remedy to the premises. And although I account my self much unable, and that it shall be now incommensurable in this mine old age to be the said common Father, yet when all things be well pondered, & the qualities of all the Cardinals well considered, Adit verbum iactantie) there shall be none found that can and will set remedy in the foresaid things, but only the Cardinal of York, whose good will and zeal is not to you, of all men, unknown. And were it not for the reintegracion of the state of the Church and See Apostolicke to the pristine dignity, and for the conducting of peace amongst Christian Princes, and especially to relieve this Prince and Realm from the calamities that the same be now in, all the riches or honour of the world should not cause me. Ne dum aspirare, sed ne consentire, to accept the said dignity, although the same with all commodities were offered unto me.

Nevertheless, conforming my self to the necessity of the time, and the will and pleasure of these two Princes, I am content to approve all my wit and study, and to set forth all means and ways, Ut beneficantibus Christi-anitatibus, for the attaining of the said dignity. For the achieving and attaining whereof, forasmuch as thereupon dependeth the health and wealth, not only of these two Princes and their Realms, but of all Christendom, nothing is to be omitted that may conduce to the said end and purpose. Wherefore, Master Stephen, since you be so plainly advertised of my mind and intent, I shall pray you to extend Omnes nervos ingenii tui, ut ita res ad effectum produci possit, nullis parcendo sumptibus, sollicitationibus, five laboribus: ita ut hominum videris ingenia & affectiones, five ad privata, five ad publica, sic accomodes actiones tuas. Non desit tibi & Collegis tuis amplissima potestas, nullis terminis aut conditionibus limitata seu relictis, & quicquid feceris, scito omnia apud hunc Regem & me esse grata & tuta. Nam omnia ut paucis absolvam in tuo ingenio & fide repositimus. Nihil superest aliud scribendum, nisi quod supplex orem, ut omnes actiones tuas secundet Deus opt. maximusque, & ex corde vale.

Ex aedibus meis Westmonast. vii. Febr.

Tuae salutis & amplitudinis cupidissimus,

Stephen Gardener the Cardinals trusty Ambassador.

After this Letter of the Cardinal, consequently here in-further another Letter of the King, to the foresaid Stephen Gardener, and other his Orators at Rome; containing such instructions and documents as they should practise with the Cardinals of Rome, in canvassing for the said Thomas Wolfsey Cardinal of York to be elected Pope, if Pope Clement were dead: or if he were not dead, yet at least to instruct them what to do when he should die.

The contents of the Letter, albeit they include no great matter worthy our knowledge, nor greatly necessary for our story, yet for the ridiculous manner of the handling, and curious Secretariship thereof, full of glorious affectation, I thought it not here unmeet for the studies and appetites of some, to exemplify the same, or at least to make the Reader some pastime by the way, in beholding the glorious stile of this vain-glorious Cardinal, being late-like to his glorious life. The Copy of the Letter bearing the name of the King, but indeed favouring altogether of the Cardinals device and swelling vein, doth thus proceed in form and stile as followeth.

I Instructions sent by the Kings Highness, to his Trusty Counsellors and Servants, Mr. Stephen Gardener, Doctor of both Laws, Sir Francis Brian, Sir Gregory de Calais, Knights, and Mr. Peter Vane the Kings Secretary for the Italian Tongue, his Embassadors in the Court of Rome, for the Election of the Cardinal of York to the Papacy, if Pope Clement were dead.

First whereas a good season since the depeach of Master Stephen Gardener, an Ambassiate towards the Court of Rome, the Kings Highness by sundry ways hath been advertised of the death of our holy Father the Pope Clement of that name the Seventh, whose soul Jesus pardon, by mean whereof the charge heretofore committed by his Grace unto his Orators, to have been now executed with the said late Pope, cannot at his hands take effect, his Highness pondering and profoundly considering the present state of Christendom, miserably and pitifully afflicted with the Intefine wars, dissensions, and discords, reigning amongst the Princes of the same, and how the dignity of the See Apostolicke, by such trouble and persecution, as hath been inferred thereunto these years passed, is not a little diminished and impaired, like to come to a total ruin, if by the help and assistance of good and vertuous Princes the ambition of those which study the extermination thereof, be not in time repelled: considering furthermore, that as well to conduce the rest and tranquillity in Christendom, as to restore, repair, and reintegrate the state, authority, and reputation of the said See Apostolicke, nothing is more requisite and necessary, than that such a head and common Father be now, at this time of vacation of the dignity Papal, provided and elected to succeed in the same, as both may, can, and will purvey to the restauration of the said See, and hath, and may have the assistance of such vertuous and puissant Princes, as tender the defence, maintenance and increase of the dignity aforesaid, and that may meet with the inordinate ambition of the Emperor, who nothing more studieth, than for his own exaltation to suppress the Church and the See Apostolicke: remembering also the high importance of the Kings great and weighty cause of Matrimony, committed to the charge of the said Orators, and how manifold dangers, and irreparable damages depend upon the tract, delay, or disappointment thereof, which by no way or mean can be conducted to the Kings purpose and desire by the authority of the Church, but only by special, assured and perfect favour of the Head of the same Church; his Highness also being as loth as any living Prince or person may be, to recur unto other refuge, succour or remedy in the said cause, than to the authority of the See Apostolicke, if his Grace may there find the favour and benignity that to his merits towards the same be correspondent; of which favour his Highness should be clearly deprived and frustrate, in case the election of the future Pope should pass upon any person, of whom his Grace were not perfectly assured: his Highness for the respects and considerations before specified, perceiving his good Brother and perpetual Allie the French King, in the Instructions sent to the Kings great to his Legates at Rome.

The total ruin of the Apostolicke Papacy, God forbid it.

He meaneth the Matrimony between K.H. & Q. Katherine, his Brother Johns Wifes, whereof there was lawful issue.

KING said intention, to be unite, knit, and in all actions and doings of importance assuredly combined unto his Grace, proceeding together in one will, mind, purpose, and conformity, hath by good and mature deliberation, studied, devised, and excogitate with himself who were and might be the most able, meet, and convenient person, having the qualities before specified, to be advanced at this time, unto the said dignity Papal. And finally when his Grace hath well revolved with himself all the respects and considerations aforesaid, noting also all things meet to be regarded in every of the Cardinals of the Church of

See how this Prelate is all in his exaltation.

The Theological practice of the Cardinals.

Note this cause. The Cardinal is most meet to be Pope, because he can best bridge the Empire.

That is to say his own desire.

vancement of the said Lord Legate of Tork to that dignity, than they would that thing which the Kings Highness most highly, next God and his soul, with all earnestness and fervent mind doth, above all other things, covet and desire, and also no less than they would the speedy obtaining and perfection of all such things, touching the Kings said weighty matter committed to their charges: the making or marring whereof, the said late Pope being now deceased, consisteth only in the advancement of the said Lord Legate of Tork to the dignity Papal.

For (as the Kings said Embassadors may by their wisdoms well think and consider) the same must of necessity come, and fortune either to one that is an assured friend to his Grace and the French King, or to one that is a manifest enemy to them, favouring the Emperors part, or to one indifferent and mean between both. And if it should chance upon a manifest enemy, it is evident that the Kings desire at his hand were merely impossible to be had, and never were to be attained that way. If it should come to one being indifferent and mean between both, it is more than notorious that his Grace, at the least, should be contained with fair words and promises, and yet such respect should be had to the Emperor, that finally under hope of obtaining something, there should be no more, but tract, delay, and finally no manner fruit nor effect: whereof experience hath already been seen in one that had cause to be more friendly to the King, than indifferent or mean between both, and yet how long the matter hath depended, is to the Kings said Embassadors well known. So that of necessity this thing must be conducted to one that is an assured friend. Then noting substantially the things necessary to concur in such a friend both for the weal of Christendom, the relief of the Church, the firm adhering to the Kings Highness, and the French King, and other their Confederates, and the perfect conducting of the Kings great matter which suffereth no tract, delay, or negative; it shall be found, that there is none other for this purpose, but only the said Lord Legate of Tork.

The Kings said Embassadors shall therefore plant the foundation of all their study, labour, and sollicitation, only to that purpose. And for the better introduction of the ways and means, how this thing shall be solicited; they shall receive herewith a Schedule, wherein is mentioned and noted by name, how many, and what Cardinals of likelihood shall be present at the Election, and how many and which of the other shall be absent. Semblably, how many of them that be like to be present, may be thought to be friends to the Kings Highness, and the French King, whose names in the said Schedule be noted with A. and how many are thought to be Imperial, whose names be noted with B. In the same Schedule be also set out the number and names of those that be thought to be neutral or indifferent, marked with N. And furthermore, they be first mentioned therein, which be thought most like to aspire to that dignity.

Herein be many things well to be regarded. First, the number of the Cardinals that are like to be present, which (as is thought here) shall not exceed nine and thirty. Secondly, that to have Election to the Kings purpose, shall be requisite to have two parts of the three of the said number, which two parts must be twenty six. Then is it to be noted, that they which be thought to be friends to the Kings Highness and the French King, be in number twenty. So that if they may be made sure to the Kings devotion, there shall lack but six of the number, which shall suffice to make the Election: which number the Kings said Embassadors shall move, win, and attain, either of them that be thought to be indifferent, or some other.

In the conducting whereof two ways be specially to be remembered. One is if the Cardinals present, having God and the Holy Ghost before them shall be minded (as to their duty appertaineth) to have respect to the present calamity of the Church and all Christendom, intending the relief, succour and reformation of the same, and to preserve themselves, and the dignity of the See Apostolick, then looking profoundly upon the state of the things, they they cannot fail * easily of themselves to find and perceive, that to conduce their purpose there is only the said Lord Legate of York. And in this case it is verily to be thought, that very reason it self, and their own confidence shall lead them like virtuous Fathers, to have their principal respect hereunto; and (particular affections set apart) to accord and agree without difficulty to that which so manifestly is known to be the thing, above all other expedient. Nevertheless, because percase humane fragility suffereeth not all things to be pondered, trutinately, and weighed in just ballance, but that (as we be men) errors may run, unless then remedy be provided: it appertaineth in matter of so high importance, to the comfort and relief of all Christendom, to succour the infirmity that may chance, not for corruption, or to any perverse, unlawful, or evil intent, but rather to help to the backs and defaults, which by such fragility might else take place; and therefore expedient it shall be that the Kings said Orators, to so notable a purpose where they shall perceive the consideration and respect, whereunto reason leadeth, to be in any part to be aided or supplied, do the same with solicitations of promotions, spiritual offices, dignities, rewards of money, or other things, such as to them shall seem meet to the purpose, inculking into the minds of such persons as shall be requisite, first what things the said Lord Legate of York shall leave, if he should be advanced to the said dignity, which be such as the establishment of his state considered, be far more to his commodity (if he should regard his private weal) than to enter into this dangerous storm, and troublous tempest, for the relief of the Church and all Christendom; whereunto (his said private weal set apart) he is totally devoted and dedicate, to the exposition of his body, blood, and life, glad and ready with the sacrifice thereof to do service to God, his Church, his Faith and Religion: which said promotions, the Kings Highnesses finding cause, given unto him by the gratitude and conformity of his friends, will not fail to bestow to their benefit, besides large rewards, to have this so virtuous an act brought to perfection. For solicitation whereof, the Kings said Embassadors be furnished at this time with ample commission, as by the same they shall perceive: The effect whereof they shall execute without exception, as by their wisdoms shall be thought convenient: so always as it be done with such circumspection, as that there may be appearance of good fruit to ensue. And semably they be furnished with Letters, as well to the College of Cardinals in general, as to them all that be like to be present in particular: which they shall now deliver to the best furtherance and advancement of their purpose, not sparing to declare unto them the liberality of the said Lord Legate of York, the substance that he is of; the assured assistance that he shall have of these Princes and their Confederates, whereby he shall be able above any other that they can devise, to reward, promote, advance, and recompense his friends to the uttermost; assuring them that these two Princes will not fail also highly, and in the best sort to consider their graces, with any thing that they may excoitate to their profits and promotions, or any of their friends. So that by this mean, and with such good solicitations, grounded upon a lawful, honourable, and just cause (and not upon any corrupt or undue intent, to conduce things to sinister purpose) the Kings said Orators by their good policies shall attain the perfect and sure good will of a great many of them, and by that way shall with good dexterity combine and knit those, which will adhere hereunto, in a perfect faithfulness, and in an indissoluble knot, firmly to stick and hold together, without variation or declining from their purpose, for any persuasion, practice or mean, that can be made to the contrary. Which thing surely to be provided, and such a knot of twenty, eighteen, or at the least (if it may be) of sixteen Cardinals to be had, is in any wise expedient. For they persisting in their determination, shall not fail to impeach, that no adverse part can have a full number to make a due and lawful Election. And yet they being found in a constancy to this good purpose, shall by little and little allure and bring other unto them, so as the residue perceiving to great a towardsness, and fearing a sufficient number to accede without them, and thereby the Election to pass against their wills; shall percase be the more prone and ready to come unto that party: whereunto nothing should of reason sooner move them, than the very respect to the infinite goodness, that thereby to themselves in particular, and the universal Church and Religion in general, is apparent to ensue.

Nevertheless, if leaving the direct way they will be abused with any other incantations, or for private ambition persist in contending for themselves, then is it evident, they search nothing more than the ruin of the See Apostolick. In which case other ways be to be devised, and their * undue demeanor to be remedied and resisted. For this cause, and to be sure in all events, the Kings said Orators shall by their wisdoms find the means to have some fast and sure persons in the Conclave, such as may not only practise and set forth things there to the purpose, but also give such knowledge outward, as the Kings said Orators may thereby the better know how to order their proceedings. And amongst other it is thought that Monsieur de Vaulx, one of the French Embassadors (whom the French King hath commanded expressly to further this matter by all the means to him possible) should be one to enter the said Conclave, not as an Embassador, but as the Minister of some Cardinal, friend of the French King. And semably Sir Gregory de Cassalis, who for his wisdom, conduct, language, acquaintance, and other good qualities, may do excellent good in that behalf.

And in this matter it is to be considered, that since this Election, in the person of the said Lord Legate of York, by one way or other suffereeth no negative, albeit the Kings Highnesses trusteth that the same shall have his course directly: yet if for lack of grace or intentment, there should be any despair thereof, other ways be, to be provided. And for that cause to shew the said Orators secretly, there is a protestation passed by the Cardinals being in England and in France, according to a Copy which the said Orators shall receive herewith, which is and shall be kept secret, unless then by the undue proceeding used in the Election, the same shall need to be published. So that the Kings said Orators, now advertised thereof, shall note for a special ground, that if it shall appear that the Election cannot be had in the person of the said Lord Legate of York; the band and number unite and knit together to the Kings devotion, in finding none other remedy, must be instructed beforehand in that case to persist in their determination, and when time shall be, by reason of such despair, to protest, grounding the same their protestation upon such respects, as cannot lack to be introduced for the avoiding of the extreme danger by the pertinacity and wilfulness of the adverse Cardinals, eminent to the ruin of the Church, and of all Christendom. Which protestation may before hand be couched and devised by the said Master Stephen Gardener, and by the policy of the said Monsieur de Vaulx, and Sir Gregory, be set forth in time convenient: and thereupon the Cardinals of the Kings, and the French Kings adherents to depart the Conclave; whereby repairing to some other sure place, they with the residue of the Cardinals absent, may proceed to such an Election as may be to Gods pleasure, the weal of his Church and Faith, and of all Christendom, any Election that thus by pertinacity may ensue at Rome notwithstanding.

And to the intent the Cardinals may be the better animated to finish the said Election to the Kings desire, the Kings said Orators shall, as they see good, offer them a prebend of two or three thousand men to be in the City of Rome for the time of the same Election: which if they will accept, the said Orators shall see furnished, taking money by exchange and otherwise, for their entertainment, as shall be requisite. Which money, or any other that they shall take for conducting this the Kings purpose, shall be truly repayed, with (*) impense, and all requisites that they shall assign. And semably, lest terrors or dread of the Imperials in Naples should induce the Cardinals to any error, the French King hath ordained, that Seignior Rencio shall lye in a prebend between the Army of Naples, and the City of Rome. Like as the Viscount of Tuvene is also commanded to lye on the other side, and semably the Venetians. So that by those means, not only they shall be out of all fear of the Imperials,

* He might as well have said easily as he had pleased him, but our great terms are too large for this high Prebend as were commonly you may see.

Yes, Sir, now ye speak to the purpose. Now we begin to feel you when ye bring your bribes and money.

Well bid and like a good Chapman.

KING but also in the more devotion of these two Princes : which shall much conser to the Kings purpose, and embolden the Cardinals favouring the desire of these two Princes, both to persist in their deliberation, and also in time of extreme despair to protest and depart, as is aforesaid.

And because nothing should withdraw the minds of the Cardinals from this purpose, who perchance might think that the said Lord Legat of Tork being elected, would not repair to the Court of Rome, but demore in Avinion, or some other place out of Italy, the Kings said Ambassadors shall remove all such suspitions, by two evident arguments and reasons. One is, That the said Cardinal of Tork, advanced to that dignity, must thereby leave all other his promotions, and consequently should be dispossessed of any habitation, place, or convent living, if remaining in another strange Countrey, he should defer to come unto Rome, where should be the place of his See and entire living. Wherefore if it were far from reason to think, that he, which hitherto for his estate had lived in such abundance, should be so pusillanim for his promotion, to bring himself into condign penury and poverty, or to live in place private, to the hindrance of his honour, profit, or reputation. Secondly, the thing principally moving him to be contented, at these Princes requests, to change his state present, is the fervent zeal he hath to expose his Study, Travel, Labour, Substance, Wit, Body, Blood, and Life, in the quarrel of Gods Church, Faith, and of Christendom, which is too high an exception, and a ground to be taken to remain and lye in a corner or private place ; but that rather than he would suffer so high an exception to be found in him, he would expose all that he might do : who having the assistance of these two Princes, should not fail (God willing) to pass directly to his See, with honour and comfort unto all Italy, and the discouragement of the party that would be adverse thereunto. And therefore the Cardinals should not need to fear any such thing, but might be well assured to have his presence there to their comfort, in all celerity and diligence possible.

Furthermore, to the intent the Kings said Ambassadors may have all the friends that may be to this purpose, expedient it shall be, that they, with the Venetians, the Florentines, the Duke of Ferrare, and other whom they shall think good to win unto their party, use the ways that may best conduce thereunto. And amongst other, so much as they which depended upon the Cardinal de Medices shall doubt in this case to be reject, the Kings said Orators shall inculcate unto them the singular devotion and special favour that the said Lord Legat of Tork hath always born unto their family ; assuring them that he will take them in no further distance of entire love, than they were with Pope Leo, Clement, or any other. And semblably, they shall put the Florentines in comfort of the exclusion of the governance of the said Family de Medices in Florence, and of their enjoying of their liberty. Likewise putting the Cardinals in perfect hope of recovery of the Patrimonies of the Church ; to contain the Venetians in good trust of a reasonable way to be taken for Servia and Revenna, to their contentment ; and also to shew the Duke of Ferrare, how the said Lord Legat was the mean of the conjunction of him in league with the French King, with assured promise of his continuance in as much love and favour as he may bear unto him, in all his causes and affairs.

And thus, having those folks to their friends, whose Orators shall have the uttermost custody of the Conclave, and the Kings Ambassadors and the French Ambassadors being in the interior parts thereof, they, being so amply instructed and furnished, shall not fail (God willing) by one or other of the said two ways, and specially by the direct election at Rome, if it be possible, or at the least, by the way of the said protestation and departure of the Cardinals, to conduce the Kings purpose in the said election to the desired end. In the doing whereof, albeit there is no doubt but that the French Orators will joy with them sincerely, to the perfection of the premises in some eventum, it shall be well done, that the Kings said Orators have a substantial and politick regard to the proceedings of the same French Orators, lest that if perchance they should find any despair in the election to pass in the person of the said Lord Legat of Tork, they making some other Cardinals to their side for the advancement of any of them to the said dignity, should be the more strange, alien, or peradventure refuse to come unto the said protestation and departure out of the Conclave : Which is the only remedy and refuge (the Cardinals persisting in their wilfulness) to interrupt, dis-appoint, infringe, and make void their election.

One other thing there is to be well noted by the said Ambassadors, and by them to be inculcate in the minds of the Cardinals ; that if any manner of difficulty shall be made by the Imperials to condescend unto this election upon the said Lord Legat of Tork ; and that they of the Emperors part would refuse all ways of good order and reason, proceeding to any election without the consent of the residue that would protest, they may be sure that unto their Suiiter and undue way they should have no Prince or Potentate adherent, but only the Emperor and his Brother, and that the other part should have the rest of all Christendom, that is to say, the Kings Highness, the French King, the King of Hungary, Priony, Scotland, and Denmark, with the Venetians, the Dukes of Ferrare, Milenn, the Florentines, and the rest of all Italy ; besides the Merchants of the Almain or Hanz, and other leagues being in the dominion of the said King of Polony : and over that, the King of Portugal, who is loth and sorry to see the Emperor to come to so great a height as he aspireth unto. So that, having these mightty and noble puissances to their assistances and the corroboration of their act, it is facile to think the other could be of no validity, nor have or take any manner of place ; which is no small grounds whereupon the said Cardinals may be the better animate to the Kings, and the French Kings devotion, and therefore it is better to be imprinted in their minds accordingly.

Finally, If the Kings said Orators, endeavouring themselves to the conducting of the said election in the person of the said Lord Legat of Tork, should at the last find, that there were none other difficulty, but only that the election in his person being totally desperate, the same were conduible to the Cardinal Campeius : then, rather than all should fail, if the other could by no means be brought to pass, the Kings pleasure is, that being assured it may, the other lacking, be conduible to the same Cardinal Campeius, they take such way as in that case the protestation be forbore : and for the last refuge, if the other may not be, the election at the least to pass in the person of the said Cardinal Campeius : whereof there is no appearance, considering that the respects, for the which the said Lord Legat of Tork should by the Kings, and the French Kings means be brought hereto, do for the greatest part fail and crase by the election of any other than himself, which is in this case to be remembered accordingly.

Thus be the Kings said Orators instructed, as far as mens reason can here devise, what is to be done for conducing the Kings purpose to effect, knowing well of what importance the thing is, and what consequences depend upon it, namely, for the perfection of the Kings high and mighty matter, which, otherwise than by election of the said Lord Legat of Tork, hath no manner of way to be conduced by authority of the See Apostolick : there resteth no more but that they, who well know the same great matter, do suffer no way nor repulse, but by the election of the person of the said Lord Legat, do employ the uttermost that in their hearts, powers, wits, bodies, and minds may be, to the perfection thereof, whereby they shall do the greatest service that can be for this time cogitate to do, unto their Prince, deserve immortal laud, thanks, and praise, and be sure to consecute thereby such reward, as shall be to their comforts, joyce, and honour ; besides manifold other notable goodnesse, whereof they shall be the procurers and solicitors, to their merit perpetual. All which they may be sure shall be considered accordingly.

(loving Reader) to note and learn, how man purpoeth one thing and how God disposeth another. For the Kings purpose was to have the Cardinal and Legat of Tork placed in the See Papal, thinking by that means, if this Cardinal had been Pope, the cause of his divorce more easily might be compassed, which otherwise he thought impossible to contrive. But God Omnipotent, which only is director of all affairs, brought it otherwise to pass, not as the King devised, but after his own wisdom; so that both the Divorcement was concluded, and yet neither Cardinal Wolsey made Pope, nor yet Pope Clement was dead. Yea, so he ruled the matter, that notwithstanding Pope Clement was alive, yet both the Divorce proceeded, and also the Popes authority was thereby utterly extinct and abolished out of this Realm of England, to the singular admiration of Gods wondrous works, and perpetual praise to his merciful goodness. Of which Divorcement, and suppressing of the Popes authority, we have likewise to make declaration. But first, as we have begun with the Cardinal of Tork, so we will make an end of him. That done, we will (God willing) address our selves to other matters of more importance.

As the Ambassadors were thus traveling in Rome to promote the Cardinal to be Pope, although the Pope was not yet dead, in the mean time the Cardinal played the popish persecutor here at home. For first, he sitting in his Pontificalibus in the Cathedral Church of Pauls, under his Cloth of estate of rich cloth of Gold, caused Frier Barnes, an Augustin Frier, to beara Fagot, for certain points which he called Heretic. Also he caused the same time two Merchants of the Striyard likewise to beara Fagots for eating flesh on a Friday. At the which time, the Bishop of Rockester made a Sermon in reproof of Martin Luther, who had before written against the power of the Bishop of Rome. This Bishop in his Sermon spake so much of the honour of the Pope and his Cardinals, and of their dignity and preeminency, that he forgot to spake of the Gospel which he took in hand to declare; which was about the year of our Lord 1526.

After this, the said Cardinal likewise, Anno 1528, and in the month of November, sitting at Westminster as Legat, called before him the whole Clergy, and there promised that all abusions of the Church should be amended: but there nothing else was done, save only he caused to be abused, Arthur Bilny, Geffrey Leme, and Garret, for speaking against the Popes authority, and his pompous pride. Of whom more shall be said (the Lord assisting us) hereafter. And this was Anno 1528.

The year next following, which was Anno 1529, began the question of the Kings Marriage to be revived. Whereupon Cardinal Campius was sent again into England from Rome, for the hearing and debating of the matter. Who then with Cardinal Wolsey, consulting with the King, although at first he seemed with his fellow Cardinal to incline unto the Kings disposition, yet afterward perceiving the sequel of the Case, whether it tended, so far, as peradventure might be the occasion of a blot to the Court of Rome, and might shake perhaps the Chair of the Popes omnipotent authority, as well in other Cases like, if this Case were thoroughly decided by learning and truth of Gods word: He therefore slipping his neck out of the Collar, craftily thrust himself out of the Realm, before the day came appointed for determination, leaving his subtil fellow behind him, to weigh with the King the mean time, while the matter might be brought up to the Court of Rome. The King thus seeing himself disappointed, foded with false promises, and craftily doubled withall by the Cardinals, and at last, after so many delays and long expectation, nothing to be concluded, was fore agrieved in his mind with them, but especially with Cardinal Wolsey, whom he had before so highly exalted, and promoted to so many great dignities, as to the Archbishoprick of Tork, the Bishoprick of Winchester, of Dursey, the Abby of S. Albans, besides the Chancellorship of England, and many other high rooms and preferments in the Realm; which caused him clearly to cast him out of his favour, so that after that time he never came more to the Kings presence. Ex Haila.

Then followed first a Council of the Nobles, called the first of October. During the which Council all the Lords and other the Kings Council, agreeing together, referred to Windsor to the King, and there informed the King, that all things which he had done almost, by his power Legatine, were in the Case of Præmunire, and provision: and that the Cardinal had forfeited all his Lands, Tenements, Goods and Chattels to the King: wherefore the King willing to order him, according to the order of his Laws, caused his Attorney, Christopher Hales, to sue out a writ of Præmunire against him, in the which he licensed him to make an Attorney.

And further the seventeenth day of November, he sent the two Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk to his Palace of Westminster, to fetch away the Great Seal of England; which he was loth to deliver, if there had been any remedy: but in conclusion, he delivered it to the two Dukes, which delivered the same to Doctor Taylor, Master of the Rolls, to carry it to the King; which he did the next day.

Besides this, the King sent Sir William Fitzwilliams, Knight of the Garter, and Treasurer of his House, and Doctor Stephen Gardener, newly made Secretary, to see that no Goods should be embezzled out of his house: and further ordained, that the Cardinal should remove to Asher beside Kingsme, there to tarry the Kings pleasure, and to have all things delivered unto him, which were necessary for him, but not after his old pompous and superfluous fashion; for all his goods were seized to the Kings use. When the Seal was thus taken from the Cardinal, the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, with many Earls, Bishops, and Barons, came unto the Star-Chamber the nineteenth day of October: where the Duke of Norfolk declared, that the Kings Highness fur diverse and sundry offences had taken from him his Great Seal and deposed him of all Offices: and left men might complain for lack of justice, he had appointed him and the Duke of Suffolk, with the assent of the other Lords, to sit in the Star-Chamber, to hear and determine causes indifferently; and that of all things the Kings pleasure and commandment was, that they should keep their hands close from any rewards taking, or maintenance: and so that week they sat in the Star-Chamber, and determined causes.

A few days after, in the same month, the Cardinal removed out of his House called Tork place, with one Croft, saying, That he would he had never born more, meaning that by his Croft which he bear as Legat, which degree taking was his confusion, as you see openly: and so he took his Barge, and went to Putney by Water, and there took his Horse and rode to Asher, where he remained till Lene after.

During which time, he being called on for an answer in the Kings Bench to the Præmunire, for giving Benefices by prevention, in disturbance of mens inheritance, and divers other open causes in the Præmunire, according to the Kings Licence, constituted John Scute and Edmond Tenney, Apprentices of the Law, his Attorneys, which by his own Warrant signed with his own hand, confessed all things concerning the said fate, for they were too open to be cloaked or hidden; and so judgment was given, that he should forfeit all his Lands, Tenements, Goods, and Chattels and should be out of the Kings protection; but for all that, the King sent him a sufficient protection, and of his gentleness left to him the Bishopricks of Tork and Winchester, and gave to him plate and stuff convenient for his degree; and the Bishoprick of Dursey he gave to Doctor Tunstall Bishop of London, and the Abby of S. Albans he gave to the Prior of Norwich: and to London he promoted D. John Stokesley, the Ambassador to the Universities, for the Marriage, as you heard before. For all this kindness shewed to the Cardinal, yet still he maligned against the King, as you shall hereafter perceive. But first we will proceed in the course of these matters, as they passed in order.

The next year following, which was Anno 1530, A Parliament the month of November was summoned a general Parliament, to be holden at Westminster. In the which year, about the three and twentieth day of October, the King came to his Mannor of Greenwich, and there much consulted with his Council, for a meet

The occasion of the Cardinals fall.

The cause of the Kings Marriage with his Brother Arthurs Wife, was dangerous to the Pope for this: if it were unlawful, then the disposition of Pope Jane was void: If it were lawful, then the judgment of so many Universities were false. The King deluded by the two Cardinals.

KING man to be his Chancellor, so that in no wife he were a man of the spirituality: and so after long debate, the King relolved himself upon Sir Thomas More Knight, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, a man well learned in the Tongues, and also in the Common Law; whose wit was fine, and full of imaginations; by reason whereof he was a little too much given to mocking, more than became the person of Master More. And then on the Sunday, the four and twentieth day of the same month, the King made him his Chancellor, and delivered him the great Seal: which Lord Chancellor the next morrow after was led into the Chancery by the two Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and there sworn, and then the Mace was bore him.

Of this fall of the Cardinal, and of the placing of Sir Thomas More in the Chancellorship, Erasmus in an Epistle to John Vergera thus writeth: The Cardinal of York hath so offended the Kings mind, that he being turned out of his goods and all his dignities, is committed not to Prison, but to a certain Lordship of his, with 30 servants or keepers to give attendance upon him. Many and sundry complaints are commenced against him, so that he is not like to escape with his life. Such is the dalliance of fortune, of a Schoolmaster to be made a King. For so he Reigned more like a King than the King himself. He was dreaded of all men, he was loved but of a few, almost of none. A little before he was apprehended, he called Richard Pace to be cast into the Tower. Also he threatened my Lord Archbishop of Canterbury's Salomon saith, That before the fall of man his spirit shall be elevated. The Archbishop of Canterbury was called or retorted to be chosen Lord Chancellor, which is the chiefest office in all that Realm; but he excused himself by his age, as being not able to wield such a function. Wherefore the said Office was bestowed upon Thomas More, no less to the rejoicing of many, than that the other was displaced from it. These news my Servant brought me out of England, &c. Ex Epist. Erasmus & Joann. Vergeram.

You heard before, how a Council of the Nobles was appointed by the King in the month of October, to assemble in the Star-Chamber about the Cardinals matter: and also how a Parliament was summoned to begin in the month of November, in the year following, Anno 1530. At the beginning of which Parliament, after that M. More the new Chancellor had finished his Oration, the Commons were commanded to chuse them a Speaker, who was Thomas Audley Esquire, and Attorney to the Duchy of Lancaster. Thus the Parliament being begun the sixth day of the foresaid month of November, at Westminster: where the King with all the Lords were set in the Parliament Chamber, the Commons, after they had presented their Speaker, assembled in the nether House, began to Commune of their griefs, wherewith the Spirituality had before time grievously oppressed them, contrary both to all right, and to the Law of the Realm, and specially were fore moved with these six great causes.

¶ Grievances against the Clergy of England.

1. The first, For the excessive fines which the Ordinaries took for Probates of Testaments, inasmuch that Sir Henry Guildford, Knight of the Garter, and Controller of the Kings House, declared in the open Parliament, of his fidelity, that he and other being Executors to Sir William Compton, Knight, paid for the Probate of his Will, to the Cardinal and the Archbishop of Canterbury, a thousand Marks sterling. After this declaration were shewed so many extortions done by Ordinaries for Probates of Wills, that it were too much to rehearse.

2. The second cause was, the great polling and extortion exacted which the spiritual men used, in taking of Corps, Prelates, or Mortuaries: for the Children of the dead should all dye for hunger and go a begging, rather than they would of charity give to them the silly Cow which the dead man ought, if he had but only one, such was the charity of them.

3. The third cause was, that Priests being Surveyors, Stewards, and Officers to Bishops, Abbots, and other spiritual Heads, had and occupied Farms, Granges, and Grating in every Country, so that the poor Husbandmen could have nothing but of them, and yet for that they should pay dearly.

4. The fourth cause was, that Abbots, Priors, and spiritual men kept Tan-houses, and bought and sold Wool, Cloth, and all manner of Merchandise, as other temporal Merchants did.

5. The fifth cause was, because the spiritual persons promoted to great benefices, and having their livings of their flock, were lying in the Court in Lords houses, and took all of their Parishioners, and nothing spent on them at all: so that for lack of residence both the poor of the parish lacked refreshing, and universally all the Parishioners lacked preaching and true instructions of Gods Word, to the great peril of their souls.

6. The sixth cause was, because one Priest, being little learned, had ten or twelve Benefices, and was resident on none, and many well learned Scholars in the University, which were able to preach and teach, had neither Benefice nor exhibition.

These things before this time might in no wife be touched, nor yet talked of by any man, except he would be made an Hereticke, or lose all that he had: for the Bishops were Chancellors, and had all the rule about the King, so that no man durst once presume to attempt any thing contrary to their profit or commodity.

But now when God had illuminated the eyes of the King, and the time so fared, that men more boldly durst expresse with voice such grudges as they had long conceived in their hearts against the Clergy: the Burgeses of the Parliament appointed certain of the Common house, men learned in the Law, to draw one Bill of the Probates of Testaments, another for Mortuaries, and the third for Non-residence, Pluralities, and taking Farms by spiritual men.

And first to the Bill of Mortuaries being drawn, and being also passed the Common house, and sent up to the Higher, the Spiritual Lords shewed a fair face, saying, that assuredly Priests and Curates took more than they should, and therefore it were well done to take some reasonable order. Thus they spake, because it touched them but little.

After this, within two days, was sent up the second Bill, concerning Probates of Testaments: which Bill, because it touched their profit somewhat near, both the Archbishop of Canterbury, and all other Bishops in general began to frown and grunt: inasmuch as Doctor John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, standing up in the Parliament Chamber, openly protested, that such Bills were sent up from the Common house, tending to no other thing, but to the destruction of the Church: which Church being down, the glory then of the whole Kingdom (said he) must needs fall; desiring therefore the Lords, for Gods sake, to take example by the Kingdom of Bohemia. For as it was then with the people there, so now what say the Commons here, but Down with the Church? And all this (said he) seemeth to be only for lack of Faith. When these words were reported to the Commons of the lower House, what the Bishops said, in noting all their doings to be for lack of Faith, they took the matter grievously, so to be esteemed of the Bishop for no better than Heretics; understanding moreover, how that he by those slanderous words went about to perwade the Lords Temporal against them, and so to overthrow the two Bills by them passed before, as ye have heard.

Whereupon, after long debate, it was at length agreed by the said Commons; that Thomas Audley their Speaker, with thirty of the chief of that House, should be sent to the King: being then in his Palace at Westminster, before called York Place: where they eloquently declared, what a dishonour to the King and the Realm it was, to say that they which were elected for the wisest Men of all the Shires, Cities, and Boroughs within the Realm of England, should be declared in so noble and open preference to lack Faith, which was equivalent to say that they were Infidels, and no Christians, as ill as Turks or Saracens: so that what pain or study forever they took for the Commonwealth, or what acts or laws forever they made or established, should be taken as laws made by Painims and Heathen people and not worthy to be kept by Christian men: wherefore they most humbly bly besought the Kings Highness to call the said Bishop before him, and to cause him to speak more discreetly of such a number as was in the the Common house.

The K. not contented with the Bp. of Rochester.

The Bishops excuse.

The King not being well contented with the saying of the Bishop, yet gently answered the Speaker, and sent them away. Who immediately sent for the Archbishop of Canterbury, and six other Bishops, and Rochester also, signifying unto them the grudge of the Commons. The Bishop of Rochester, excusing himself, answered, that he, in so saying, meant only the doings of the Bohemians to be for lack of Faith, and not the doing of them that were in the Common house. Which saying was confirmed by the Bishops there present, which had him in great reputation. And so by that only saying the King accepted his excuse, and therefore sent word to the Commons by Sir William Fitzwilliams Knight, Treasurer of his household. Which blind excuse pleased the Commons nothing at all.

Difference between the Lally and Fidelity about certain conditions.

Long use maketh not evil things lawful.

After this, divers Assemblies were kept between certain of the Lords, and certain of the Commons, for the Bills of the Probates of Testaments, and Mortuaries. The Temporality laid to the Spirituality their own Laws and Constitutions: And the Spirituality fore defended them by prescription and usage. To whom it was thus answered by a Gentleman of Grays Inn: The usage hath ever been of Thieves, to rob on Shooters-hill: Ergo, is it lawful? With this answer the spiritual men were so offended, because their doings were called Roberies: but the Temporal men stood full by their sayings, inasmuch that the said Gentlemen said to the Archbishop of Canterbury: that both the exaction of Probates of Testaments, and the taking of Mortuaries, as they were used, were open Robbery and Theft. After long disputation, the Temporal Lords began to lean to the Commons: but for all that the Bills remained unconcluded for a time.

It followeth shortly after in the Parliament, that a Bill was assented to by the Lords of the Higher house, and sent down to the Commons in the Lower house, and by them also with much labour agreed unto, of whom the most part were the Kings Servants. In the which Bill it was required and concluded, that the King should be released of all such Loan of money which he had borrowed: of his Subjects in the Fifteenth year of his Reign. The passing of which Bill went fore against the stomach of the poor Commons: For many relied upon it, counting and passing it over, one to another for good debt, as if it had been ready money in their purses. Wherefore the King, to gratify them again, granted to them a general pardon of all offences, only certain great offences and debts excepted. Also he aided them for the redress of their griefs against the Spirituality, and caused two new Bills to be made indifferently, both for the Probates of the Testaments, and Mortuaries: which Bills were so reasonable, that the Spiritual Lords assented to them all, though they were fore against their minds, and in especial the Probate of Testaments fore displeased the Bishops, and the Mortuaries fore displeased the Parsons and Vicars.

Redress of the griefs of the Commons.

After these Acts thus agreed, the Commons make another Act for pluralities of Benefices, nonresidence, buying and selling, and taking of Farms by Spiritual persons. Which Act so displeased the Spirituality, that the Priests raid on the Commons of the Lower house, and called them Heretics and Schismatics: for the which divers Priests were punished.

The third Bill of the Commons for pluralities, &c.

This Act was fore debated above in the Parliament Chamber, and the Lords Spirituality would in no wise consent. Wherefore the King perceiving the grudge of the Commons, caused eight Lord and eight of his Commons to meet in the Star-Chamber at an afternoon, and there was fore debating of the Cause, in so much that the Temporal Lords of the upper House which were there took part with the Commons against the Spiritual Lords, and by force of reason caused them to assent to the Bill, with a little qualifying: Which Bill the next day was wholly agreed to in the Lords house, to the great rejoicing of the Lay people, and to great displeasure of the Spiritual persons.

And thus much concerning these Bills against the Clergy by the way: Now to return to the Cardinal again. During the time of the said Parliament, there was brought down to the Commons the Book of Articles which the Lords had put up to the King against the Cardinal. The chief Articles were these.

¶ Articles objected against Cardinal Wolsey.

1. First, That he without the Kings assent had procured himself to be a Legat, by reason whereof he took away the right of all Bishops and spiritual persons.
2. In all writings that he wrote to Rome, or to another Prince, he wrote Ego & Rex meus, I and my King, as who would say, that the King were his servant.
3. That he slandered the Church of England to the Court of Rome: For his suggestion to be Legat, was to reform the Church of England, which (as he wrote) was Falsa in reprobum sensum.
4. He without the Kings assent carried the Kings great Seal with him into Flanders, when he was sent Ambassador to the Emperor.
5. Without the Kings consent he sent Commiſſion to Sir Gregory de Calfatis, Knight, to conclude a league between the King and the Duke of Ferrary.
6. That he, having the French Pox, presumed to come and breath on the King.
7. That he caused the Cardinals Hat to be put on the Kings Coyne.
8. That he had sent innumerable substance to Rome, for the obtaining of his Dignities, to the great impoverishment of the Realm. With many other things which are touched more at large in Chronicles.

These Articles, with many more, being read in the Common house, were confessed by the Cardinal, and signed with his hand. Also there was shewed another writing sealed with his Seal, by the which he gave to the King all his moveables and unmoveables.

You have heard hitherto declared, how the Cardinal was attained in the Premunure, and how he was put out of the Office of the Chancellor, and lay at Ather: which was in the year of our Lord, 1530. The next year after in the Lent season, the King, by the advice of his Council, licenced him to go into his Dioceses of Tork, and gave him commandment to keep him within his Dioceses, and not to return Southward, without the Kings special Licence in writing.

So he made great provision to go Northward, and apparelled his Servants newly, and bought many costly things for his household. But divers of his Servants at this time departed from him to the Kings service, and especially Thomas Cromwel, one of his chief Council, and chief doer for him in the suppression of Abbeys. After that all things necessary for his journey were prepared, he took his journey Northward, till he came to Southwell, which was in his Dioceses, and there he continued that year, ever grudging at his fall, as you shall hear hereafter: but the Lands which he had given to his College in Oxford and Ipswich were now come to the Kings hands, by his attainder in the Premunure: and yet the King of his gentleness, and for favour that he bore to good learning, erected again the College in Oxford, and where it was named the Cardinals College, he called it the Kings College, and indeed it with fair possessions, and ordained new Statutes and Ordinances: and because the College of Ipswich was thought to be nothing profitable, therefore he left that dissolved.

The Cardinals College now called Christs College in Oxford.

Notwithstanding that the Cardinal of Tork was thus attained in the Premunure, (as is above mentioned) yet the King being good unto him, had granted him the Bishopricks of Tork and Winchester, with great plenty of substance, and had Licenced him to lie in his Dioceses of Tork, where he so continued the space of a year. But after, in the year following, which was 1531, he being of his Dioceses, wrote to the Court of Rome, and to divers other Princes, Letters in reproach of the King, and as much as in him lay, he stirred them to revenge his cause against the King and his Realm: inasmuch that divers opprobrious words against the King were spoken to Doctor Edward Keerne, the Kings Orator at Rome. And it was said to him, That for the Cardinals sake the King should have the worse speed in the suite of his Matrimony. The Cardinal also would speak fair to the people, to win their hearts, and declared ever that he was unjustly and untruly ordered. Which fair speaking made many men believe that he said true. And to Gentlemen he gave great gifts to allure them unto him; and to be had in more reputation among the people, he determined to be entailed or enthroned at York with all the pompe that might be, and caused a Throne to be erected in the Cathedral Church, in such a height and fashion, as was never seen, and sent to all the Lords, Abbots, Priors, Knights, Esquires, and Gentlemen of his Diocesse, to be at his Manner of Caswood the sixth day of November, and so to bring him to York with all manner of pompe and solemnity.

The Cardinals proud Journey to ward York

The King, which knew his doings and privy conveyance, all this year dissembled the matter, to see what he would do at length, till that he seeing his proud heart so highly exalted, that he would be so triumphantly installed, without making the King privy, yea, and in a manner in disdain of the King, thought it not meet nor convenient to suffer him any longer to continue in his malicious and proud purposes and attempts. Wherefore he directed his Letters to the Earl of Northumberland, willing him with all diligence to Arrest the Cardinal, and to deliver him to the Earl of Shrewsbury, great Steward of the Kings household. When the Earl had seen the Letters, he with a convenient number came to the Mannor of Caswood the fourth day of November; and when he was brought to the Cardinal in his Chamber, he said to him, My Lord, I pray you take patience, for here I Arrest you. Arrest me, said the Cardinal? Yea, said the Earl, I have a commandment so to do. You have no such power, said the Cardinal, for I am both a Cardinal, and a Legat De Latere, and a Peer of the College of Rome, and ought not to be Arrested by any temporal power; for I am not subject to that power: wherefore if you Arrest me I will withstand it. Well, said the Earl, here is the Kings Commission (which he shewed him) and therefore I charge you to obey. The Cardinal somewhat remembered himself, and said: Well My Lord, I am content to obey: but although that I by negligence fell into the punishment of the Præmunire, and lost by the Law all my Lands and goods, yet my Person was in the Kings protection, and I was pardoned that offence; wherefore I marvel why I now should be Arrested, and specially considering that I am a member of the See Apostolick on whom no temporal man ought to lay violent hands. Well, I see the King lacketh good Council. Well, said the Earl, when I was sworn Warden of the Marches, you your self told me, I might with my Staff Arrest all men under the degree of a King; and now I am stronger, for I have a Commission so to do, which you have seen. The Cardinal at length obeyed, and was kept in a privy Chamber, and his goods seized, and his Officers discharged: And his Physician called Doctor Augustin was likewise Arrested, and brought to the Tower by Sir Walter Welch, one of the Kings Chamber. The sixth day of November he was conveyed from Caswood to Sheffield Castle, and there delivered to the Earl of Shrewsbury keeping till the Kings pleasure were known. Of this Attachement was much communing among the Common people; wherefore many were glad; for he was not in the favour of the Commonality.

The Cardinal Arrested.

The Cardinal brought up toward London.

When the Cardinal was thus Arrested, the King sent Sir William Kingston Knight, Captain of the Guard, and Constable of the Tower of London, with certain Yeomen of the Guard to Sheffield, to fetch the Cardinal to the Tower. When the Cardinal saw the Captain of the Guard he was fore astonished, and shortly became sick; for then he perceived some great trouble toward him, and for that cause men said, that he willingly took so much quantity of a strong purgation, that his nature was not able to bear it. Also the matter that came from him was so black, that the staining thereof could not be gotten out of his Blankets by any means. But Sir

William Kingston comforted him, and by ealie journeyes he brought him to the Abbey of Lyncester the seven and twentieth day of November, where for very feebleness of nature, caused by purgations and vomits, he died the second night following, and in the same Abbey lieth buried.

It is testified by one, yet being alive, in whose arms the said Cardinal died, that his body being dead was black as pitch, also was so heavy, that six could scarce bear it. Furthermore, it did so stink above the ground, that they were constrained to hasten the Burial thereof in the night season, before it was day. At the which Burial, such a tempest with such a stinch there arose, that all the Torches went out, and so he was thrown into the Tomb, and there was laid.

By the ambitious pride and excessive worldly wealth of this one Cardinal, all men may easily understand and judge what the state and condition of all the rest of the same Order (whom we call spiritual men) was in those days, as well in all other places of Christendom, as especially here in England, where the princely possessions and great pride of the Clergy did not only far pass and exceed the common measure and order of Subjects, but also surmounted over Kings and Princes, and all other estates, as may well appear by his doings and order of his story, above described.

Amongst other acts of the foresaid Cardinal, this is not to be forgotten, that he founded a new College in Oxford, for the furniture whereof he had gathered together all the best learned he could hereof, amongst which number were these; Clark, Tindal, Sommers, Fitch, and Taverner, with other more: Which holding in assembly together in the College, were accounted to be Heretics (as they called them) and thereupon were cast into a Prison of the College, where Saffron lay, through the stink whereof the most part of them were infected, and the said Clark being a tender young man, and the most singular in learning amongst them all, died in the same Prison; and other in other places in the Town also, of the same infection, deceased.

And thus having detained the Reader enough, or rather too much, with this vain-glorious Cardinal, now we will reduce our story again to other more fruitful matter, and, as the order of time requirith, we will first begin with Master Humphry Mummuth, a virtuous and a good Alderman of London, who in the time of the said Cardinal was troubled, as in the story here followeth.

The trouble of Humphry Mummuth Alderman of London.

After Humphry Mummuth, was a right godly and sincere Alderman of London, who in the days of Cardinal Wolsey was troubled and put in the Tower, for the Gospel of Christ, and for maintaining them that favoured the same.

Stokesley, then Bishop of London, ministered Articles unto him, to the number of four and twenty: as for adhering to Luther and his opinions; for having and reading heretical Books and Treatises; for giving exhibition to William Tindall, Roy, and such other; for helping them over the Sea to Luther; for ministering privy help to translate, as well the Testament, as other Books into English; for eating flesh in Lent; for affirming Faith only to justify; for derogating from mens constitutions; for not praying to Saints, not allowing Pilgrimage, Auricular confession, the Popes Pardons; briefly, for being an advancer of all Martin Luthers opinions, &c.

He being of these Articles examined and cast into the Tower, at last was compelled to make his suit or purgation, writing to the foresaid Cardinal, then Lord Chancellor, and the whole Council, out of the Tower. In the contents whereof he answered to the criminal accusation of them which charged him with certain Books received from beyond the Sea; also for his acquaintance with Master Tindal. Whereupon he said, that he denied not, but that four years then past he had heard the said Tindal preach two or three Sermons at Saint Dunstons in the West, and afterward meeting with the said Tindal, had certain communication with him concerning his living: who then told him that he had none at all, but trusted to be in the Bishop of London his service; for then he laboured to be his Chaplain. But being refused of the Bishop, he came again to the said Mummuth this examine, and besought him to help him. Who the same time took him into his house for half a year: where the said Tindal lived (as he said) like a good Priest, studying both night and day. He would eat but foddren meat by his good will, nor drink but small fingle bear. He was never seen in that house to wear Limen about him, all the space of his being there. Whereupon the said Mummuth had the better liking of him, so that he promised him ten pound (as he then said) for his Fathers and Mothers Souls, and all Christian Souls; which money afterward he sent him over to Hamborow according to his promise. And yet not to him alone he gave this exhibition, but to divers other moe likewise which were no Heretics; as to Doctor Royson, the Bishop of London's Chaplain, he exhibited forty or fifty pounds: to Doctor Wodshall, Provincial of the Frier Augustines, as much or moe, to Doctor Watson the Kings Chaplain, also to other Scholars, and divers Priests; besides other charges bestowed upon religious Houses, as upon the Nunnery of Dymey, above fifty pounds Sterling bestowed, &c.

And as touching his Books, as Enchiridion, the Pater noster, De libertate Christiana, an English Testament, of which, some William Tindal left with him, some he sent unto him, some were brought into his house, by whom he could not tell; these Books, he said, did lye open in his house, the space of two years together, he suspecting no harm to be in them. And moreover the same Books being desired of sundry persons, as of the Abbess of Denney a Frier of Greenwich, the Father Confessor of Sion, he let them have them, and yet never heard Frier, Priest, or Lay-man find any fault with the said Books. Likewise to Doctor Watson, to Doctor Stockhouse, Master Martin, Parson of Tavinghache, he committed the perusing of the Books of Pater noster, and De libertate Christiana, which found no great fault in them, but only in the Book De libertate Christiana, they said there were things somewhat hard, except the Reader were wise.

Thus he excusing himself and moreover complaining of the loss of his credit by his imprisonment in the Tower, and of the detriments of his occupying, who was wont yearly to ship over five hundred Cloths to strangers, and set many Clothiers awork in Suffolk, and in other places, of whom he bought all their Cloths, which were now almost all undone; by this reason at length he was set at liberty being forced to abjure, and after was made Knight by the King, and Sheriff of London.

Of this Humphrey Mummuth we read of a notable example of Christian patience, in the Sermons of M. Latimer, which the said Latimer heard in Cambridge of Master George Staphord, Reader of the Divine Lecture in that University. Who expounding the place of Saint Paul to the Romans, that we shall overcome our enemy with well doing, and to heap hot Coles upon his head, &c. brought in an example, saying, that he knew in London a great rich Merchant, meaning this Humphrey Mummuth, which had a very poor neighbour: yet for all his poverty he loved him very well, and lent him money at his need, and let him come to his Table whensoever he would: It was even at that time when Doctor Collet was in trouble, and should have been burnt, if God had not turned the Kings heart to the contrary. Now the rich man began to be a Scripture man, he began to smell the Gospel. The poor man was a Papist still.

It chanced on a time, when the rich man talked of the Gospel, sitting at his Table, where he reproved Popery and such kind of things; the poor man being there present, took a great displeasure against the rich man, inasmuch that he would come no more to his house; he would borrow no more money of him as he was wont to do before times, yea, and conceived such hatred and malice against him, that he went and accused him before the Bishops. Now the rich man, not knowing of any such displeasure, offered many times to talk with him, and to set him at quiet. It would not be. The poor man had such a stomach, that he would not vouchsafe to speak with him. If he met the rich man in the Street, he would go out of his way. One time it happened that he met him so in a narrow street, that he could not avoyd but come near him: yet for all this, the poor man (I say) had such a stomach against the rich man, that he was minded to go forward and not to speak with him. The rich man perceiving that, caught him by the hand, and asked him, saying; Neighbour, what is come into your heart to take such displeasure with me? What have I done against you? Tell me, and I will be ready at all times to make you amends. Finally, he spake so gently, so charitably, so lovingly, and friendly, that it wrought in the poor mans heart, that by and by he fell down upon his knees, and asked him forgiveness. The rich man forgave him, and so took him again to his favour, and they loved as well as ever they did afore.

TouChing the memorial of Thomas Hitten remaineth nothing in writing, but only his name, savethat William Tindal in his Apology against More, and also in another Book intituled, The practise of Prelates, doth once or twice make mention of him by way of digression. He was (saith he) a Preacher at Maidstone, whom the Bishop of Canterbury Willams Warham, and Fisher Bishop of Rochester, after they had long kept and tormented him in Prison with sundry torments, and that notwithstanding he continued constant; at last they burned him at Maidstone, for the constant and manifest testimony of Jesus Christ, and of his free Grace and Salvation. Thomas Bilney Martyr.

Thomas Bilney Doctor of both Laws.

Master L. L. former Coadjutor in the verity of the bridge.

Persecutors. Martyrs, and the causes of their Martyrdom.

Thomas Bilney. Arthur, which Abjured at Norwich, Anno 1531.

Cardinal Wolsey. IN the Story above passed of Cardinal Wolsey, mention was made of certain whom the said Cardinal caused to Abjure: as Bilney, Jeffery Lome, Garret, Barnes, and such other, of whom we have now (the Lord directing us) specially to entreat. This Thomas Bilney was brought up in the University of Cambridge, even from a Child, profiting in all kind of Liberal Sciences, even unto the profession of both Laws. But at the last having gotten a better School-Master, even the Holy Spirit of Christ, who endued his heart by privy inspiration with the knowledge of better and and more wholsom things, he came at the last unto this point, That, forsaking the knowledge of Mans Laws, he converted his Study to those things which tended more unto godliness than gainfulness.

Nix, Bishop of Norwich. Finally, As himself was greatly inflamed with the love of True Religion and Godliness, even so again was in his heart an incredible desire to allure many unto the same, desiring nothing more, than that he might stir up and encourage any to the love of Christ, and sincere Religion. Neither were his labours vain; for he converted many of his followers to the knowledge of the Gospel, amongst which number was Thomas Arthur, and Master Hugh Latimer, which Latimer at that time was Coadjutor at Cambridge, bringing it forth upon Proclamation-days. At the last, Bilney forsaking the University went into many places, teaching and preaching, being associate with Arthur, which accompanied him from the University. The Authority of Thomas Wolsey Cardinal of York, of whom ye have heard before, at that time was great in England, but his Pomp and Pride much greater, which did evidently declare unto all wise Men the manifest vanity, not only of his life, but also of all the Bishops and Clergy. Whereupon Bilney, with other good Men, marvelling at the incredible infolence of the Clergy, which they could now no longer suffer or abide, began to shake and reprove this excessive Pomp of the Clergy, and also to pluck at the Authority of the Bishop of Rome.

Then it was time for the Cardinal to awake, and speedily to look about his business. Neither lacked he in this point any craft or subtilty of a Serpent; for he understood well enough upon how slender a foundation their ambitious Dignity was grounded, neither was he ignorant that their Luciferos and proud Kingdom could not long continue against the manifest Word of God; especially if the Light of the Gospel should once open the eyes of Men. For otherwise he did not greatly fear the power and displeasure of Kings and Princes. Only this he feared, the Voice of Christ in his Gospel, lest it should disclose and detect their hypocrite and deceits, and force them to come into an order of godly discipline: wherefore he thought good speedily in time to withstand their beginnings. Whereupon he caused the said Bilney and Arthur to be apprehended and cast into Prison, as before you have heard.

After this, the seven and twentieth day of November, in the year of our Lord 1527, the said Cardinal accompanied with a great number of Bishops, as the Archbishop of Canterbury, Cuthbert of London, John of Rochester, Nicholas of Ely, John of Exeter, John of Lincoln, John of Bath and Wells, Henry of St. Asse, with many other both Divines and Lawyers, came into the Chapter-House of Westminster, where the said Master Thomas Bilney, and Thomas Arthur were brought before them, and the said Cardinal there inquired at Master Biney, whether he had, privately or publicly, preached or taught to the people the Opinions of Luther or any other condemned by the Church, contrary to the determination of the Church. Whereunto Bilney answered, That wittingly he had not preached or taught any of Luther's Opinions, or any other, contrary to the Catholick Church. Then the Cardinal asked him, whether he had not once made an Oath before, That he should not preach, rehearse, or defend any of Luther's Opinions, but should impugn the same every where? He answered, That he had made such an Oath, but not Lawfully. Which Interrogatories so ministred, and answers made, the Cardinal caused him to Swear, to answer plainly to the Articles and Errors preached and set forth by him; as well in the City and Dioceses of London, as in the Dioceses of Norwich and other places, and that he should do it without any craft, qualifying or leaving out any part of the truth.

Thomas
examined.

After he was thus Sworn and Examined, the said Cardinal proceeded to the Examination of Master Thomas Arthur there present, causing him to take the like Oath, that Master Bilney did. Which done, he asked of him whether he had not once told Sir Thomas Moor, Kt. That in the Sacrament of the Altar was not the very Body of Christ? Which Interrogatory he denied. Then the Cardinal gave him time to deliberate till noon, and to bring in his answer in writing. After noon, the same day, what time the Examination of the foresaid Thomas Arthur was ended, the Cardinal and Bishops by their Authority, Ex Officio, did call in for Witnesses, before Master Bilney, certain Men, namely, John Huggen, chief Provincial of the Friars preachers throughout all England, Jeffrey Julles, and Richard Jugworib, professors of Divinity of the same Order. Also William Jekett, Gentleman, William Nelson, and Thomas Williams, which were Sworn, that all favour, hate, love, or reward set apart, they should without concealing any falshood, or omitting any truth, speak their minds, upon the Articles laid against him, or preached by him, as well within the Dioceses of London, as the Dioceses of Norwich: and because he was otherwise occupied about the Affairs of the Realm, he committed the hearing of the matter to the Bishop of London, and two other Bishops there present, or to three of them, to proceed against all Men, as well Spiritual as Temporal, as also against Schedules, Writings, and Books, set forth and Translated by Martin Luther, lately condemned by Pope Leo the Tenth, and by all manner of probable means to enquire, and root out their Errors and Opinions, and all such as were found culpable, to compel them to Abjuration according to the Law, or if the matter so required, to deliver them unto the Secular Power, and to give them full Power and Authority to determine upon them.

Bishop of

The Seven and twentieth of November, in the year aforesaid, the Bishop of London, with the Bishops of Ely and Rochester, came unto the Bishop of Norwich's House, whereas likewise, Ex Officio, they did Swear certain witnesses against Master Thomas Arthur, in like sort as they had done before against Master Thomas Bilney, and so proceeded to the Examination of Master Arthur, which being ended upon certain Interrogatories; the Bishop of London warned him by virtue of his Oath, That he should not reveal his Examinations, nor his Answers, nor any part or parcel thereof.

Articles against Thomas Arthur.

Articles against Thomas Arthur.

1. Inprimis, That he exhorted the people in his prayers, to pray specially for those that now be in Prison. Which Article he denied.
2. That he said, Though Men be refrained to preach now a days (which is against Gods Laws) yet I may preach: First, By the Authority of my Lord Cardinal; for I have his License. Secondly, By the Authority of the University. Thirdly, By the Pope. Fourthly, By the Authority of God, where he saith, Evangelium in mundum prædicare Evangelium omni creaturæ. By which Authority every Man may preach, and there is neither Bishop nor Ordinary, nor yet the Pope, that may make any Law to let any Man to preach the Gospel. This Article he confessed that he spake.

3. When he spake of Laws, he brought a similitude of Crosses, set up against the Walls of London, that Men should not piss there. When there was but one Cross, or a few more, Men did reverence them, and pissed not there; but when there was in every corner a Cross set, then Men of necessity were compelled to piss upon the Crosses. So in like manner, when there was but a few Holy and Devout Laws in the Church, then Men were afraid to offend them. Afterward they made many Laws for their advantage; and such as were pecuniary those they do observe; and such as are not pecuniary, those they call Pales, and regard them not: and so now a days there are so many Laws, that whether a Man do ill or well, he shall be taken in the Law. He confessed that he spake the very same, or the like words.

tude of

4. He said, Good people, if I should suffer Persecution for the preaching of the Gospel of God, yet there are Seven thousand more that would preach the Gospel of God as I do now. Therefore good people, good people, (which words he often rehearsed as it were lamenting) think not that if these Tyrants and Persecutors put a Man to death, the preaching of the Gospel therefore is to be forsaken. This Article he confessed, that he spake in like words and sense, saving that he made no mention of Tyrants.

5. That every Man, yea every Lay-man is a Priest. He confessed that he spake such words, declaring in his Sermon, that every Christian-man is a Priest, offering up the Sacrifice of Prayer. And if they did murmur against the Order of Priesthood, they did murmur against themselves.

6. That Men should pray to no Saints in Heaven, but only to God; and they should use no other Mediator for them, but Christ Jesus our Redeemer only. This Article he denied.

7. He preached that they should worship no Images of Saints, which were nothing but Stocks and Stones. This he also denied.

8. He did preach upon Whit-sunday last, within the University of Cambridge, such, or like words and sentences: That a Bachelor of Divinity admitted of the University, or any other person having or knowing the Gospel of God, should go forth and preach in every place, and let for no Man, of what Estate or Degree soever he were: and if any Bishop did Accuse them for so doing, their Curies should turn to the harm of themselves. He confessed this.

Which answers thus made and acknowledged, the said Master Arthur did revoke and condemn the said Articles against him ministred, and submitted himself to the punishment and judgment of the Church.

The third day of December, the Bishop of London with the other Bishops assembling in the place aforesaid, after that Bilney had denied utterly to return to the Church of Rome, the Bishop of London in discharge of his Conscience (as he said) left he should hide any thing that had come to his hands, did really exhibit unto the Notaries, in the presence of the said Master Bilney, certain Letters, to wit, five Letters or Epistles, with one Schedule in one of the Epistles, containing his Articles and Answers folded therein, and another Epistle folded in manner of a Book, with six Leaves; which all and every one he commanded to be written out and Registered, and the Originals to be delivered to him again.

Concerning the Answers unto these Articles (gentle Reader) so much as in the most part of them, Bilney with Arthur seemed to consent and agree (although not fully and directly, but by way and manner of qualifying) yet because he did not expressly deny them, it shall not be needful here to recite them all, save only such wherein he seemed to dissent from them.

To the first and second Articles he answered affirmatively.

To the third he said, I believe that many of the Popes Laws are profitable and necessary, and do prevail unto godlines, neither in any point are repugnant unto the Scriptures, nor by any means are to be abrogate, but of all Men to be observed and revered. But touching all those Laws I cannot determin: for, as for such as I have not read, I trust notwithstanding they are good also; and as for those that I have read, I did never read them to the end and purpose to reprove them, but, according to my power, to learn and understand them. And as touching the multitude of Laws, St. Augustine in his time did much complain, and Gerfon also, who marvelled, that he could by any means live in safety amongst so many statutes of Constitutions, when as our fore-Fathers, being pure before their fall, could not observe one only precept.

To the fourth Article he said, That the Catholick Church can by no means err in Faith, for it is the whole Congregation of the Elect, and so known only unto God, which knoweth who are his: otherwise no Man should be ascertained of another Mans Salvation, or of his own, but only through Faith and Hope. The True Church cannot err in Faith

Eccles. 5. No man knoweth whether he be worthy of hatred or love. It is also sensible, and may be demonstrate so far forth as it is sufficient to establish us in all things, that are to be believed and done: for I may truly say of the General Council being congregated in the Holy Ghost: Behold here the Catholick Church, denominating the whole by the most worthy part.

To the fifth Article he answered affirmatively in these words: Cum sint libri Laicorum, adorare oportet, at non Imaginem, Sec Prototypum.

To the sixth Article he answered, That he did not believe that they are in Heaven, being so taught by the Scriptures, and Holy Fathers of the Church.

To the seventh Article he said, That it is not to be thought contrary.

To the eighth Article, Whether a Man may not observe the Feasts and Fasts of the Church prescribed; He thought that there is no Man but he ought to observe them.

To the ninth Article he said, That we are likewise bound as unto Parents.

To the fourteenth Article he answered thus: The fourteenth Chapter of St. Paul in his first Epistle to the Corinthians moveth me to believe, that it is best that the people should have the Lords Prayer, and the Apostles Creed in English, so that their Devotion might the more be furthered by the understanding thereof, and also that thereby they might be the more prompt and expert in the Articles of their Faith: of the which, it is to be feared, a great number are ignorant. Surely I have heard many say, That they never heard speak of the Resurrection of the Body, and being certified thereof, but they became much more apt and ready unto goodness, and more fearful to do evil.

To the fifteenth Article he said, he would wish that the Gospels and Epistles should be read in English, For I would (saith Paul) rather have five words, &c. That the Church might be edified, &c. And Chrysostom exhorteth his hearers to look upon Books, that they might the better commit unto memory those things which they had heard. And St. Bede did translate St. John's Gospel into English.

Touching the eighteenth Article, for the translation of the Scripture into English, concerning the whole, he did partly doubt. Notwithstanding he wished that the Gospels and Epistles of the day might be read in English, that the people might be made the more apt to hear Sermons. But here some will say, there might also be danger for error. Whereunto he answered, But good and vigilant Pastors might easily help that matter, by adding the plain interpretation of the Fathers in the Margents in English, upon the dark and obscure places, which would put away all doubts. O how great profit of Souls should the vigilant Pastors get thereby, which contrariwise through their slothfulness bring great ruin and decay.

To the five and twentieth Article, as touching Pardons, he said, That as they be used, and have too long been, it were better that they should be refrained, than that they should be any longer used as they have been, to the injury of Christs Pardon.

Touching the six and twentieth Article, he said, That it is not against the Doctrine of Christ and his Apostles to contend in the Law, so it be done with Charity, if St. Augustine, and the reverend Father Marcus Marulus did not err, which granted that liberty to the weak Christians: albeit the true Christians ought to give ear unto St. Paul's sayings, Why do ye not rather suffer injury? And to Christ himself, which saith, He that would contend with thee in the Law, and take away thy coat, give him thy cloak also.

Touching the eight and twentieth, he answered, That God is the Author of the punishment only, but not of the offence, as Basilus Magnus teacheth in his Sermon upon these words of the Prophet: Non est malum in civitate quod non fecit dominus. And St. Augustine in another Place (as I remember) prayeth, That he be not led into that temptation, that he should believe God to be the Author of sin and wickedness.

Here ensueth a brief Summary or Collection of certain Depositions, deposed by the several Witnesses afore-named, upon certain Interrogatories, Ministring unto them, for the enquiry of Master Bilney's Doctrine and Preaching.

First it was Deposed, That in his Sermon in Christs Church in Ipswich, he should preach and say, Our Saviour Christ is our Mediator between us and the Father: What should we need then to seek to any Saint for remedy? Wherefore, it is great injury to the blood of Christ, to make such Petitions, and blasphemeth our Saviour.

That Man is so imperfect of himself, that he can in no wise merit by his own deeds.

Also, that the coming of Christ was long prophesied before, and desired by the Prophets: But John Baptist, being more than a Prophet, did not only prophetic, but with his Finger shewed him, saying, Eccce agnus Dei qui tollis peccata mundi. Then if this were the very Lamb, which John did demonstrate, that taketh away the sins of the World, what injury is it to our Saviour Christ; that to be buried in St. Francis Cowle should remit four parts of Penance: what is then left to our Saviour Christ, which taketh away the sins of the World? This I will justify to be a great Blasphemy to the Blood of Christ.

Also, that it was a great folly to go on Pilgrimage, and that preachers in times past have been Antichrists; and now it hath pleased God somewhat to shew forth their falshood and errors.

Also, that the miracles done at Walsingham, at Canterbury, and there in Ipswich, were done by the Devil, through the sufferance of God, to blind the poor people: and that the Pope hath not the Keys that Peter had, except he follow Peter in his living.

Moreover, it was Deposed against him, That he was notoriously suspected as an Heretic, and twice pulled out of the Pulpit in the Diocess of Norwich.

Also it was Deposed against him, That he should in the Parish-Church of Willeford exhort the people to put away their gods of Silver and Gold, and leave their Offerings unto them; for that such things as they offered have been known oftentimes afterward to have been given to Whores of the Stews. Also that Jews and Saracens would have become Christian-men long ago, had it not been for the Idolatry of Christian-men, in offering of Candles, Wax, and Money to Stocks and Stones.

Over and besides these cavilling matters, articulated, and deposed against him, here follow certain other Articles whereupon he was detected, gathered out of his Sermon which he preached in the Parish-Church of St. Magnus, in Whitson week, in the year of our Lord, 1527.

¶ Certain other Articles produced against Master Thomas Bilney.

First he said, Pray you only to God, and not to Saints, rehearsing the Letany; and when he came to Santa Maria, ora pro nobis, he said, Stay there.

He said, that Christian-men ought to worship God only, and not Saints.

He said, that Christian people should set up no Lights before the Images of Saints: for Saints in Heaven need no Light, and the Images have no eyes to see.

He said, as Exekias destroyed the Brazen Serpent that Moses made by the commandment of God; even so should Kings and Princes now adays destroy and burn the Images of Saints set up in Churches.

These five hundred years there hath been no good Pope, nor in all the times past we can find but fifty; for they have neither preached, nor lived well, or conformably to their Dignity. Wherefore till now they have born the Keys of Symony. Against whom, good people, we must preach and teach unto you. For we cannot come to them; it {KING} it is great pity: they have sore slandered the Blood of Christ.

The people have used foolishly of late Pilgrimages, which for them had been better they had been at home.

Many have made certain Vows, which be not possible for them to fulfil, and those nothing meritorious.

The Preachers before this have been Antichrists, and now it hath pleased our Saviour Christ to shew their false Errors, and to teach another way and manner of the Holy Gospel of Christ, to the comfort of your Souls.

The Vice-philie of Bilney.

I trust that there shall and will come other besides me, which shall shew and preach to you, the same Faith and manner of living that I do shew and preach to you, which is the very True Gospel of our Saviour Christ, and the mind of the Holy Fathers, whereby you shall be brought from their Errors, wherein you have been long seduced: for before this there have been many that have slandered you, and the Gospel of our Saviour Christ, of whom spake our Saviour, Matth. 18. Qui scandalizaverit unum de pusillis istis qui in me credit, &c.

These and many other such like Depositions were Deposed against him by the Deponents and Witnesses before Sworn, which wholly to recite would be too long and tedious: therefore these shall suffice at this time, being the principal matters, and in manner the effect of all the rest. But now, before we will return again to the order of his Examination, we think it good here to infer a certain Dialogue containing a communication between a Frier named John Bruiserd, and Master Thomas Bilney, which we have thought meet for this place, because it was done in Ipswich, and also about the time of these Examinations: the Copy whereof we have written with the Friars own hand in Latin, the Copy whereof in English here inserteth.

Bilney and Frier Bruiserd.

Although you have blasphemed most perversely the immaculate Flock of Christ with certain blasphemies of yours, yet being moved partly with our gentle Petitions, partly pitying your case and towards disposition, I am come hither to talk with you secretly, before the rumour be disclosed, upon the consideration of the threefold Errors which I see in you.

First, For that when you began to shoot the Dart of your pernicious Error, more vehemently than you ought, against the Breast of the ignorant multitude, you seem to pour upon the Ground the precious Blood of Christ, as with a certain vehement violence out of the miserable vessel of your heart. Whereas you said that none of the Saints do make intercession for us, nor obtain for us any thing, you have perilously blasphemed the efficacy of the whole Church, consecrated with the precious Blood of Christ. Which thing you are not able to deny, especially seeing the same so incessantly doth knock at the Gates of Heaven, through the continual intercession of the Saints, according as in the sevenfold Letany manifestly appeareth to be seen.

A great

and no more.

Bilney. I marvel at you, and doubtless cannot marvel enough, but that the strong and vain custom of superstitious Men, thinking themselves not to be heard but in much babbling, doth put an end to my admiration. For our Heavenly Father knoweth what we have need of before we ask. Also it is written, There is one Mediator of God and Men, the Man Christ Jesus. If then there be but one Mediator of God and Men, the Man Christ Jesus, where is our blessed Lady? Where is then St. Peter and other Saints?

Bruiserd. I suppose that no Man is ignorant, but that the Divines of the Primitive Church have all affirmed to be one Mediator between God and Men. Neither could any at any time pray or pray to the Saints, when as yet they living in the calamities of this body, and wrestling with the contrary winds of this World, were not yet come to the Port of rest wherunto they were travelling. Paul

(I grant) did rightly affirm to be but one Mediator of God and Men, what time as yet there was no Saint Canonized or put into the Kalendar. But now seeing the Church doth know, and doth certainly believe, through the undoubted revelations of God, that the blessed Virgin and other Saints are placed in the bosom of Abraham, (he therefore like a good Mother hath taught, and that most diligently, us her Children, to praise the Omnipotent Jesus in his Saints; and also to offer up by the same Saints our Petitions unto God. Thereof it is that the Psalmist saith; Praise ye the Lord in his Saints. Rightly also do we say and affirm, That Saints may pray for us. One Man may pray for another; Ergo, much more may Saints that do enjoy the fruition of his High Majesty. For so it is written, God is my witness, whom I serve in my spirit, in the Gospel of his Son, that without ceasing I remember you in my prayer always for you, &c.

Evan. 1.

Bilney. I marvel doubtless, that you a Man learned are not yet delivered out of the confuse Dungeon of Heresie through the help of the Holy Gospel: especially seeing that in the same Gospel it is written, Verily, verily, I say unto you, whatsoever you ask the Father in my Name, he will give it unto you.

John 14.

He saith not, whatsoever ye ask the Father in the name of St. Peter, St. Paul, or other Saints, but in my Name. Let us ask therefore help in the Name of him, which is able to obtain for us of his Father whatsoever we ask, left peradventure hereafter in the end of the World, at the last judgment, we shall hear, Hitherto in my Name ye have asked nothing.

Isaiah 43.

Bruiserd. Where ye marvel (with what mind, I cannot tell) that I being a learned Man (as you say) am not delivered yet from the confuse Dungeon of Heresie through the help of the Gospel: much more do you, that are far better learned than I, cause me to marvel at your foolish admiration. Neither can I chafe but laugh at you as one being rapt to the third Heaven of such high mysteries, and yet see not those things which be done here in the lower parts of terrene Philosophy: for what a ridiculous thing is it for a Man to look so long upon the Sun, that he can see nothing else but the Sun, nor cannot tell whether to turn him? Moreover, what Student is there in all Cambridge, be he never so young, that knoweth not, that the argument of Authority, brought out negatively, hath no force?

Bilney. So as the Pharisees took Christ, you take my words, much otherwise than I meant.

Bruiserd. Your words, which wander far from the scope of Scripture, I do not like. What is in your meaning, and lieth inwardly in your mind, I cannot tell.

Bilney. Such as invoke the help either of Christ, or of any other Saint, for any corporal infirmity, to be delivered from the same, may be well remembered to delicate Patients, who being under the hand of Physicians, and having Medicines ministered against their Diseases, not abiding the pain thereof, rap all afunder: wherefore I say, no Man ought to implore the help of God, or of any Saint for corporal infirmity.

Bruiserd. O most pernicious and perilous Heresie of all that ever I have heard! Thus you flying the smoke, fall into the Fire, and, avoiding the danger of Scylla, you run upon Charibdis. O heart of Man wrapped in palpable darkness. I with, Master Bilney, that you would but once search and set out the first Origin of these Rogation days: For so we read in the Church-Story, that they were first Ordained by Pope Gregory, with Fasting, Prayers, and Holy Processions; against the Pestilence, by the infection of the air then reigning among the people.

At what time the people then going in the Procession, a certain Image like to our Blessed Lady, painted with the hands of St. Luke the Evangelist, did go before them, about the which Image, in the honour of the Virgin, Angels did sing this Anthem: Regina Celi letare, &c. O Queen of Heaven be glad. To the which Anthem, the Pope also adjoined this, Ora pro nobis Dominum, &c. Pray to the Lord for us. Wherefore, seeing the Angels did worship the Image of the glorious Virgin Mary, in the honour of her; and seeing moreover the Holy Father Pope Gregory, with all the Clergy, did pray for corporal infirmity, it appeareth manifestly that we ought to worship the Saints, and also to give honour in a manner to their Images: further also, to pray to Almighty God and all Saints for corporal infirmity, that we may be delivered from the same, so that they may say like for us, which is said in the Gospel, Send them away, because they cry after us. And although there be infinite places inexpressible to be alleged out of the Holy Scripture, wherewith we might easily refut this your Error: yet standing herewith content, as sufficient at this present, we will proceed now to your second peti- tious Error, wherein you, like an ingrate Child, go about to tear out the Bowels of your Mother. For in that you say and affirm blasphemously, The Bishop of Rome to be the very Antichrist, and that his priviledges have no force against the Gates of Hell: in so saying, what do you but like a most unkind and unnatural Child, spoil your loving Mother of all her Treasures, and wound her being spoiled, and being wounded pluck out her Bowels most miserably upon the Earth? But forasmuch as there is nothing so absurd, or so Heretical, but shall be received of some itching Ears: I would therefore now hear you declare, how he sitteth in the Temple of God, as God, being exalted and worshipped above all that is named God, or how he sheweth himself as Lord in power and signs, and wonders deceitful.

Bilney. Although incredulity doth not suffer you, notwithstanding your learning, to understand these things, yet I will go about something to help your incredulity herein, through the help of the Lord: beseeching you, that setting all superstition apart, you will understand those things that are above. Do ye know the Table of the Ten Com- mandments?

Brusford. According as the Catholick Doctors do ex- pound them, I know them meanly: But how you do ex- pound them, I cannot tell.

Bilney. And do you know also the Constitutions of Men, which are devised only by the Dreams of Men: wherunto Men are so fruitly bound, that under pain of death they are compelled to observe them?

Brusford. I know certain Sanctions of the holy Fa- thers, but such as you speak of to be devised by Mens dreams, I know none.

Bilney. Now then let us set and compare these two to- gether, and so shall you easily understand the Bishop of Rome, whom they call the Pope, to fit in the Temple of God, as God, and to be extolled above all that is Named God. It is written, The Temple of the Lord is holy, which is you. Therefore the Conscience of Man is the Temple of the Holy Ghost: in which Temple, I will prove the Pope to fit as God, and to be exalted above all that is called God. For who condemneth the Decalogue, or the Table of the Commandments of God, there is but a small punishment for him, neither is that punishment to death, but contrariwise, he that shall condemn or violate the Constitutions, which you call the Sanctions of Men, is counted by all Mens judgment guilty of death. What is this, but the high Bishop of Rome to sit and reign in the Temple of God; that is, in Mans Conscience, as God?

Brusford. Although this exposition seemeth unworthy for Christian Ears, yet I would hear you further how he sheweth himself in signs and wonders deceitful.

Bilney. These wonders (which they call Miracles) be wrought daily in the Church, not by the Power of God, as many think, but by the illusion of Satan rather, who (as the Scripture witnesseth) hath been loose now abroad Five hundred years, according as it is written in the Book of the Apocalypse, After a thousand years Satan shall be set loose, &c. Neither are they to be called Miracles of true Christian-men, but illusions rather, whereby to delude Mens minds, to make them put their Faith in our Lady, and in other Saints, and not in God alone, to whom be honour and glory for ever.

Brusford. * But that I believe and know that God and all his Saints will take everlasting revenge upon thee, for I would surely with these Nails of mine be thy death, for this horrible and enorm injury against the precious Blood of Christ. God faith, I will not be the death of a sinner, but rather that he convert and live. And thou blasphemest him, as though he should lay privy snares of death for us secretly, that we should not espy them. Which if it were true, we might well say with Hugh de Saint Victore in this manner: If it be an Error, it is of thee (O God) that we are deceived; for these be confirmed with such signs and wonders, which cannot be done but by thee. But I am assured it is untrue and heretical: and therefore I will leave this matter, and will talk with you concern- ing the merits of Saints. For once I remember, in a cer- tain Sermon of yours you said, That no Saint, though his suffering were never so great, and his life most pure, deserved any thing for us with God, either by his death or life. Which is contrary to St. Augustine.

Bilney. Christ faith one thing, St. Augustine another: Whether of these two shall we believe? For Christ wil- ling to deliver us out of this dark Dungeon of ignorance, gave forth a certain parable of Ten Virgins, of which five were Fools, and five were Wise. By the five foolish Virgins, wanting the Oil of good works, he meant us all sinners. By the five Virgins he meant the company of all Holy Saints. Now let us hear what the five wise Vir- gins answered to the five foolish, craving Oil of them; No (say they) lest peradventure we have not sufficient for us, and for you. Get you rather to them that sell, and buy of them to serve your turn.

Wherefore if they had not Oil sufficient for themselves and also for the other, where then be the merits of Saints wherewith they can deserve both for themselves and for us? certes I cannot see.

Brusford. You wrest the Scriptures from the right un- derstanding to a reprobate sense, that I am scarce able to hold mine Eyes from tears, hearing with mine Ears these words of you. Fare ye well.

¶ The submission of Master Thomas Bilney.

THE fourth day of December, the Bishop of London, with the other Bishops his assistants, assembled a- gain in the Chapter-house of Westminster: whither also Master Bilney was brought, and was exhorted and admo- nished to abjure and recant. Who answered, That he would stand to his Conscience. Then the Bishop of Lon- don, with the other Bishops, Ex Officio, did publish the Depositions of the Witnesses, with his Articles and An- swers, commanding that they should be read. That done, the Bishop exhorted him again to deliberate with him- self, whether he would return to the Church, and renounce his Opinions, or no, and bade him to depart into a void place, and thence deliberate with himself. Which done, the Bishop asked him again if he would return? Who answered, Erat justitia & judicium in nomine Domini. And being divers times admonished to abjure, he would make no other Answer, but, Erat justitia, &c. And, Hec est dies quem fecit Dominus, exultemus & letemur in eo. Then the Bishop after deliberation, put- ting off his Cap, said, In nomine Patris & Filii & Spi- ritus Sancti, Amen. Excusat Deus & dissipantur ini- mici ejus: and making a Cross on his Forehead and his Brest, by the counsel of the other Bishops, he gave sentence against M. Bilney, being there present, in this manner:

I, by the consent and counsel of my Brethren here pre- sent, do pronounce thee Thomas Bilney, who hast been accused of divers Articles, to be convict of Heretic; and for the rest of the sentence we take deliberation till to- morrow.

The fifth day of December the Bishops assembled there again: before whom Bilney was brought: whom the Bishop asked if he would yet return to the Unity of the Church, and revoke his Heresies which he had preached. Whereupon Bilney answered, That he would not be a slander to the Gospel, trusting that he was not separate from the Church; and that, if the multitude of Witnesses might be credited, he might have thirty Men of honest life on his part, against one to the contrary brought in a- gainst him: which Witnesses the Bishop said came too late; for after publication they could not be received by the Law. Then Bilney alleging the Story of Susan and Daniel, the Bishop of London still exhorted him to return to the Unity of the Church, and to abjure his Heresies, and permitted him to go into some secret place, there to consult with his Friends, till one of the Clock at the af- ternoon of the same day.

KING At Afternoon the Bishop of London again asked him whether he would return to the Church, and acknowledge his Heresies. Bilney answered, That he trusted he was not separate from the Church, and required time and place to bring in witnesses. Which was refused. Then the Bishop once again required of him, whether he would return to the Catholick Church. Whereunto he answered, That if they could teach and prove sufficiently, that he was convicted, he would yield and submit himself, and desired again to have time and space to bring in again his refused witnesses, and other answer he would give none.

Then the Bishop put Master Bilney aside, and took Counsel with his Fellows; and afterward called in Master Bilney, and asked him again whether he would abjure. But he would make no other answer than before. Then the Bishop, with the consent of the rest, did decree and determine, that it was not lawful to hear a petition which was against the Law: and inquiring again whether he would abjure, he answered plainly, No; and desired to have time to consult with his Friends, in whom his trust was. And being once again asked whether he would return, and infinitely desired thereunto, or else the Sentence must be read, he required the Bishop to give him licence to deliberate with himself until the next morrow, whether he might abjure the Heresies where-with he was defamed, or no. The Bishop granted him that he should have a little time to deliberate with Master Dan-caster. But Bilney required space till the next morrow, to consult with Master Farmer and Master Dan-caster. But the Bishop would not grant him his request, for fear lest he should appeal. But at the last the Bishop inclining unto him, granted him two nights respite to deliberate: that is to say, till Saturday at Nine of the clock afternoon, and then to give a plain determinate answer, what he would do in the premises.

The Seventh day of December, in the year and place aforesaid, the Bishop of London with the other Bishops being assembled, Bilney also personally appeared. Whom the Bishop of London asked, whether he would now return to the Unity of the Church, and revoke the Errors and Heresies whereof he stood accused, detected, and convicted. Who answered, that now he was persuaded by Master Dan-caster and other his Friends, he would submit himself, trusting that they would deal gently with him, both in his abjuration and penance. Then he desired that he might read his abjuration: which the Bishop granted. When he had read the same secretly by himself, and was returned, being demanded what he would do in these premises, he answered, That he would abjure and submit himself, and there openly read his abjuration, and subscribed, and delivered it to the Bishop: which then did absolve him, and for his penance enjoined him. That he should abide in prison appointed by the Cardinal, till he were by him released; and moreover, the next day he should go before the procession, in the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, bare-headed, with a Fagot on his shoulder, and should stand before the Preacher at Pauls Crois all the Sermon time.

Ex Regist. London.

Here forthwith as mention is made before of five Letters or Epistles, which this good Man wrote to Cuthbert Tonstall Bishop of London, and the said Bishop delivered unto the Registrars, we thought good to insert certain thereof, such as could come to our hands. The Copy of which Letters, as they were written by him in Latin, because they are in the former Edition to be seen, and read in the same Latin, wherein he wrote them, it shall suffice in this Book to expresse the same only in English. Concerning the first Epistle, which containeth the whole Story of his Conversion, and somewhat more effectual in the Latin, than in the English, we have exhibited it in the second Edition, and therefore here have only made mention of the same briefly. The Copy whereof beginneth thus.

Reverendo in Christo Patri D. Cuth. Tonstallo,

Hac nomine, Pater in Christo observande, longe beatorem me pater, quod ad tue Paternitatis excommunicationem vocari me coegit. Ea enim eruditione et vita integritate (quod omnes fatentur) ut ipseme non possis (alioquin advenarum in te dorum estimator non admodum magnificus) quoties tibi succurris, quantis tibi gratis feceris Deus in illius laudes non erumpere, ac tecum in corde tacitus exclamare, fecit mihi magna qui potens est, & sanctum nomen ejus. In talem nunc me iudicem incidiisse gratulor, ac Deo, qui moderatur omnia, gratiam pro viris habeo. Et quamquam (testis est mihi Deus) nullus in omnibus meis concionibus erroris mihi confusus sum, ne dum heresios aut falsitatis (quod calumniatur quidam, quæstus sui, quam animarum lucri avidiores) tamen supra modum lætor, divina (haud dubie) benignitate proviſum esse, ut ob veritatis testimonium ad Tonstalli tribunal fisterer: quia, si quis alius, optime novit, nunquam defuturus James ac Jambres, qui veritati resistunt: nunquam defuturus Elimates, qui conentur subvertere vias domini rectas: denique nunquam defuturus Demetrius, Pythionissus, Balaamos, Nicolaitas, Cairios, Iſmaeles, qui omnes, cum quæ sua sunt, non quæ Jesu Christi, avidissime sententur & querant, qui fieri potest ut Christum sincere ac simpliciter annuntium perferant? Nam si populus semel in Christum pro se passum solide ac pure considerare acceperit, ruerit mox in vere fideliū pectoribus, quæcumque balteus pro Christo amplexi sunt. Tunc intelligent non hic aut illic Christum esse, sed regnum Dei in semetipsis esse. Tunc intelligent patrem neque in montibus Samaria, neque Hierosolymis adorandum esse, sed in omni loco, in spiritu & veritate. Imo, si quis requirere velit, ac in causas Christi, unitatem dico fidei, errabundus reducere, mox insurgunt nomina Pastores, sed reverat upi, qui non aliud de græge, quam lac lanam, pellem, querunt: animas cum suis, tum gregis permittentes diabolo. Insurgunt inquam, ac Demetrii instar exclamant: Hic hereticus ubique suadet averſitque multam urbem, dicens, quod non sunt dii qui manibus sunt.

Hi sunt, hi (pater colende) sunt, qui, sub prætextu persequendi hereticos, ventris sui negotium agunt, inimici crucis Christi. Qui quidvis potius ferre possunt, quam puram Christi pro peccatis nostris crucifixi annunciationem. Hi sunt, quibus Christus eternam minatur damnationem, cum ait, Væ vobis Scribæ & Pharisei, Hypocritæ, qui clauditis regnum colorum ante homines: vos enim non intratis, nec introeuntes finitis intrare. Hi sunt, qui, cum ipsi aliunde ascenderunt, alio intrare non sinunt. Quod pater, quia si quis per me, inquit Christus, introierit, salvabitur, & ingreditur, & egredietur, & pascua inveniet: & hi non inveniant pascua (nunquam enim docent) & alios post se trahunt, ut non per Christum, qui solus est ostium per quod ad patrem pervenitur, sed aliunde per opuscula, quæ oculis, tactu nunquam Christo, suadent, proponunt & injungunt, ad sumum potius quæſum, quam animarum saluam spectantes: hoc deteriores, quam illi qui super Christum fundamentum adificanti lignum, fenum, stipulam. Ipsi sciuntur se Christum scire, sed factis negant. Denique hi sunt medici illi, in quos mulier illa, annis duodecim sanguinis profusio vexata, omnia sua consumperat, nec adjuvanti quicquam enſerent, sed deterius se habebat, donec vix tandem ad Christum venerat, quæ simulatque ſimbriam vestimenti ejus in fide tetigerat, sic sanabatur, ut statim in corpore id ipsum sentiret. O mutationem dexteræ excessi? quam ego miser peccator non semel sensi: qui tamen antea quam ad Christum venire potui, sic omnia mea in sumptum in ignaro medico, indocto confessionum auditore, ut parum mihi virium (alioqui natura imbecilli) reliquum fuerit. parum pecunie. ingenium item parum. Indicebant enim mihi jejunia, vigilias, indulgentiarum ac missarum emptiones, in quibus omnibus (ut nunc intelligo) sua potius querebant, quam salutem animæ meæ languenti.

Sed tandem de Jesu audiebam, nimirum tum, cum novum Testamentum primum ab Erasmo ederetur. Quod cum ab eo Latinus redditum accepi, Latinitate potius quam verbo Dei (quod tunc quidam esset prorsus nesciebam) alebatur, emebam, providentia (sine dubio) Divina, ut nunc interpretor. Incidi prima (ut memini) lectione in hanc (o mihi suavisimam Pauli sententiam) 1 ad

Hec una sententia, Deo intus in corde meo (quod tunc fieri ignorabam) docente, sic exilioravit pedes meos, prius peccatorum conscientia saucium ac pene desperandum, ut mox visus sum mihi, nescio quantum intus tranquillitatem sentire, adeo quod exultaverunt ossa humilifacto: in qua paulatim didici omnes meos conatus, omnia jejunia, omnes vigilias, omnes missarum indulgentiarum redemptiones quæ sine fiducia in Jesum (qui solus salvum facit populum suum a peccatis suis) fierent? didici, inquam, hæc omnia nihil aliud fuisse, quam (quod ait Augustinus) celerem cursum extra viam: quam perixomata illa scilicet, quibus Adam, & Eva reverenda olim sua frustra tegere conati sunt: Nunquam prius tranquillitatis quam promissioni Dei de Serpente capite, per mulieris semen Christum, ceterendo credidissent: Nec ego prius a peccatorum aculeis ac moribus sanari potui, quam a Deo doctus essem illum lectionem, de qua loquitur Christus, Johan. 3. Sicut Agnes exaltavit serpentem in deserto, ita exaltari oportet filium hominis: ut omnis qui credit in illum non pereat, sed habeat vitam æternam.

Hanc tandem sublimem lectionem, quam nullas docere potest nisi Deus qui hanc Petro revelavit, ubi pro modulo gratia Dei mihi data gustare capi, rogavi Dominum ut auget mihi fidem, ac tandem nihil magis optavi, quam ut, sic reddita mihi latius salutis (sui spiritus me suo utique confirmaret, ut virtute nonnulla donatus ex alto, docerem iniquas vias ejus, quæ sunt misericordia & veritas, ut impij ad ipsam, per me olim impium, converterentur. Quod dum pro virili conor apud R. D. Cardinalem, ac tuam Paternitatem, blasphematur in me (hæc est unica mihi in his tribulationibus fiducia) Christus, quam pro virili doceo, factum nobis a Deo Patre sapientiam, justitiam, sanctificationem, redemptionem denique & satisfactionem. Sed quoniam hanc esuriem ac sitim extinguere solet humane justitia saturitas, quam parat possimum opusculorum nostrorum electiorum fiducia, qualia sunt peregrinationes, veniarum redemptiones, cererorum oblationes, electa, a nobis jejunia, & interdum superstitiones, denique qualescunque (ut vocant) voluntariæ devotiones, contra quæ loqui-

The same in English.

¶ To the Reverend Father in Christ, Cuthbert Bishop of London, Thomas Bilney wishes health in Christ, with all submission due unto such a Prelate.

IN this behalf (Most reverend Father in Christ) I think my self most happy, that it is my chance to be called to examination before your Reverence, for that you are of such wisdom and learning, of such integrity of life (which all men do confesse to be in you) that even your self cannot chuse (if you do not too lightly esteem Gods gifts in you) as often as you shall remember the great things which God hath done unto you, but straightways secretly in your heart, to his high praise say, He that is mighty hath done great things unto me, and holy is his name. I rejoyce, that I have now happened upon such a Judge, and with all my heart give thanks unto God, which ruleth all things.

And albeit (God is my witness) I know not my self guilty of any error in my Sermons, neither of any Heretic or Sedition, which divers do slander me of, seeking rather their own lute and advantage, than the health of souls: Norwithstanding I do exceedingly rejoyce, that it is foreseen by Gods divine Providence, that I should be brought before the Tribunal Seat of Tonstall, who knoweth as well as any other, that there will never be wanting Jannes and Jambres, which will resist the truth; that there shall never be lacking some Elymas, which will go about to subvert the straight ways of the Lord; and finally, that some Demetrius, Pithomus, Balaams, Nicolaïtes, Cains, and Ismaels, will be always at hand, which will greedily hunt and seek after that which pertaineth unto themselves, and not that which pertaineth to Jesus Christ. How can it then be, that they can suffer Christ to be truly and sincerely preached? For if the people begin once wholly in every place to put their confidence in Christ, which was for them Crucified, then straightways that which they have hitherto embraced in stead of Christ, shall utterly decay in the hearts of the faithful. Then they shall understand that Christ is not in this place, or in that place, but the Kingdom of God to be in themselves. Then shall they plainly see, That the Father is not to be worshipped, neither in the Mount of Samaria, neither at Hierusalem, but in all places, in spirit and truth. Which thing if it come once to pass, the beasts of the field will think all their gain and labor lost. In whom the saying of Ezechiel is fulfilled: My Sheep are dispersed because they had no Shepherd, and are devoured of the beag of the field, and strayed abroad: my flock hath erred and wandered in every mountain, and upon every high bill, and is dispersed thorowout all the earth, and there is no man which hath sought to gather them together: no, there was no man which once sought after them: But if any Man would seek to reduce those which were gone astray into the Fold of Christ, that is, the unity of Faith, by and by there rise up certain against him, which are named Pastors, but indeed are Wolves, which seek no other thing of their Flock, but the Milk, Wool, and Fell, leaving both their own souls, and the souls of their Flock, unto the Devil.

Thefe

5 KING These Men, I say, rise up like unto Demetrius, crying out, This Heretick diswadeth and seduceth much people every where, saying: That they are not Gods which are made with hands. These are they, these I say (Most reverend Father) are they, which under the pretence of persecuting Hereticks, follow their own licentious life; enemies unto the Croſs of Chriſt; which can ſuffer and bear any thing rather than the ſincere Preaching of Chriſt Crucified for our ſins. These are they unto whom Chriſt threatneth eternal Damnation, where he ſaith, Who be unto you Scribes, Pharisees, and Hypocrites, which shut up the Kingdom of Heaven before Men, and you your selves enter not in, neither suffer those which would enter, to come in. These are they which have come in another way to the charge of ſouls, as it appeareth; For if any Man (ſaith Chriſt) come in by me, he shall be ſaved, and shall come in, and go out, and find Paſture. These Men do not find Paſture, for they never teach, and draw others after them, that they ſhould not enter by Chriſt, which alone is the door whereby we muſt come unto the Father; but ſet before the people an other way, perſwading them to come unto God through good works, oftentimes ſpeaking nothing at all of Chriſt, thereby ſeeking rather their own gain and lucre, than the ſalvation of ſouls. In this point being worſe than they which upon Chriſt (being the foundation) do build Wood, Hay and Straw. These Men confeſs that they know Chriſt, but by their deeds they deny him.

Faſt Priests and Pre- These are theſe Phyſicians upon whom that Woman which was Twelve years vexed with the bloody flux, had conſumed all that the had, and felt no help, but was ſill worſe and worſe, until ſuch time as at the laſt the came unto Chriſt; and after the had once touched the hem of his Veſture, through Faith, the was ſo healed, that by and by the felt the ſame in her body. O mighty Power of the moſt Highſt; which I alſo miſerable ſinner have often taſted and felt. Which before that I could come unto Chriſt, had even likewiſe ſpent all that I had upon thoſe ignorant Phyſicians, that is to ſay, unlearned hearers of confeſſion, ſo that there was but ſmall force of ſtrength left in me, (which of nature was but weak) ſmall ſtore of Money, and very little wit or underſtanding; for they appointed the ſaſtings, watching, buying of Pardons, and Maſſes; in all which things (as I now underſtand) they fought rather their own gain, than the ſalvation of my ſick and languishing ſoul.

The ſeeth execution of Mr. Bilney by reading the New Teſtament out by Erasmus. But as the laſt I heard ſpeak of Jeſus, even then when the New Teſtament was firſt let forth by Erasmus. Which when I underſtood to be eloquently done by him, being allured rather for the Latin than for the Word of God, (for at that time I knew not what it meant) I bought it even by the Providence of God, as I do now well underſtand and perceive: And at the firſt reading (as I well remember) I chanced upon this ſentence of Saint Paul (O moſt ſweet and comfortable ſentence to my ſoul) in his firſt Epistle to Timothy, and firſt Chapter; It is a true ſaying, and worthy of all men to be embraced, that Chriſt Jeſus came into the world to ſave ſinners, of whom I am the chief and principal. This ſentence, through Gods inſtruction and inward working, which I did not then perceive, did ſo exhilarate my heart, being before wounded with the guilt of my ſins, and being almoſt in deſpair, that immediately I felt a marvelous comfort and quietneſs, inſomuch that my bruised Bones leapt for joy.

Pſal. 50. After this, the Scripture began to be more pleaſant unto me than the honey or the honey Comb. Wherein I learned, that all my travel, all my ſaſting and watching, all the redemption of Maſſes and Pardons, being done without truth in Chriſt, which only ſaveth his people from their ſins; theſe, I ſay, I learned to be nothing else but even (as Saint Augustine ſaith) a halſy and ſwift running out of the right way, or elſe much like to the Veſture made of Fig-leaves, wherewithal Adam and Eve went about in vain to cover their privities; and could never before obtain quietneſs and reſt, until they believed in the promiſe of God, that Chriſt, the Seed of the Woman, ſhould tread upon the Serpents head. Neither could I believe or caſed of the ſharp ſtings and bitings of my ſins, before I was taught of God that Leſſon which Chriſt ſpeaketh of in the third Chapter of John: Even as Moſes exalted the Serpent in the Deſert, ſo ſhall the Son of Man be exalted, that all which believe on him, ſhould not periſh, but have life everlaſting.

As ſoon as (according to the measure of grace given unto me of God) I began to taſte and favor of this heavenly Leſſon, which no Man can teach but only God, which revealed the ſame unto Peter; I desired the Lord to increaſe my Faith: and at laſt I deſired nothing more, than that I, being ſo comforted by him, might be ſtrengthened by his holy Spirit and grace from above, that I might teach the wicked his ways, which are mercy and truth, and that the wicked might be converted unto him by me, which ſometime was alſo wicked. Which thing, whileſt that with all my Power I did endeavour before my Lord Cardinal and your Fatherhood, Chriſt was blaſphemed in me (and this is my only comfort in theſe my afflictions) whom with my whole power I do teach and ſet forth, being made for us by God his Father, our wiſdom, righteouſneſs, ſanctification, and redemption, and finally our ſatisfaction. Who was made ſin for us (that is to ſay, a ſacrifice for ſin) that we through him ſhould be made the righteouſneſs of God. Who became accuſed for us, to redeem us from the Curſe of the Law. Who alſo came not to call the righteous, but ſinners to repentance. The righteous (I ſay) which falſly judge and think themſelves ſo to be, (for all Men have ſinned, and lack the glory of God, whereby he freely forgiveſh ſins unto all believers, through the redemption which is in Chriſt Jeſus) becauſe that all mankind was grievouſly wounded in him which fell amoſt Thieves between Hieruſalem and Jericho.

And therefore with all my whole power I teach, that all Men ſhould firſt acknowledge their ſins, and condemn them, afterward hunger and thirſt for that righteouſneſs whereof Saint Paul ſpeaketh, The righteouſneſs of God, by faith in Jeſus Chriſt, is upon all them which believe in him; for there is no difference, all have ſinned, and lack the glory of God, and are juſtified freely through his grace, by the redemption which is in Jeſus Chriſt. The which whoſoever doth hunger or thirſt for, without doubt they ſhall at the length ſo be ſatiſfied, that they ſhall not hunger and thirſt for ever.

But ſoſomuch as this hunger and thirſt was wont to be quenched with the ſubſtance of mans righteouſneſs, which is wrought through the Faith of our own elect and choſen Works, as Pilgrimages, buying of Pardons, offering of Candles, elect and choſen Faſts, and oftentimes ſuperſtitious, and finally all kind of voluntary devotions (as they call them) againſt the which Gods Word ſpeaketh plainly in the fourth of Deuteronomie, and in the Deut. 4th twelfth, ſaying, Thou ſhalt not do that which ſeemeth good unto thy ſelf, but that which I command thee for to do, that do thou, neither adding to, neither diminiſhing any thing from it. Therefore (I ſay) oftentimes have I ſpoken of theſe Works; not condemning them (as God I take to my witneſs) but reproving their abuſe, making the lawful uſe of them manifeſt even unto Children, exhorting all Men not ſo to cleave unto them, that they being ſatiſfied therewith, ſhould loath or wax weary of Chriſt, as many do. In whom I bid your Fatherhood moſt proſperouſly well to fare.

And this is the whole ſum. If you will appoint me to dilate more at large the things here touched, I will not reſuſe to do it, ſo that you will grant me time. For to do it out of hand I am not able for the weakneſs of my body; being ready always, if I have erred in anything, to be better inſtructed.

Another Letter or Epistle of Maſter Bilney; to Cuthbert Tonſtal, Biſhop of London.

Albeit I do not remember, Reverend Father in Chriſt, whether I have either ſpoken or written, that the Goſpel hath not been ſincerely Preached now of long time, which your Lordſhip ſeemeth to have gathered either by ſome Monks and ſuſtainer hearers of my Sermons, who (like Malchus having their right ear cut off) only bring their left ear to Sermons; or elſe by ſome Words or Writings of mine, which have raſhly paſſed me, rather than upon any intent; yet ſoſomuch as in this behalf behalf your reverence doth command me, and that of a good mind I trust (for how can I think in Tonstall any craft or doubleness to dwell) I will briefly decline unto you what I have learned of God, through Christ, in the Scriptures, and how that the Doctors, even of great name and renown, have not taught the same of hite in their Sermons; referring, or rather submitting all things unto your fatherly judgment, which is more quick and sharp than that it can by any means be blinded, and so sincere, that it will not in any point seek slander or discord; therefore I do confess that I have often been afraid, that Christ hath not been purely preached now a long time. For who hath been now a long season offended through him? Who hath now these many years suffered any persecution for the Gospels sake? Where is the Sword which he came to send upon the Earth? And finally, where are the rest of the sincere and uncorrupt Fruits of the Gospel? Which, because we have not a long time seen, is it not to be feared, that the Tree which bringeth forth those fruits hath now a long time been wanting in our Region or Country? Much less is it to be believed, that it hath been nourished amongst us. Have we not seen all things quiet and peaceable a long time? But what faith the Church? My grief most bitter is turned to peace.

But the malignant Church faith, Peace peace and Jer. 68. there is no peace, but only that whereof it is written, When Luke 11. the mighty armed man keepeth his gates, he possesseth all things in quiet. But when he seeth that he shall be vanquished of a stronger than he himself is, he spoileth and destroyeth all things. What now a days beginneth again to be attempted, I dare not say. God grant us grace that we do not refuse and reject (if it be Christ) him that cometh unto us, lest that we do feel that terrible judgment against us: because (saith he) they have not received the love of truth, that they might be saved: therefore God will send upon them the blindness of error, that they shall give credit unto lies. O terrible sentence (which God knoweth whether a great number have not already incurred) that all they might be judged which have not given credit unto the truth, but consented unto iniquity. The time shall come (saith he) when that they will not suffer the true doctrine to be preached. And what shall we then say of that learning, which hath now so long time reigned and triumphed, so that no man hath once opened his mouth against it? Shall we think it sound Doctrine? Truly Iniquity did never more abound, nor Charity was never so could. And what should we say to be the cause thereof? hath the cause been for lack of preaching against the vices of Men, and exhorting to charity? That cannot be, for many learned and great Clerks sufficiently can witness to the contrary. And yet all these notwithstanding, we see the life and manners of Men do greatly degenerate from true Christianity, and seem to cry out indeed, that it is fulfilled in us, which God in times past threatened by his Prophet Amos, saying, Behold the day shall come (saith the Lord) that I will send hunger upon the earth, not hunger of bread, neither thirst of water, but of hearing the word of God, and the people shall be moved from sea to sea, and from the West unto the East, and shall run about seeking for the Word of God, but shall not find it. In those days the fair Virgins and young Men shall perish for thirst, &c. But now to pass over many things, whereby I am moved to fear the Word of God hath not been purely preached; this is not the least argument, that they which come, and are sent, and endeavour themselves to preach Christ truly, are evil spoken of for his name, which is the rock of offence, and stumbling block unto them which stumble upon his word, and do not believe on him, on whom they are builded.

But you will ask, who are those Men, and what is their Doctrine? Truly I say, whosoever entred in by the door Christ into the Sheepfold, which thing all such shall do as seek nothing else but the glory of God, and salvation of souls. Of all such it may be truly said, that whom the Lord sendeth, he speaketh the Word of God. And why so? Because he representeth the Angel of the Church of Philadelphia unto whom Saint John writeth saying,

This, saith he, which is holy and true, which hath the keys of David, which openeth and no man shutteth, shutteth and no man openeth. Behold, saith he, speaking in the name of Christ, (which is the Door and Door-keeper) I have left before thee an open Door, that is to say, of the Scriptures opening thy senses, that thou shouldst understand the Scriptures, and that because thou hast entred in by me which am the Door: For whosoever entred in by me, which am the Door, shall be saved, he shall go in and come out and find pasture, for the Door-keeper openeth the door unto him, and the sheep hear his voice: But contrariwise, they which have not entred in by the Door, but have climbed in some other way, by ambition, avarice, or desire of rule, they shall even in a moment go down into Hell, except they repent. And of them is the saying of Jeremy verified, All beauty is gone away from the Daughter of Sion, because her Princes are become like Rams, not finding pasture. And why so? Because like Thieves and Robbers they have climbed up another way, not being called in for such.

And what marvel is it, if they do not preach, when as they are not sent, but run for hire, seeking their own glory, and not the glory of God, and salvation of souls? And this is the root of all mischief in the Church, that they are not sent inwardly of God. For without this inward calling it helpeth nothing before God, to be a hundred times elected and consecrated by a thousand Bulls, either by Pope, King, or Emperor. God beholdeth the heart, whole judgments are according to truth, howsoever we deceive the judgment of Men for a time: which also at the last shall see their abomination. This, I say, is the original of all mischief in the Church, that we thrust in our selves into the charge of souls, whose salvation and the glory of God (which is to enter in by the Door) we do not thirst nor seek for, but altogether our own lucre and profit.

Hereupon it cometh, that we know not how to preach Christ purely: For how should they preach Christ (saith the Apostle) except they be sent? for otherwise many Thieves and Robbers do preach him, but with their Lips only, for their heart is far from him. Neither yet do we suffer those which do know how to preach, but persecute them, and go about to oppress the Scriptures now springing, under the pretence of godliness, fearing, as I suppose, lest the Romans should come and take our place. Ah! thou wicked enemy Herod, why art thou afraid that Christ should come: He taketh not away mortal and earthly Kingdoms, which giveeth heavenly Kingdoms O blindness! O our great blindness! ye, more than that of Egypt. Of the which if there be any that would admonish the people, by and by saith Pharaoh, Moses and Aaron, why do ye cause the people to cease from their labours? And truly called their labours. Get you to your burthens. Lay more work upon them, and cause them to do it, that they bearken not unto lies. Thus the people was dispersed throughout all the Land of Egypt, to gather up Chaff, I say to gather up Chaff. Who shall grant unto us, that God shall say, I have looked down and beheld the affliction of my people which is in Egypt, and have heard their sighs, and am come down to deliver them? But whether hath this zeal carried me? whether after knowledge or not, I dare not say: it appertaineth to you, reverend Father, to judge thereupon.

Now you do look that I should shew unto you at large (as you write) how that they ought sincerely to preach, to the better edifying hereafter of your flock. Here I confess, I was afraid that you had spoken in some derision, until that I well perceived that you had written it with your own hand. Then again I began to doubt, for what intent Tonstall should require that of Bilney: an old Souldier, of a young beginner: the chief Pastor of London, of a poor silly Sheep. But for what intent forever you did it, I trust it was of a good mind. And albeit that I am weak of body, yet through the grace of Christ given unto me, I will attempt this matter, although it do far pass my power. Under the which burthen if I be oppressed, yet I will not deceive you, for that I have promised nothing but a prompt and ready will to do that which you have commanded.

As touching that pertaineth to the preaching of the Gospel, I would to God you would give me leave privately to talk with you, that I might speak freely that which I have learned in the holy Scriptures for the consolation of my conscience : which if you will do, I trust you shall not repent you. All things shall be submitted unto your judgment : who (except I be utterly deceived) will not break the reed that is bruised and put out the flax that is smoking ; but rather if I shall be found in any error (as indeed I am a man) you, as spiritual, shall restore me through the spirit of gentleness, considering your self, lest that you also be tempted : For every Bishop, which is taken from among men, is ordained for men, not violently to assault those which are ignorant, and do err, for he himself is compassed in with infirmity, that he, being not void of evils, should learn to have compassion upon other miserable people.

I desire you that you will remember me to morrow, that by your aid I may be brought before the Tribunal fear of my Lord Cardinal ; before whom I had rather stand than before any of his Deputies.

Yours Tho. Bilney.

A Letter of Master Bilney, fruitful and necessary for all Ministers to read.

MOST reverend Father, salutations in Christ. You have required me to write to you at large, wherein Men have not preached as they ought, and how they should have preached better. This is a burthen too heavy for my strength, under the which I faint, it belongeth to you, which have laid this burthen upon my shoulders, to ease me thereof. As touching the first part, they have not preached as they ought, which, leaving the Word of God, have taught their own Traditions ; of the which sort there are not a few, as it is very evident, in that they do report those, which preach the Word of God finely, to teach new Doctrine. This is also no small Testimony thereof, that in all England you shall scarce find one or two, that are mighty in the Scriptures ; and what marvel is it if all godly things do seem new unto them unto whom the Gospel is new and strange, being null in Mens traditions now a long time ? Would to God these things were not true which I utter unto you ; but alas they are too true.

They have also preached evil, which either have wrested the Scriptures themselves, or have rashly gathered them out of old rotten Papers, being wrested by others : and how should it be but that they should wrest them, or else how should they judge them, being fully interpreted by others when as they have not once read over the Bible orderly ? Of this sort there is truly a very great number, from which number many great Rabbins or Masters shall hardly excuse themselves ; whom the people have hitherto revered in stead of Gods. And these are they which now serve their bellies, seeking their own glory, and not the true glory of God, which might be set forth even by Balaams Ass : much less then ought we to condemn such abjects which preach the Word of God.

We have (saith Saint Paul) this treasure in brittle Vessels, that the glory of the power might be of God, and not of us. God hath chosen the foolish things of the world, to confound the wise ; and the weak things God hath chosen to confound the mighty, and vile things of the world, and despised hath he chosen, and things that are not, to bring to nought things that are, that no flesh should glory in his sight. But now all men in a manner will be wise, and therefore they are ashamed of the simple Gospel, they are ashamed truly to say with Paul, and to perform it indeed.

I Brethren when I came unto you did not come with excellency of words, or of wisdom, preaching the Testimony of Christ ; for I esteemed not my self to know any thing among you, but only Jesus Christ, and him crucified. O the voice of a true Evangelist ! But now we are ashamed of this foolish preaching, by the which it hath pleased God to save all those which believe in him : and being puffed up with our own fleshy mind, we chuse rather proudly to walk in those things which we have not seen, preaching Fables and Lies, and not the Law of God, which is manifestly converting souls.

But how should they teach the Law of God, which they have not once read in the Book, much less learned, at the mouth of God ? But in a Pastor and a Bishop this is required, Thou son of man (saith God) lay up in thy heart all my words which I do speak unto thee. And shortly after he saith : Thou son of man, I have ordained and given thee a watch-man unto the house of Israel : I have given thee, saith he, not coming in by ambition, nor thrusting in thy self, nor climbing in another way, but I gave thee when thou lookedst not for it, that thou shouldst attend thereupon, and give warning from the top of the Watch-tower, if any enemies should approach. I have given thee unto the house of Israel, and not the house of Israel unto thee, that thou shouldst acknowledge thy self to be the servant of the Sheep, and not their Lord ; for I have not given the Sheep for the Shepherd, but the Shepherd for the Sheep. He that sitteth down is greater than he that doth minister and serve unto him. Which thing was well known of him which truly said, We are your servants for Christs cause.

But for what purpose have I given thee unto the house of Israel ? That thou shouldst only minister the Sacraments, consecrate Wood, Stones, and Church-yards ? (This I take God to witness, with great sighs and groans I write unto you, pouring out before you the grief of my heart.) No truly. What then ? First followeth the Office of the Bishop, Thou shalt bear the word out of my mouth. This is but a short Lesson, but such as all the World cannot comprehend, without they be inwardly taught of God.

And what else meaneth this, Out of my mouth thou shalt bear the word, but that thou shalt be taught of God. Therefore as many as are not taught of God, although they be never so well exercised in the Scriptures by Mans help, yet are they not Watch-men given by God, and much less they which do not understand and know the Scriptures. And therefore such as these be, left they should keep silence, and say nothing, are always harping upon the traditions and doings of Men, that is, lies : for he that speaketh of himself speaketh lies. Of this it is written, They would be Doctors of the Law, not understanding what they speak, neither of whom they speak. Such of necessity they must all be, who speak that with their mouth, which they do not believe, because they are not inwardly taught of God, neither are persuaded in their hearts that it is true : and therefore they boast themselves to be Shepherds. But contrariwise, touching the true and learned Pastors, given by God, it may be truly said, We speak that which we know, and that which we have seen (even with the infallible eyes of our faith) we do witness : and these are neither deceived, neither do deceive. Moreover, the deceivers proceed to worse and worse, erring themselves, and bringing others also to error, and because they are of the world, the world doth willingly hear him. They are of the world (saith Saint John) and therefore they speak those things which are of the world, and the world loveth ear unto them.

Behold Reverend Father, this is the Touchstone of our daily preaching. Hadst not the world given ear unto them now a long time with great pleasure and delight ? But the flesh could never suffer the preaching of the Cross, nor yet the wisdom of the flesh, which is enemy unto God, neither is subject unto his Law nor cannot be. And why then are they accused to be Hereticks and Schismatics, which will not seek to please Men, but only to their edifying ? being mindful of that place of Scripture, God hath dispersed the bones of them which please men, saying unto them, Speak unto us pleasant things. But now letting these matters pass, we will come unto the second point, wherein you ask how a man should preach better ? Forsooth, if we had heard him of whom the Father spake, saying, This is my dearly beloved Son in whom I am well pleased, hear him. Who also, speaking of himself, said unto him that was with him, that Christ should suffer and rise again the third day from death, and that in his name repentance and remission of sins should be preached unto all people. What other thing is that, than the same which the other Evangelists do write ? Go ye in the whole world and preach the Gospel unto every creature : he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, what can be more pleasant, sweet, or acceptable unto afflicted consciences being almost in despair, than these most joyfull tidings ?

God giveth pastors to his flock, and not his flock to pastors. The congregation lieth down ; The pastors be not first-born. Pastors serve unto the Congregation for Christs cause, and not matters.

But here, whether Christ have been a long time heard, I know not, for that I have not heard all the Preachers of England, and if I had heard them, yet till it was within this year or two, I could not sufficiently judge of them. But this I dare be bold to affirm, that as many as I have heard of late Preach (I speak even of the most famous) they have preached such Repentance, that if I had heard such Preachers of Repentance in times past, I should utterly have been in despair. And to speak of one of those famous men (not uttering his Name) after he had sharply inveighed against Vice (wherein he pleased every godly man, inasmuch as it could not be sufficiently cried out upon) he concluded, Behold, said he, thou hast been rotten in thine own lusts, by the space of these sixty years, even as a Beast in his own dung, and wilt thou presume in one year to go forward toward Heaven, and that in thine age, as much as thou wast backward from Heaven toward Hell in sixty years? Is not this think you a goodly argument? Is this the preaching of Repentance in the Name of Jesus? or rather to tread down Christ with Antichrist's Doctrine? For what other thing did he speak in effect, than that Christ died in vain for thee? He will not be thy Jesus or Saviour, thou must make satisfaction for thy self, or else thou shalt perish eternally. Then doth Saint John lye, which saith, Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the World. And in another place, His blood hath cleansed us from all our sins. And again, He is the propitiation for the sins of the whole World. Besides an infinite number of other places. What other thing is this, than that which was spoken by the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of Peter, saying, There shall be false Teachers that shall deny the Lord Jesus, which hath redeemed them? And what followeth upon such Doctrine of Devils speaking lyes through Hypocrite? A Conscience undoing and without all hope, and so given over unto all wicked lusts, according to the saying of Saint Paul, After that they be come to this point, that they sorrow no more, they give themselves over unto wantonness, to commit all kind of filthiness, even with greedy desire. For seeing that it is impossible for them to make satisfaction to God, either they murmur against God, or else they do not believe him to be so cruel as they do preach and declare him to be. The want of Paper will not suffer me to write any more, and I had rather to speak it in private talk unto you self. Whereunto if you would admit, I trust you shall not repent you thereof; and unto me (Christ I take to my witness) it would be a great comfort, in whom I wish you, with all your Flock, heartily well to fare.

Your Prisoner and humble Beadman, unto God for you, Tho. Bilney.

Bilney call down with Repentance.

Ex Latim. Ser. 7.

Thus have you the Letters, the Abjuration, and Articles of Thomas Bilney. After which Abjuration made, about the year of our Lord, 1529, the said Bilney took such repentance and sorrow, that he was near the point of utter despair; as by the words of Master Latimer is credibly testified; whose words, for my better discharge, I thought here to annex, written in his seventh Sermon preached before King Edward, which be these, I knew a man my self, Bilney, little Bilney, that blessed Martyr of God, who what time he had born his fagot, and was come again to Cambridge, had such conflicts within himself (beholding thus Image of death) that his Friends were afraid to let him be alone. They were fain to be with him day and night, and comfort him as they could, but no Comforts would serve. And as for the comfortable places of Scripture, to bring them unto him, it was as though a man should run him through the heart with a Sword. Yet for all this he was revived, and took his death patiently, and died well against the tyrannical See of Rome. See Latim. Sermon 7.

Again, the said Master Latimer, speaking of Bilney in another of his Sermons preached in Lincolnshire, hath these words following, That same Master Bilney, which was burnt here in England for Gods Word sake, was induced and persuaded by his Friends to bear a fagot at the time when the Cardinal was alive, and bear the swinge. Now when the same Bilney came to Cambridge again, a whole year after, he was in such an anguish and agony, that nothing did him good, neither eating nor drinking, nor any other Communication of Gods Word; for he thought that all the whole Scriptures were against him, and sounded to his Condemnation. So that I many a time communed with him, (for I was familiarly acquainted with him) but all things whatsoever any man could alledge to his comfort seemed to him to make against him. Yet for all that afterward he came again; God induced him with such strength and perfectness of Faith, that he not only confessed his Faith in the Gospel of our Saviour Jesus Christ, but also suffered his Body to be burned for that same Gospel sake which we now preach in England, &c. See file Ser. 8, fol. 132.

Furthermore, in the first Sermon of the said Mr. Latimer before the Dutches of Suffolk, fol. 5, he yet speaking more of Bilney, inenteth as followeth, Here I have (said he) occasion to tell you a story which happened at Cambridge. Master Bilney, or rather Saint Bilney, that suffered death for Gods Word sake, the same Bilney was the instrument whereby God called me to knowledge. For I may thank him, next to God, for that knowledge that I have in the Word of God: For I was as obstinate a Papist as any was in England; inasmuch that when I should be made Bachelor of Divinity, my whole Oration went against Philip Melancthon, and against his Opinions. Bilney heard me at that time, and perceived that I was zealous without knowledge, and came to me afterward in my study, and desired me for Gods sake to bear his Confession. I did so: and (to say the truth) by his Confession I learned more than afore in many years. So from that time forward I began to smell the Word of God, and forsoke the School-Doctors and such fooleries, &c. And much more he hath of the same matter, which ye may see hereafter in the life of Master Latimer.

By this it appeareth how vehemently this good man was pierced with sorrow and remorse for his Abjuration, the space almost of two years; that is, from the year 1529, to the year 1531. It followed then that he, by Gods Grace and good Council, came at length to some quiet conscience, being fully resolved to give over his life for the confession of that Truth which before he had renounced. And thus being fully determined in his mind, and setting his time, he took his leave in Trinity-Hall, at Ten of the Clock at night, of certain of his Friends, and said, That he would go to Hierusalem, al-luding belike to the words and example of Christ in the Gospel, going up to Hierusalem, what time he was appointed to suffer his Passion. And so Bilney, meaning to give over his life for the Testimony of Christs Gospel, told his Friends that he would go up to Hierusalem, and so would see them no more: and immediately departed to Norfolk, and there preached first privily in Houtholds, to confirm the Brethren and Sisters, and also to confirm the Ancestors whom he had converted to Christ. Then preached he openly in the Fields, confessing his Faith, and preaching publicly the Doctrine which he before had abjured, to be the very truth, and willed all men to beware by him, and never to trust to their fleshly Friends in causes of Religion. And so, setting forward in his Journey toward the Celestial Hierusalem, he departed from thence to the Ancestors in Norwich, and there gave her a new Testament of Tindals Translation, and the obedience of a Christian man; whereupon he was apprehended and carried to Prison, there to remain till the blind Bishop Nix sent up for a Writ to burn him.

In the mean season, the Friars and religious men, with Four Orders of Friars, the Friars of the Order of St. Francis, the Friars of the Order of St. Dominick, the Friars of the Order of St. Augustine, and the Friars of the Order of St. Bernard, the residue of their Doctors Civil and Canon referred to him, busily labouring to persuade him, not to die in those Opinions, saying, He should be damned Body and Soul if he so continued. Among whom, first were sent to him of the Bishop, Doctor Call, Minister (as they call him) or Provincial of the Gray-Friers: and Doctor Stokes an Augustine-Friar, who lay with him in prison in Disputation, till the Writ came that he should be burned. Doctor Call by the Word of God, through the means of Bilneys Doctrine and good Life, whereof he had good experience, was somewhat reclaimed to the Gospel side. Bilney, Doctor Stokes remained obdurate, and doth yet to this day; whose heart also the Lord (if it be his will) reform, and KING and open the eyes of his old age, that he may forsake the former blindness of his youth. Another great Doer against him was one Frier Bird with one eye, Provincial of the White-Friers. This Bird was a Suffragan in Coventry, and after Bishop of Chester, and was he that brought Apples to Bowmer mentioned in the story of Haukes. Another was a Black-Frier, called Hodgekins, who after being under the Archbishop of Canterbury, married, and afterward in Queen Maries time put away his Wife. These four Orders of Friers were sent (as is said) to bait Bilney: who notwithstanding, as he had planted himself upon the firm Rock of Gods Word, was at a point, and so continued unto the end.

But here now cometh in Sir Thomas More trumping in our way, with his painted Card, and would needs take up this Thomas Bilney from us, and make him a Convert after his Seck. Thus these coated-Cards, though they could not by plain Scriptures convince him being alive: yet now after his death, by false play they will make him theirs whether he will or no. This Sir Thomas More, in his railing Preface before his Book against Tindal, doth challenge Bilney to his Cathelick Church, and faith, That not only at the fire, but many days before, both in words and writing, he revoked, abhorred, and detested his Heresies before holden. And how is this proved? By three or four mighty arguments, as big as Mill-polls, set out of Eutopia, from whence, thou must know Reader, can come no Fictions, but all fine Poetry.

First he faith, That certain Norwich-men writing to London, and denying that Bilney did recant; afterward being thereupon examined, were compelled to grant, that he at his Examination read a Bill, but what it was they could not tell; for they stood not so near to hear him. And albeit they stood not so near, yet some of them perceived certain things there spoken, whereby they thought that he did revoke. Some again added to those things spoken, certain additions of their own, to excuse him from recantation.

First, To answer hereunto, and to try out this matter somewhat roundly with Master More, let us see with what conveyance he proceeded in his Narration. At his first Examination (faith he) he waxed stiff in his Opinions, but yet God was so good a Lord unto him, that he was fully converted to the true Catholick Faith, &c. And when might this goodly Conversion begin? Many days (quoth he) before his burning. Here is no certain day assigned, but many days laid large, that he might have the larger room to walk invisible. Well then, but how many days these could be I would fain learn of Master More, when he was not many days in their hands, no longer than they could lend up to London for a Writ to burn him. Believe then shortly after his apprehension, at the first coming of the Friers unto him by and by he revolved. A strange matter, that he which two years before had lain in such a burning hell of despair for his first Abjuration, and could find no other comfort but only in returning to the same Doctrine again which before he had denied, utterly resigning himself over to death, and taking his leave of his Friends, and setting his face with Christ purposely to go to Hierusalem, voluntarily there to fall into the hands of the Scribes and Pharisees for that Doctrine fake, should now so soon, even at the first brunt, give over to the contrary Doctrine again. It is not like. God was so good a Lord unto him, faith Master More. That God was a good Lord unto him, very true it is. But that God did so turn him indeed, to be a Member of that Romish-Church, that hath not Master More yet sufficiently proved. To affirm without proof or demonstration in matters of story, it is not sufficient. But what hath been done indeed, that must be proved by good evidence and special demonstration of Witnesses, that we may certainly know it so to be.

It followeth moreover in Master More. And there lacked not some (faith he) that were sorry for it. No doubt, but if our Bilney had so relented, some would have been sorry therefor. But what one man in all this sum, in all Norwich, was sorry; that Master More must specify unto us before we believe him: so well are we acquainted with his Poetical Fictions. But how else should this Narration of Master More seem to run without probability, if it were not watered with such additions? He addeth moreover, and faith, And some wrote out of Norwich to London, that he had not revoked his Heresies at all, but still did abide in them. This foundeth rather to come more near to a truth. And here is a knack of Simons Art, to enterlard a Tale of untruth with some parcel of truth now and then among, that some things being found true may win credit to the rest which is utterly false. And why then be not the Letters of these Norwich-men believed, for the not recanting of Bilney? Because, faith he, afterward they being called to examination, it was there proved plainly to their faces, that Bilney revoked. By whom was it proved? By those, faith he, which at his execution stood by, and heard him read his Revocation himself, &c. What men were these? or what were their name? or what was any one mans name in all the City of Norwich, that heard Bilney recant? There Master More will give us leave to seek them out if we can, for he can name us none. Well, and why could not the other part hear Bilney read his Revocation as well as these? Because, faith More, he read so softly, that they could not hear him.

Well all this admitted, that Bilney read his Revocation so softly, that some could hear, some could not hear him, then this would be known, what was the cause why Bilney read his Revocation so softly? which much needs be either for lack of good will to read, or good voice to utter. If good will were absent in reading that Revocation, then it appeareth that he recanted against his own mind and conscience. If it were by imbecillity of voice and utterance, then how followeth it Master More, in this your Narration, where you say, That the said persons, which could not hear him read the Bill, yet notwithstanding could hear him rehearse certain other things spoken by him the same time at the fire, whereby they could not but perceive well, that he revoked his Errors, &c. Ah Master More, for all your powder of experience, do ye think to cast such a mist before mens eyes, that we cannot see how you juggle with truth, and take you tardy in your own Narration? unless peradventure you will excuse your self, per licentiam Poeticam, after the Privilege of Poets and Painters: for you know the old liberty of these two,

Pictoribus atque Poetis,

Qualibet audendi semper fuit aequa potestas.

Now if this vein of yours, which so extremely railleth and fareth against the poor Martyrs and Servants of Christ, be so copious, that you dare take in hand any false matter to prove, and to make men believe that Bilney died a Papist, yet the manner of handling hereof would have required some more artificial Conveyance: Mendacem enim (ut scis) memorem esse oportet: that men, although they see the matter to be false, yet might commend the workmanship of the handler, which (to say the truth) neither hangeth with it self, nor beareth any semblance of any truth. But because Master More is gone and dead, I will cease any further to insult upon him, lest I may seem to incur the same vice of his in morando mortuus. Yet forso much as his Books be not yet dead, but remain alive to the hurt of many, having therefore to do, not with him, but with his Book-Disciples, this would I know, how hangeth this gear together: Bilney was heard, and yet not heard, he spake softly, and yet not softly? Some said he did recant, some said he did not recant? Over and besides, how will this be answered; that forso much as the said Bilney (as he faith) revoked many days before his burning, and the same was known to him at London, then how chanced the same could not be as well known to them of Norwich? who (as his own story affirmeth) knew nothing thereof before the day of his execution, then seeing a certain Bill in his hand, which some said was a Bill of his Revocation, some other heard it not. All this would be made plain, especially in such a matter as this is, which he knew himself peradventure to be false at least, he knew would be doubted, suspected and contrariet of a great multitude.

Read of St. men to the second Book of Prophet: who craftily misre-true things with fable, to betray the City of Troy.

The second reason of
Mr. More.

I pass now to his second reason, where he reporteth, That the said Bilney, forthwith upon his judgement and degradation, knelt down in the presence of all the people, and asked of the Chancellor absolution from the sentence of Excommunication, holding him well content with his death, which he confessed himself to have deserved, &c.

Answer.

As touching the Patient receiving of his death, I do well assent, although I do not think, that he had deserved any such for his Doctrine. And as for his kneeling down in the presence of the people, upon his judgement and degradation, as I do not deny that he might do so; so I suppose again the cause of his kneeling not to be unto the Chancellor to ask absolution from his Excommunication. And if he were assailed from his Excommunication, yet doth it not thereupon follow that he recanted, no more than before, when he came to Master Latimer in his study, humbly to be confessed and assailed from his sins, as the blindness of that time then led him. But whether he knelt down and was assailed or no, neither was there to see him, nor yet Master More himself: and therefore with the like authority as he affirmeth, I may deny the same, unless he brought better demonstration for his assention than he doth, having no more for himself, but only his own, & divine. And yet nevertheless, admit he did so, being a man of a timorous Conscience, of an humble Spirit, and not fully resolved touching that matter of the Church, yet it followeth not thereby (as is said) that he revoked his other Articles and Doctrine by him before professed.

* That is, he so faith.

The third reason of
Mr. More.

The like answer may also be shaped to his third reason, where he saith, That certain days after his judgement, he made great labour that he might receive the blessed Body of Christ in form of Bread, which the Chancellor, after a great sticking a while, at length did grant, perceiving his devotion thereto, &c. Whereunto I answer as before, that it is not impossible, but that Bilney might both hear Mass, and desire to receive the Sacrament. For in that matter it may be that he was not resolved otherwise, than common custom then led both him any many other. Neither do I find in all the Articles objected against Bilney, that ever he was charged with any such opinion, concerning either the Mass or the Sacrament: which maketh me think, that he was yet ignorant, and also devout as other then were.

Answer.

The fourth reason of
Mr. More.

And fourthly, be it admitted, as Master More saith, That in receiving of the Sacrament, he holding up his hands should say the Collect, Domine Jesu Christe: and coming to these words, Ecce tunc pacem & concordiam, he knocked upon his breast, divers times repeating the same words, &c. all this being granted to Master More, yet it argueth no necessary alteration of his former Doctrine, which he preached and taught before. And yet if I listed here to stand dallying with Master More in the state inficial, and deny that he affirmeth, how will he make good that which he saith? He saith, That Bilney, kneeling before the Chancellor, desired absolution: Then, coming to Mass full devoutly, required to receive the Body of Christ in form of Bread, repeating divers times the words of the Collect, Domine Jesu Christe, &c. By what argument proveth be all this to be so?

An argument of Master More's
sheweth.

Master More in his Preface before the Book against Tindal so saith: Ergo it is certain. If Master More had never made Fictions in his Writings beside, or had never broken the head of verity in so many places of his Books as I could shew him, then might this argument go for somewhat. But here I ask, Was this Master More present at the Judgment of Bilney? No. Or else, what Regulars had he for his direction? None. Or else, By what Witnesses will he avouch this to be certain? Go and seek these Witnesses (good Reader) where thou canst find them: for Master More nameth none. Only because Master More so saith, That is sufficient. Well, give this to Thomas More (although he hath cracked his credit so often, and may almost be bankrupt) yet let his word go for payment at this time, and let us imagine all to be Oracles that he saith: Yet nevertheless here must needs remain a knople: for what will Master More, or (because he is gone) what will his Disciples say to this, that if Bilney was before assailed upon his Judgment (as they pretend) how was he then afterward degraded?

Mr. More Credit cracks.

What assailing is this, to be first forgiven, and then to be punished after? Again, if he were (as they surmise) converted so fully to the Catholique Faith, and also assailed, why then did the Chancellor stick so greatly for a while, to hould him with the Body of Christ in form of Bread? I am sure that if Christ had been here Himself in form of his own Flesh, he would nothing have stuck to receive him, being so converted at the first.

To be short, if Bilney was so graciously reduced to the holy Mother the Catholick Church, repenting his Errors, and detesting his Heresies, and now being in no Purgatory, but being a very Saint in Heaven, as ye say he is: why then did you burn him whom ye knew your selves should be a Saint? Thus if ye burn both Gods Enemies, and Gods Saints too, what cruel men are you? But here you will alledge perhaps your Law of Relapse, by the which the first fall is pardonable, but the second fall into Heresie is in no case pardonable: for so standeth your Law, I grant. But how this Law standeth with the true Church of Christ, and with his Word, now let us reason. For this being a Law not of politique or civil Government (where such Laws be expedient for publique necessity) but only being a Law meer Ecclesiastical, what a cruel Mother Church is this, which will not and cannot forgive her Children, rising and repending the second fault or error committed, but needs must burn their Bodies, that their Souls may be saved from the painful passion of Purgatory, whom nevertheless they know forthwith shall be blessed in Heaven? If God do save them, why do ye burn them? If God do pardon them, why do you condemn them? And if this be the Law of your Church according to your Doctrine, to burn them at the second time, though they be amended how then doth this from the Church agree with the Word of Christ, and nature of his true Spoule, which only seeketh repentance and amendment of Sinners? which once being had, she gladly openeth her bosom, and motherly receiveth them whensoever they return.

Wherefore, if Bilney did return to your Church (as ye say he did) then was your Church a cruel Mother, and unnatural, which would not open her bosom unto him, but thrust him into the fire when he had repented. Furthermore, how will you defend this Law by the Word of God, who in expresse words teaching all Bishops and Pastors, by the example of Christ the great Bishop of our Souls (being compassed about with temptations, that he might have the more compassion of them which be in him) exhorted all other Spiritual Persons by the like example, saying, (Hebrews the fifth) For every Bishop Heb. 5. which is taken from among men is ordained for men, in things pertaining to God, to offer Gifts and Sacrifice for Sins, that He may be merciful to the Ignorant, and to such as err, forasmuch as he himself is compassed about with infirmity, &c. Besides which Scripture, and also, that some Doctors of the Common Law, if they be well scanned, will not deny, but that they which be fallen in Relapse, whether it be vera, or falsa, yet if they earnestly return from their errors before the Sentence be given, they may be sent to perpetual prison to some Monastery, &c. Wherefore, if Bilney did so earnestly retract and detest his former Opinions, so many days (as More) saith) before his suffering, then needed not he to suffer that death as he did, but might have been sent to perpetual prison.

Thus, although I need not to stand longer upon this matter, being so plain, and having said enough; yet (briefly to repeat that which before hath been said) this I say again: first if Thomas Bilney was assailed from Excommunication, and after that heard his Mass devoutly, and at the end of the Mass was confessed, and consequently after Confession was houlded, and lastly asked mercy for contemning of the Church, as Master More doth bear us in hand (to see now how this Tale hangeth together) why then did the Chancellor stick so greatly to give him the Sacrament of the Altar, whom he himself had assailed, and received to the Sacrament of Penance before; which is plain against the Canon-Law? Again, the said Thomas Bilney, if he were now received to the Mother Church by the Sacraments of Penance and of the Altar; why then was he afterward degraded, and cut from the Church, sith the Canon permit-

Mr. More Tale full of absurdities.

KING Ans. I permitte no degradation, but to them only which be incorrigible? Furthermore the said Bilney, if he being converted to many days before (as More pretendeth) to the Catholique Faith, was now no Heretick, how then did the Sentence pronounce him for an Heretick? Or finally, how could they, or why would they burn him being a Catholique, especially fith the Cancn-Law would bear with him, to be judged rather to perpetual prison in forme Monastery as is afore touched, if they had pleased?

A Summary answer to Mr. More, as to his absence, to Mass Cope. Wherefore in three words to answer to Mr. More: First, all this Tale of his may be doubted, because of the matter not hanging together. Secondly, it may also well be denied, for the insufficiency of probation and testimony.

Thirdly, If all this were granted, yet neither hath Mr. More any great advantage against Mr. Bilney, to prove him to have recanted: nor yet Mr. Cope against me, which by the authority of Mr. More seeketh to bear me down, and disprove my former story.

More consequence denied. For be it granted that Bilney at his death did hold with the Mass, with Confeffion, and with the authority of the Romish-Church, being an humble spirited man, and yet no further brought; yet all this notwithstanding proveth not that he recanted. Forasmuch as he never held not taught any thing before against the premisses, therefore he could not recant that which he never did hold. For the better demonstration whereof I will recite out of the Registers some part of his teaching and preaching, as was objected against him by one Rich. Nele Priest: who, amongst other Witnesses, deposed against him for preaching in the Town of Wilkeson, these words following:

Bilney against offering to Images. Put away your golden gods, your silver gods, your stony gods, and leave your Offerings, and lift up your Hearts to the Sacrament of the Altar. Also the said Mr. Bilney said in his Sermon, I know certain things have been offered in such places, which have been afterward given to Whores of the Stews; and I call them Whores of the Stews that be naughty of their living, &c. Ex Regill.

Item, By another Witness named William Cade it was deposed against him, that he thus preached, That Jews and Saracens would have become Christian men long ago, had not Idolatry of Christian men been, by offering of Candles, Wax or Money to the Stocks and Stones of Images, set and standing in the Churches, &c.

Bilney against Pilgrimage. Item, By the said Deponent against Bilney, That the Priests take away the Offerings, and hang them about their Whores Necks: and after that they take them again from the Whores if they please them, not and hang them upon the Images: And is not this a great Relique, when it is hangd there again?

Item, By the said Deponent it was testified against Bilney, That going on Pilgrimage is naughty, and that no man should use it, for it were better not, and rather to tarry at home, and give somewhat in Alms, and offer your Hearts, Wills, and Minde, to the Sacrament, and leave your Idolatry to Saints.

Item, By William Nelms of Wilkeson, that Bilney should preach, That they gild their gods, and bear them about, and men say they do speak, and if they do speak, it is the Devil that speaketh in them, and not God, &c.

Item, By Thomas Daly of Wilkeson, that Bilney thus preached, You come hither on Pilgrimage to Stocks and Stones. You do naught, keep you at home, and Worship the Sacrament at home, &c.

Item, By Frier Jo. Hogskin, that Bilney thus preached at Ipswich, The coming of our Saviour Christ was long desired, and by divers and many Prophets prophesied, That he should come. But John the Baptist, more then a Prophet, did not only Prophesie, but with his finger shewed, Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the World. Then if this were the very Lamb, which John did demonstrate and shew, which taketh away the sins of the World, what injury is this Bull of the Bishop of Rome to our Saviour Jesus Christ? That to be buried in the Cowl of Saint Francis should or may remit four parts of the Penance? What is left to our Saviour Jesus Christ, which taketh away the sins of the World: This will I justify to be a great blasphemy against the blood of Christ, &c.

Bilney against false Messias. Item, By another Frier Fuller, that Bilney thus preached, I trust there shall and will come other beside me, the which shall shew and preach to you the same Faith and manner of living that I do, which is the very true Gospel of our Saviour, whereby you shall be brought from your Errors, wherein you have been so long seduced: for before this, there have been many that have slandered you and the Gospel of our Saviour Christ. Of whom speaketh our Saviour Christ, Mat. 18. Qui scandalizaverint unum de pusillis istis qui crediderint, &c.

And moreover to these the testimony of Richard Seyman, that Bilney in Ipswich should preach these words, Our Saviour Christ is our Mediator between us and the Father: what then should we need to seek for remedy to any Saint inferior to Christ? Wherefore to make such petition to any, but to our Saviour Christ, trusting thereby to have remedy, doth great injury to the Blood of Christ, and deformeth our Saviour: like as if a man should take and strike off the head, and set it under the foot, and to set the foot above.

Thus much, being partly touched before, I thought here to intimate again out of the Registers, touching the Opinions of Thomas Bilney. Whereby may appear the whole sum of his Preaching and Doctrine to proceed chiefly against Idolatry, Invocation of Saints, vain worship of Images, false trust to mens merits, and such other gross Points of Religion, as seemed prejudicial and derogatory to the blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ. As touching the Mass, and Sacrament of the Altar, as he never varied neither more nor less from himself, so likewise he never differed therein from the most gross Catholics. And as concerning his opinion of the Church of Rome, how blind it was at that time, may sufficiently appear by his own hand in Latin, which I have to shew, as followeth: Credo pleraque leges Pontificias utiles esse, necessarias, & ad pietatem quoque plurimum promoventes, nec sacris Scripturis repugnantes, imo ab omnibus plurimum observandas, &c. De omnibus non possum pronunciare, utpote quas non legi, & quas legi, nunquam in hoc legi, ut reprehenderem, sed ut diversimodum intelligere, ac pro virili facere, & docere. De multiplicitate legum questus est suo tempore S. Augustinus, & item Gaxlonus, qui miratur quomodo non post lapsum inter tot laqueos Constitutionum tui esse possimes, quoniam primi Parentes adhibe puri, & ante lapsum, unicuique preceptum non observarint, &c.

Moreover, concerning the authority of the Keys thus he writeth, answering to his twelfth Article, Soli Sacerdotes, ordinati rite per Pontifices, habent claves, quarum virtute ligant & solvunt (* & clave non errante) quod & facere eos non dubito, quamlibet sint peccatores. Nam Sacramentorum efficaciam non minuit, nedum tollit ministrorum indignitas, quamdiu ab Ecclesia tolerantur, &c.

By these words of Bilney written by him in Latin, although it may be thought how ignorant and gross he was after the rudeness of those days, yet by the same notwithstanding it may appear how falsely he is noted and slandered by Master More, and Cope my Friend, to have recanted the Articles, which he did never hold or maintain otherwise in all his life. And therefore (as I said) though it be granted to Master More, or in his absence to my Friend Cope, that Bilney was assailed, was confessed, and houseled before his burning, yet all this argueth not, that he recanted.

Now that I have sufficiently (I trust) put off the reasons of Master More and of others, whereby they pretend falsely to face us out, that Bilney the second time again recanted at his death: it remaineth on the other part, that I likewise do infer my Probations, whereby I have to argue and convince, that Bilney did not the second time recant, as he is untruly slandered. And first I will begin even with the words and testimonies of Master Mores own mouth, who being Lord Chancellor, when Message was sent to him for a Writ of Discharge to burn Bilney, spake in this wise to the Messengers that came, Go your ways, saith he, and burn him first, and then afterward come to me for a Bill of my hand. Which words may give us evidence enough, that Bilney was not thought then to have recanted, for then the Lord Chancellor would not have been so greedy and hasty, Item, By another Frier Fuller, that Bilney thus preached, I trust there shall and will come other beside me, the which shall shew and preach to you the same Faith and manner of living that I do, which is the very true Gospel of our Saviour, whereby you shall be brought from your Errors, wherein you have been so long seduced: for before this, there have been many that have slandered you and the Gospel of our Saviour Christ. Wherefore to make such petition to any, but to our Saviour Christ, trusting thereby to have remedy, doth great injury to the Blood of Christ, and deformeth our Saviour: like as if a man should take and strike off the head, and set it under the foot, and to set the foot above.

By these words of Bilney written by him in Latin, although it may be thought how ignorant and gross he was after the rudeness of those days, yet by the same notwithstanding it may appear how falsely he is noted and slandered by Master More, and Cope my Friend, to have recanted the Articles, which he did never hold or maintain otherwise in all his life. Contrary reasons to prove that Bilney did not again recant.

More own words against Bilney.

hasty, no doubt, to have him dispatched. And how standeth this with Master Mores words now, which beareth us in hand that he recanted many days before his burning?

Proved by Bishop
More words that Bilney did not recant at his burning.

The like evidence we may also take by the Verdict of the Bishop himself that burned him, whose words were these. After he had burned him, and then heard tell of Doctor Shaxton; Christ's Mother, said he, (that was his Oath) I fear I have burnt Abel, and let Cain go, &c. As who would say, I had thought before that I had punished Cain, and let Abel go: but now I fear I have burnt Abel, and let Cain escape. Whereby it is plain to understand what was the Bishops judgment of Bilney, before his burning; that is, that he was a Cain, and the other an Abel. But after the burning of Bilney, the Bishop hearing now of Shaxton, turneth his judgment, and correcteth himself, swearing now the contrary; that is, left he had burned Abel, and let Cain go.

Furthermore, where the Bishop feared, in burning Bilney, that he had burned Abel; what doth this fear of the Bishop import, but a doubting of his mind uncertain? For who feareth that whereof he is sure? Wherefore the the case is plain, that Bilney at his burning did not recant, as More reporteth. For then the Bishop knowing Bilney to die a Catholick Convert, and a true Member of the Church, would not have feared, nor doubted, but would have constantly affirmed Bilney to have died a true Abel indeed. And to conclude this matter, if Bilney died an Abel, then the Bishop by his own confession must needs prove himself to be a Cain, which slew him. What more clearer probation could we bring, if there were a thousand? Or what need we any other, having this alone?

eth Abel.

Master Bil-ney did not recant at his death.

Witness for Bilney.

Now for testimony and witness of this matter to be produced, for so much as Master More alledgeth none to prove that Bilney at his death did recant; I will assay what testimonies I have on the contrary side, to avouch and prove that Bilney did not recant.

And forasmuch as Bilney was a Cambridge man, and the first Framer of that University in the knowledge of Christ, and was burned at Norwich, being not very far distant from Cambridge; there is no doubt, but amongst so many Friends as he had in that University, some went thither to hear and see him. Of whom one was Thomas Allen, Fellow of Pembroke-Hall, who, returning the same time from Bilney's burning, declared to Doctor Turner Dean of Wells, being yet alive, (a man whose authority neither is to be neglected, nor credit to be diminished) that the said Bilney took his death most patiently, and suffered most constantly, without any recantation for the Doctrine which he before had professed.

ner Dean of

Another witness for Bilney.

In the City of Norwich, Nefton and many other be now departed, which were then present at the burning of Bilney: nevertheless some be yet alive, whose witnesses if need were I could fetch with a little labour, and will (God willing) as time shall require: in the mean time, at the writing hereof there was one Thomas Russel, at a right honest Occupier, and a Citizen of Norwich, who likewise being there present on horseback at the execution of his godly man, beholding all things that were done, did neither hear him recant any word, nor yet heard of his Recantation.

Another
witness for Bilney.

I could also add hereunto the testimony of another, being Brother to the Archbishop of Canterbury, named Malter Baker, a man yet alive, who being the same time present at the Examination of Bilney, both heard him and saw him, when as a certain Friar called him Heretic. Whereunto Bilney replying again, made answer, If I be an Heretic (said he) then are you an Antichrist, who of late have burned a certain Gentlewoman with you, in Saint Francis Cowle, assuring her to have Salvation thereby. Which fact, although the Friar the same time did deny, yet this cannot be denied but Bilney spake these words: whereby he may easily be judged to be far from the mind of any Recantation; according as by the said Gentleman it is also testified, that after that he never heard of any Recantation that Bilney either meant or made.

One Martyr
witness for Bilney.
Another
Martyr.

If I should recite all that here might be brought, I might sooner lack room in my Book to contain them, than names enough to fill up a grand Jury. But what need I to spend time about Witnesses, when one Master Latimer may stand for a thousand, one Martyr to bear witness to another? And though my friend Cope, pressing me with the authority of Master More, saith, That he will believe him before me; yet I trust he will not refuse to credit this so ancient a Seigneur, Father Latimer, being both in Bilney's time, and also by Bilney converted, and familiarly with him acquainted; who being the same time at Cambridge, I suppose would inquire as much, and could know more of this matter than Master More.

1 KING 7
t. Hist. 2. 5

Touching the testimonial of which Latimer I have noted before, how he in three sundry places of his Sermons hath testified of good Bilney, of that blessed Bilney of Saint Bilney, how he died patiently, against the tyrannical See of Rome, &c. And in another Sermon also, how the said Bilney suffered his body to be burned for the Gospel sake, &c. Item, in another place, How the said Bilney suffered death for Gods Word sake. Vide Vide supra.

The testimony of Mr. Latimer concerning
Mr. Bilney.

I may be thought perhaps of some to have stayed too long about the discourse of this matter. But the cause that moved, and half constrained me thereunto, was Sir Thomas More, sometimes Lord Chancellor of England, and now a great Archpillar of all our English Papists, a man otherwise of a pregnant wit, full of pleasant conceits; also for his learning above the common sort of his estate, esteemed no less industrious in his Studies, than well exercised in his Pen. Who if he had kept himself in his own shop, and applied the faculty, being a Lay-man, whereunto he was called, and had not overreached himself to prove Masteries in such matters wherein he had little skill, less experience, and which pertained not to his Profession, he had deserved not only much more commendation, but also longer life.

But forasmuch as he, not contented with his own Vocation, hath with Oxen reached out his unmet hand to meddle with Gods Ark-matters, wherein he had little cunning, and while he thinketh to help Religion, destroyeth Religion, and is an utter Enemy to Christ, and to his Spiritual Doctrine, and his poor afflicted Church: To the intent therefore that he, being taken for a special Ring-leader and a chief stay in the Popes Church, might the better be known what he is, and that the ignorant and simple may see what little credit is to be given unto him, as well in his other false facing out of matters, as namely in this present History of Bilney's Recantation: I have diligently searched out and procured the true Certificate of M. Bilney's burning, with all the circumstances and points thereto belonging, testified not by some-lays and hear-lays (as Master More useth) but truly witnessed, and faithfully recorded by one, who as in a place and degree he surmounteth the estate of Master More (though he were Lord Chancellor) so being also both a spiritual person, and there present the same time, coming for the same purpose the day before to see his burning, was a present beholder of things there done, dominus est iustus of his Martyrdom, whose credit I am sure will counterpoise with the credit of Master More. The Order of which Martyrdom was this as followeth.

witness at the burning of Mr. Bilney.

Thomas Bilney, after his Examination and Condemnation before Doctor Pelles, Doctor of Law, and Chancellor, first was degraded by Suffragan Underwood, according to the custom of their Popish manner, by the assistance of all the Friars and Doctors of the same Suit. Which done, he was immediately committed to the Lay-power, and to the two Sheriffs of the City, of whom Thomas Nefton was one. This Thomas Nefton was Bilney's special good Friend, and sorry to accept him to such execution as followed. But such was the tyranny of that time, and dread of the Chancellor and Friars, that he could no otherwise do, but needs must receive him. Who notwithstanding, as he could not bear in his Conscience himself to be present at his death; so, for the time that he was in his custody, he caused him to be more friendly looked unto, and more whollomely kept concerning his diet, than he was before.

KING
HEN. 8. 1.

M^r. Thomas Bilney, proving the fire with his finger. The Burning of the Godly and constant martyr
M^r. Thomas Bilney.

5 Annot.
2. 1551. 3
The good courage of Bilney before the death.

After this, the Friday following at night, which was before the day of his execution, being Saint Magnus-day, and Saturday, the said Bilney had divers of his Friends resorting unto him in the Guildhall, where he was kept. Amongst whom, one of the said Friends finding him eating of an Ale-brew with such a cheerful heart and quiet mind as he did, said, That he was glad to see him at that time, so shortly before his heavy and painful departure, so heartily to refresh himself. Whereunto he answered, O, said he, I follow the example of the Husbandmen of the Country, who having a ruinous house to dwell in, yet bestow cost as long as they may, to build it up, and so do I now with this ruinous house of my body, and with Gods Creatures, in thanks to him, refresh the same as ye see. Then sitting with his said Friends in godly talk to their Edification, some put him in mind, that though the fire, which he should suffer the next day, should be of great heat unto his body, yet the comfort of Gods Spirit should cool it to his everlasting refreshing. At this word the said Thomas Bilney putting his hand toward the flame of the Candle burning before them (as also he did divers times besides) and feeling the heat thereof, O (said he) I feel by experience, and have known it long by Philosophy, that fire by Gods Ordinance is naturally hot, but yet I am persuaded by Gods holy Word, and by the experience of some spoken of in the same, that in the flame they felt no heat, and in the fire they felt no consumption: and I constantly believe, howsoever that the stubble of this my Body shall be wasted by it, yet my Soul and Spirit shall be purged thereby; a pain for the time, whereon notwithstanding followeth joy unspeakable. And here he much entreated of this place of Scripture, Noli timere, quia redemi te, & vocavi te nomine tuo, meus es tu. Cum transferis per aquas, secum ero, & flumina non operient te. Cum ambulaveris in igne, non combureris, & flamma non ardebit te, quia ego Dominus Deus tuus sanctus Israel, salvator tuus. That is, Fear not, For I have redeemed thee, and called thee by thy Name, thou art mine own. When thou goest thorow the water I will be with thee, and the strong floods shall not overflow thee. When thou walkest in the fire, it shall not burn thee, and the flame shall not kindle upon thee, for I am the Lord thy God, the holy One of Israel. Which he did most comfortably entreat of, as well in respect of himself, as applying it to the particular use of his Friends there present. Of whom some took such sweet fruit therein, that they cautioned the whole said Sentence to be fair written in Tables, and some in their Books. The comfort whereof (in divers of them) was never taken from them to their dying-day.

The Saturday next following, when the Officers of execution (as the manner is) with their Gloves and Halberds were ready to receive him, and to lead him to the place of execution without the City Gate, called Bishops Gate, in a low Valley, commonly called The Lollards pit, under Saint Leonards hill, environed about with great hills, (which place was chosen for the peoples quiet, sitting to see the execution) at the coming forth of the said Thomas Bilney out of the prison-door one of his Friends came to him, and with few words, as he durst, spake to him, and prayed him in Gods behalf to be constant, and to take his death as a patiently as he could. Whereunto the said Bilney answered, with a quiet and mild countenance, Ye see when the Mariner is entred his Ship to sail on the troublous Sea, how he for a while is tossed in the billows of the same, but yet in hope, that he shall once come to the quiet haven, he beareth in better comfort the perils which he feeleth: So am I now toward this sailing, and whatsoever storms I shall feel, yet shortly after shall my ship be in the haven, as I doubt not thereof by the Grace of God, desiring you to help me with your prayers to the same effect.

And so he going forth in the streets, giving much Alms by the way by the hands of one of his Friends, and accompanied with one Doctor Warner, Doctor of Divinity, and Parson of Winterton, whom he did chioose as his old Acquaintance, to be with him for his ghottly comfort; he came at the last to the place of execution, and descended down from the hill to the same, apparelled in a lay-mans Gown with his sleeves hanging down; and his arms out, his hair being piteously mangled at his degradation (a little single body in person, but always of a good upright countenance) and drew near to the Stake prepared, and somewhat tarrying the preparation of the fire, he desired that he might speak some words to the people, and there standing, thus he said:

Good people, I am come hither to die, and born I was to live under that condition, naturally to die again, and that ye might testify that I depart out of this present life, as a true Christian man, in a right belief towards Almighty God, I will rehearse unto you in a fast Faith the Articles of my Creed: and then began to rehearse them in order, as they be in the common Creed, with oft elevating his eyes and hands to Almighty God, and at the

Article

Article of Christs Incarnation, having a little meditation in himself, and coming to the word Crucified, he humbly bowed himself and made great reverence, and then proceeding in the Articles, and coming to these words, I believe the Catholick Church, there he paused, and spake these words, Good people I must here confesse to have offended the Church, in preaching once against the prohibition of the same, at a poor Cure belonging to Trinity-Hall in Cambridge, where I was Fellow, earnestly intreated thereunto by the Curate and other good people of the Parish, shewing, that they had no Sermon there of long time before: and so in my Conscience moved, I did make a poor Collation unto them, and thereby ran into the disobedience of certain authority in the Church, by whom I was prohibited; howbeit I trust at the general day, Charity that moved me to this act shall bear me out at the Judgment-Seat of God; and so he proceeded on, without any manner of words of recantation, or charging any man for procuring him to his death.

This once done, he put off his Gown, and went to the Stake, and kneeling upon a little ledge coming out of the Stake, whereon he should afterward stand to be better seen, he made his private prayer with such earnest elevation of his eyes and hands to Heaven, and in so good quiet behaviour, that he seemed not much to consider the terror of his death, and ended at the last his private prayers with the 143 Psalm, beginning, Domine, exaudi orationem meam, auribus percipe obsecrationem meam, &c. That is, Hear my prayer, O Lord, consider my desire: And enter not into judgment with thy Servant, for in thy fight shall no man living be justified: And so finishing that Psalm he ended his private prayers.

After that, he turned himself to the Officers, asking them if they were ready, and they answered, Yea. Whereupon he put off his jacket and doublet, and stood in his hose and shirt, and went unto the Stake, standing upon that ledge, and the chain was cast about him; and standing thereon, the said Doctor Warner came to him to bid him farewell, who spake but few words for weeping.

Upon whom the said Thomas Bilney did most gently smile, and inclined his body to speak to him a few words of thanks, and the last were these, O Master Doctor, Pasce gregem tuum, Pasce gregem tuum, ut cum venerit Dominus, inveniat te sic facientem. That is, Feed your Flock, feed your Flock, that when the Lord cometh, he may find you so doing: and farewell good Master Doctor, and pray for me; and so he departed without any answer, sobbing and weeping. And while he thus stood upon the ledge at the Stake, certain Priests, Doctors, and Priors of their Houses being there present (as they were uncharitably and maliciously present at his Examination and Degradation, &c.) came to him and said, O Master Bilney, the people be persuaded that we be the Causers of your death, and that we have procured the same, and thereupon it is like that they will withdraw their charitable Alms from us all, except you declare your Charity towards us, and discharge us of the matter. Whereupon the said Thomas Bilney spake with a loud voice to the people and said, I pray you good people be never the worse to these men for my sake, as though they should be the Authors of my death; it was not they: and so he ended.

Then the Officers put reed and fagots about his body, and set fire on the reed, which made a very great flame, which sparkled and deformed the visage of his face, he holding up his hands, and knocking upon his breast, crying sometimes Jesus, sometimes Credo. Which flame was blown away from him by the violence of the Wind, which was that day and two or three days before notable great, in which it was said, That the fields were marvelously plagued by the loss of Corn: and so for a little pause he stood without flame, the flame departing and recouring thrice ere the wood took strength to be the sharper to consume, and then he gave up the ghost, and his body being withered bowed downward upon the chain. Then one of the Officers with his Halbert smote out the staple in the Stake behind him, and suffered his body to fall into the bottom of the fire, laying wood on it, and so he was consumed.

Thus have ye (good Readers) the true History, and Martyrdom of this good man; that is, of blessed Saint Bilney (as Master Latimer doth call him) without any recantation, testified and ratified by the authority above said, by the which authority and party being there present and yet alive, it is furthermore constantly affirmed, that Bilney not only did never recant, but also that he never had any such Bill, or Script, or Scrol in his hand to read, either softly or aptly, as Master More, Per licentiam Poeticam, would bear us down. Wherefore even as you see Master More deal in this, so you may trust him in the residue of his other Tales, if ye will.

Master Stafford of Cambridge.

AS the death of this godly Bilney did much good in Norfolk where he was burned; so his diligent travel, in teaching and exhorting other, and example of life correspondent to his Doctrine, let no small fruit behind him in Cambridge, being a great means of framing that University, and drawing divers unto Christ. By reason of whom, and partly also of another called Master Stafford, the Word of God began there most luckily to spread, and many toward wits to flourish. In the company of whom was Master Latimer, Doctor Barnes, Doctor Thibell of Pembroke-Hall, Master Foke of Bennet-College, and Master Soule of the same College, Doctor Warner above-mentioned, with divers other more.

This Master Stafford was then the publick Reader of the Divinity Lecture in that University. Who, as he was an earnest Professor of Christs Gospel, so was he as diligent a Follower of that which he professed, as by this example here following may appear.

For as the Plague was then fore in Cambridge, and amongst other a certain Priest called Sir Henry Conjuror lay sore sick of the said Plague, Master Stafford hearing in falling a thereof, and seeing the horrible danger that his Soul was in, was so moved in Conscience to help the dangerous case of the Priest, that he neglecting his own bodily death, to recover the other from eternal damnation, came unto him, exhorted, and so laboured him, that he would not leave him before he had converted him, and saw his conjuring Books burned before his face. Which being done, Mr. Stafford went home, and immediately sickened, and shortly after most Christianly deceased. Ex fidelis testimonio D. Ridley, & Edmund. Episc. Lond.

Concerning which Master Stafford this moreover is to be noted, how that Master Latimer, being yet a fervent and a zealous Papist, standing in the Schools when Master Stafford read, had the Scholars not to hear him: and also preaching against him, exhorted the people not to believe him; and yet the said Latimer confessed himself, that he gave thanks to God, that he asked him forgiveness before he departed.

And thus much by the way of good Master Stafford, who, for his constant and godly adventure in such a cause, may seem not unworthy to go with blessed Bilney in the Fellowship of holy and blessed Martyrs.

The story of Mr. Simon Fish.

BEFORE the time of Master Bilney, and fall of the Cardinal, I should have placed the story of Simon Fish, with the Book called The Supplication of Beggars, declaring how and by what means it came to the Kings hand, and what effect thereof followed after, in the reformation of many things, especially of the Clergy. But the missing of a few years in this matter breaketh no great square in our story, though it be now entered here, which should have come in six years before. The manner and circumstance of the matter is this:

After that the light of the Gospel, working mightily in Germany, began to spread his beams here also in England, great stir and alteration followed in the hearts of many: so that coloured Hypocrite, and false Doctrine, and painted Holiness began to be espied more and more by the reading of Gods Word. The Authority of the Bishop of Rome, and the glory of his Cardinals was not so high, but such as had fresh wits, spangled with Gods Grace, began to spy Christ from Antichrist; that is, true Sincerity from counterfeit Religion. Mr. Simon Fish, Fifth Author of the Book called The Supplication of Beggars.

of whom was the said Mr. Simon Fish, a Gentleman of Gray's Inn. It happened the first year that this Gentleman came to London to dwell, which was about the year of our Lord 1525, that there was a certain Play or Interlude made by one Mr. Roe of the same Inn, Gentleman, in which Play partly was matter against the Cardinal Wolsey. And where none durst take upon them to play that part which touched the said Cardinal, this fore said Mr. Fish took upon him to do it. Whereupon great displeasure ensued against him upon the Cardinals part, inasmuch as he being purified by the said Cardinal, the same night that this Tragedy was played, was compelled of force to void his own house, and so fled over the Sea to Italy. Upon occasion whereof, the next year following this Book was made (being about the year 1527) and so not long after, in the year (as I suppose) 1528, was sent over to the Lady Ann Bullen, who then lay at a place not far from the Court. Which Book her Brother seeing in her hand, took it and read it, and gave it to her again, willing her earnestly to give it to the King, which thing she did.

This was (as I gather) about the year of our Lord 1528. The King after he had received the Book, demanded of her who made it. Whereunto she answered and said, A certain Subject of his, one Fish, who was fled out of the Realm for fear of the Cardinal. After the King had kept the Book in his bosom three or four days, as is credibly reported, such knowledge was given by the Kings servants to the Wife of the said Simon Fish, that she might boldly fend for her Husband without all peril or danger. Whereupon she, thereby being encouraged, came first and made suit to the King for the safe return of her Husband. Who, understanding whole Wife she was, shewed a marvellous gentle and chearful countenance towards her, asking where her Husband was. She answered, If it like your Grace not far off. Then, faith he, Fetch him, and he shall come and go safe without peril, and no man shall do him harm. Saying moreover, that he had much wrong that he was from her so long, who had been absent now the space of two years and a half. In the which mean time the Cardinal was deposed, as is aforesaid, and Mr. More set in his place of the Chancellorship.

Thus Fish's Wife, being emboldened by the Kings words, went immediately to her Husband, being lately come over, and lying privily within a Mile of the Court, and brought him to the King; which appeareth to be about the year of our Lord 1530. When the King saw him, and understood he was the Author of the Book, he came and embraced him with loving countenance. Who after long talk for the space of three or four hours, as they were riding together on hunting, at length dimitted him, and bad him take home his Wife, for she had taken great pains for him. Who answered the King again and said, he durst not so do, for fear of Sir Thomas More then Chancellor, and Stokesley then Bishop of London. This seemeth to be about the year of our Lord 1530.

The King, taking the Signet off his Finger, willed him to have him recommended to the Lord Chancellor, charging him not to be so hardy to work him any harm. Master Fish, receiving the Kings Signet, went and declared his Message to the Lord Chancellor, who took it as sufficient for his own discharge, but he asked him if he had any thing for the discharge of his Wife; for she a little before had by chance displeased the Friers, for not suffering them to lay their Gospels in Laine in her house, as they did in others, unless they would say it in English. Whereupon the Lord Chancellor, though he had discharged the Man, yet not leaving his grudge towards the Wife, the next morning sent his man for her to appear before him; who, had it not been for her young Daughter, which then lay sick of the Plague, had been like to come to much trouble. Of the which Plague her Husband, the said Master Fish, decaying within half a year, the afterward married to one Master James Bainham, Sir Alexander Bainham's son, a worshipful Knight of Gloucestershire. The which fore said Mr. James Bainham, not long after was burned, as incontinently after in the procees of this story shall appear.

And thus much concerning Simon Fish, the Author of the Book of Beggars, who also translated a Book called The summe of the Scripture, out of the Dutch.

Now cometh another note of one Edmund Modder, the Kings Footman, touching the same matter.

This Master Modder being with the King in talk of Religion, and of the new books that were come from beyond the Seas, said, If it might please his Grace to pardon him, and such as he would bring to his Grace, he should see such a Book as was marvel to hear of. The King demanded what they were. He said, two of our Merchants, George Elyot, and George Robinson. The King pointed a time to speak with them. When they came before his presence in a privy Closet, he demanded what they had to say, or to shew him. One of them said, That there was a Book come to their hands, which they had there to shew his Grace. Vhen he saw it, he demanded if any of them could read it. Yea, said George Elyot, if it please your Grace to bear it. I thought so, said the King, for I need were, thou canst say it without book.

The whole Book being read out, the King made a long pause, and then said, If a man should pull down an old stone Wall, and begin at the lower part, the upper part thereof might chance to fall upon his head. And then he took the Book and put it into his Desk, and commanded them upon their Allegiance, that they should not tell to any man that he had seen the Book, &c. The Copy of the fore said Book, intituled of the Beggars here enlieth.

A certain Libel, or Book, intituled, The Supplication of Beggars, thrown and scattered at the Procession in Westminster, on Candlemas day, before King Henry the Eighth, for him to read and peruse, made and compiled by Master Fish.

To the King our Sovereign Lord,

M^{ost} lamentably complaineth their woful misery, unto your Highness, your poor daily Beadmen, the wretched hideous Monitors, on whom scarcely for hor- rour any eye dare look, the foul unhappy sort of Lepers, and other fore people, needy, impotent, blind, lame and sick, that live only by Alms, how that their number is daily so sore increased, that all the Alms of all the well disposed people of this your Realm is not half enough for to sustain them, but that for very constraint they die for hunger. And this most pestilent mischief is come upon your said poor Beadmen, by the reason that there is, in the times of your Noble Predecessors passed, craftily crept into this your Realm, another sort, not of impotent, but of strong puissant and counterfeit holy and idle Beggars and Vagabonds, which since the time of their first entry, by all the craft and williness of Satan, are now increased under your fight, not only into a great number, but also into a Kingdom.

These are not the Herds, but the ravenous Wolves going in Herds clothing, devouring the Flock, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Deacons, Archdeacons, Suffragans, Priests, Monks, Canons, Friers, Pardoners and Sumners. And who is able to number this idle ravenous sort, which (setting all labour aside) have begged so importunately, that they have gotten into their hands, more than the third part of all your Realm? The goodliest Lordships, Manors, Lands and Territories are theirs, besides this, they have the tenth part of all the Corn, Meadow, Pasture, Grass, Wood, Colts, Calves, Lambs, Pigs, Geese and Chickens. Over and besides, the tenth part of every servants Wages, the tenth part of Wool, Milk, Honey, Wax, Cheese and Butter; yea, and they look so narrowly upon their profits, that the poor Wives must be countable to them for every tenth Egg, or else the getteth not her rights at Easter, and shall be taken as an Heretic. Hereto have they their four offering days. What money pull they in by Probates of Testaments, privy Tithes, and by mens offerings to their Pilgrimages, and at their first Masses? Every Man and Child that is buried must pay somewhat for Masses and Diriges, to be sung for him, or else they will accuse their friends and Executors of Heretic. What money get they by Mortuaries, by hearing of Confessions (and yet they keep shroud no counsel) by hallowing of Churches,

More than the third part of the Realm in the spirit of a man.

Churches, Altars, Superaltars, Chappels and Bells, by curbing of men, and absolving them again for money? What a multitude of money gather the Pardoners in a year? How much money get the Summers by extortion in a year, by assailing the people to the Commissaries Court, and afterward releasing the apparents for money? Finally, the infinite number of begging Friers, what get they in a year?

(c) Prædicatorum the common count of the Parishes of England, among men, and in Maps of the old time so went. And about the said Parishes do not amount now to the first rate of 52000, yet nevertheless the number (no doubt) is great, and therefore the Quarantine of the Friers cannot be little, but vixit to a great prey through the Realm. Wherupon the copy of this most reason (foundeth to good purpose. For although he hit not precisely on the full summe, yet it cannot be denied, but the Friers had very much, and much more than they did eat. Again, neither can it be denied, but the more they had, the less redounded to the impotent needy beggars indeed. And what reason is it, that such valiant biggits, which may work, and yet will make be idle, should reap any price of the Crop, which have no burden of the harvest, but willfully do sit idle, and serve to no use necessary in the commonwealth?

(b) Admit the Summa totalis came not to so much, yet it came to more than the Friers deserved, which could well work, and would not, and would needs beg, and need not; wherefore read before the story of Arctimachus.

or else they will procure him that will not give it to them to be taken as an Heretic. What Tyrant ever oppressed the people, like this cruel and vengeable generation? What Subjects shall be able to help their Prince, that be after this fashion yearly polled? What good Christian people can be able to succour us poor Lepers, blind, fore and lame, that be thus yearly oppressed? Is it any marvel that your people so complain of poverty? Is it any marvel that the Taxes, Fifteens and Subsidies that your Grace most tenderly, of great compassion hath taken among your people to defend them from the threatened ruine of their Commonwealth, have been so foolishly, yea painfully levied, seeing almost the uttermost penny, that might have been levied, hath been gathered before yearly by this ravenous insatiable generation? Neither the Danes nor the Saxons, in the time of the ancient Britains, should ever have been able to have brought their Armies from so far hither into your Land to have conquered it, if they had at that time such a sort of idle Gluttons to find at home. The Noble King Arthur had never been able to have carried his Army to the foot of the Mountains, to resist the coming down of Lucius the Emperor, if such yearly Exactions had been taken of his people. The Greeks had never been able to have so long continued at the Siege of Troy, if they had had at home such an idle sort of Cormorants to find. The ancient Romans had never been able to have put all the whole World under their obedience, if their people had been thus yearly oppressed. The Turk now in your time should never have been able to get so much ground of Christendom, if he had in his Empire such a sort of Locusts to devour his substance. Lay then these summs to the foresaid third part of the possessions of the Realm, that ye may see whether it draw nigh unto the half of the whole substance of the Realm or not; so shall ye find that it draweth far above.

Now let us then compare the number of this unkind idle sort, unto the number of the Lay-people, and we shall see whether it be indifferently thifted, or not, that they should have half. Compare them to the number of men, so are they not the hundredth perfon. Compare them to Men, Women and Children, so are they not the four hundredth perfon in number. One part therefore, into four hundred parts divided, were too much for them, except they did labour. What an unequal burthen is it, that they have half with the multitude, and are not the four hundredth perfon of their number? What Tongue is able to tell, that ever there was any Commonwealth so fore oppressed since the World first began?

And what doth all this greedy sort of stuidy, idle, holy Thieves, with these yearly Exactions that they take of the people? Truly nothing, but exempt themselves from the obedience of your Grace. Nothing but translate all Rule, Power, Lordship, Authority, Obedience and Dignity, from your Grace unto them. Nothing but that all your Subjects should fall into disobedience and rebellion against your Grace, and be under them, as they did unto your Noble predecessor King John, which because that he would have punished certain Traitors that had conspired, with the French King, to have deposed him from his Crown and Dignity (among the which a Clerk called Stephen, whom afterward against the Kings will, the Pope made Bishop of Canterbury, was one) interdicted his Land. For the which matter your most Noble Realm wrongfully (alas for shame) hath stood Tributary not unto any kind of temporal Prince, but unto a cruel devilish blood-sucker, drunken in the blood of the Saints and Martyrs of Christ ever since.

Here were an holy sort of Prelates, that thus cruelly could punish such a righteous King, all his Realm and Succession, for doing right. Here were a charitable sort of holy men, that could thus interdict a whole Realm, and pluck away the obedience of the people from their natural Liege Lord and King, for none other cause, but for his righteousness. Here were a blessed sort, not of meek herds, but of blood-suckers, that could set the French King upon such a righteous Prince, to cause him to lose his Crown and Dignity, to make effusion of the blood of his people, unless this good and blessed King, of great compassion, more fearing and lamenting the shedding of the blood of his people, than the loss of his Crown and Dignity, against all right and conscience, submitted himself unto them.

O case most horrible, that ever so Noble a King, Realm and Succession, should thus be made to stoop to such a sort of blood-suckers. Where was his Sword, Power, Crown and Dignity become, whereby he might have done justice in this matter? Where was their obedience become that should have been subject under his high power in this matter? yea, where was the obedience of all his subjects become, that for maintenance of the Commonwealth should have holpen him manfully to have resisted these blood-suckers, to the shedding of their blood? Was it not altogether by their policy translated from this good King unto them?

Yea, and what do they more? Truly nothing but apply themselves, by all the sleights they may, to have to do with every mans Wife, every mans Daughter, and every mans Maid, that Cuckoldry and Bawdry should reign over all, among your Subjects, that no man should know his own Child, that their Bastards might inherit the possessions of every man, to put the right begotten Children clean besides their inheritance, in subversion of all estates and godly order. These be they, that by their abstaining from Marriage do let the generation of the people, whereby by all the Realm at length, if it should be continued, shall be made desert and inhabitable.

These be they that have made an hundred thousand idle Whores in your Realm, which would have gotten their living honestly, in the sweat of their faces, had not their superfluous riches infected them to unclean lust and idleness. These be they that corrupt the whole Generation of Mankind in your Realm, that catch the Pox of one Woman, and bear them unto another, that be born, with one Woman, and bear it to another, that catch the Leprosy of one Woman, and bear it unto another. Yea some one of them shall boast among his fellows, that he hath meddled with his Husbands Goods, make the Women to run away from their Husbands, yea, a run away themselves both with Wife and Goods, bringing both Man, Wife and Children, to Idleness, Theft and Beggary. Yea, who is able KING able to number the great and broad bottomles Ocean Sea, full of evils, that this mischievous and sinful Generation may lawfully bring upon us unpunished?

Where is your Sword, Power, Crown and Dignity become, that should punish by punishment of death, even as other men are punished, the Felonies, Rapes, Murders and Treasons committed by this sinful Generation? Where is their obedience become, that should be under your high power in this matter? Is it not altogether translated and exempt from your Grace unto them? Yes truly,

(a) The Realm of England is diminished and decayed by the number of 200000 persons at least, or else replenished with so many whores and whoremasters, by restraining of Marriage from Priests, Monks, Friars, Nuns, Colleges, Hospitals, Bachelors, and such like Orders, within the Realm of England. The interests of which number might be recovered, and the Realm more populated, and also Gods Commandments better kept, if these Vows of Boudage were broken, and Matrimony permitted free to all men.

a Priest? What is he that would labour for a groat a day, and may have at least twelve-pence a day to be Bawd to a Priest, a Monk, or a Friar? What a sort are there of them that marry Priests foreveign Ladies, but to cloak the Priests incontinency, and that they may have a Living of the Priests themselves for their labour? How many thousand doth such lubricity bring to beggary, theft and idleness, which should have kept their good name, and have let themselves to work, had not been this excessive treasure of the Spirituality? What honest man dare take any man or woman unto his service, that hath been at such a School with a spiritual man?

O the grievous Shipwrack of the Commonwealth, which in ancient time, before the coming of these ravenous Wolves, were so prosperous, that then there were but few Thieves; yea Theft at that time was so rare, that Cesar was not compelled to make penalty of death upon Felony, as your Grace may well perceive in his Institutes. There was also at that time but few poor people, and yet they did not beg, but there was given them enough unasked; for there was at that time none of these ravenous Wolves to ask it from them; as it appeareth in the Acts of the Apostles. Is it any marvel though there be now so many Beggars, Thieves and idle people? Nay truly. What remedy? Make Laws against them? I am in doubt whether ye be able. Are they not fronger in your own Parliament-house than your self? What a number of Bishops, Abbots and Priors are Lords of your Parliament? Are not all the Learned Men of your Realm in fee with them, to speak in your Parliament-house for them, against your Crown, Dignity and Commonwealth of your Realm, a few of your own learned Council only excepted? What Law can be made against them that may be available? Who is he (though he be grieved very sore) that for the Murder of his Ancestor, Ravishment of his Wife, of his Daughter, Robbery, Trespass, Maim, Debt, or any other offence, dare lay it to their charge by any way of action? And if he do, then is he by and by, by their wiliness, accused of Heresie; yea, they will so handle him ere he pass, that except he will bear a Fagot for their pleasure, he shall be excommunicate, and then be all his actions dashed.

So captive are your Laws unto them, that no man whom they list to excommunicate, may be admitted to sue any Action in any of your Courts. If any man in your Sessions dare be so hardy to indict a Priest of any such crime, he hath ere the year go out, such a yoke of Heresie laid in his Neck, that it maketh him with he had not done it. Your Grace may see what a work there is in London; how the Bishop rageth for indicting of certain Curates of Extortion and Incontinency, the last year in the Wardmore Quest. Had not Richard Hunn commenced an Action of Premunure against a Priest, he had been yet alive, and not Hereticke at all, but an honest man. Did not divers of your Noble Progenitors, seeing their Crown and Dignity run into ruin, and to be thus craftily translated into the hands of this mischievous Generation, make divers Statutes for the Reformation thereof, among which the Statute of Mortmain was one, to the intent that after that time they should have no more given unto them? But what availed it? Have they not gotten into their hands more Lands since, than any Duke in England hath, the Statute notwithstanding? Yea, have they not for all that translated into their hands, from your Grace, half your Kingdom throughly, the only name remaining to you for your Ancestors sake? So you have the name, and they the profit. Yea, I fear, if I should weigh all things to the utmost, they would also take the name to them, and of one Kingdom make twain; the Spiritual Kingdom, as they call it, (for they will be named first) and your Temporal Kingdom. And which of these two Kingdoms, suppose you, is like to overgrow the other, yea, to put the other clean out of memory? Truly the Kingdom of the Bloud-suckers, for to them is given daily out of your Kingdom; and that that is once given them, never cometh from them again. Such Laws have they, that none of them may either give or sell any thing. What Law can be made so strong against them, that they either with money, or else with other policy, will not break or set at naught? What Kingdom can endure, that ever giveth thus from him, and receiveth nothing again? O how all the substance of your Realm, your Sword, Power, Crown, Dignity and obedience of your people, runneth headlong into the unfainable Whirlpool of these greedy Gulls, to be swallowed and devoured!

Neither have they any other colour to gather the yearly Exactions into their hands. But that they say they pray for us to God, to deliver our souls out of the pains of Purgatory; without whose prayers, they say, or at least without the Popes pardon, we could never be delivered thence. Which if it be true, then it is good reason that we give them all these things, although it were an hundred times as much. But there be many men of great literature and judgment, that for the love they have unto the truth and unto the Commonwealth, have not feared to put themselves into the greatest infamy that may be, in abjection of all the world, yea in peril of death, to declare their opinion in this matter; which is, that there is no Purgatory, but that it is a thing invented by the covetousness of the Spirituality, only to translate all Kingdoms from other Princes unto them, and that there is not one word spoken of it in all holy Scripture. They say also, that if there were a Purgatory, and also if that the Pope with his pardons may for money deliver one soul thence, he may deliver him as well without money; if he may deliver one, he may deliver a thousand; if he may deliver a thousand, he may deliver them all, and so destroy Purgatory, and then he is a cruel Tyrant, without all charity, if he keep them there in Prison and in pain till men will give him (b) money.

Likewise say they of all the whole sort of the Spirituality, That if they will pray for no man but for them that give them money, they are Tyrants, and lack charity, and suffer those souls to be punished and pained uncharitably for lack of their prayers. This sort of folks they call Hereticks, these they burn, these they rage against, put to open shame, and make them bear Fagots; but whether they be Hereticks or no, well I wot, that this Purgatory, and the Popes Pardons are all the cause of the translation of your Kingdom so fast into their hands. Wherefore it is manifest it cannot be of Christ; for he gave more to the temporal Kingdom, he himself paid tribute to Cesars; he took nothing from him, but taught that the high Powers should be always obeyed; yea himself (although he were most free Lord of all, and innocent) was obedient unto the high powers unto death. This is the great skab why they will not let the New Testament go abroad in your Mother Tongue, lest men should spy that they by their cloaked hypocrite do translate thus fast your Kingdom into their hands; that they are not obedient unto your high power; that they are cruel, unclean, unmerciful and hypocrites; that they seek not the honour of Christ, but their own; that remission of sins is not given by the Popes pardon, but by Christ, for the sure faith and trust that we have in him.

The Statute of Mortmain.

Half the profit of the Realm in the Clergy hands.

The most good the Popes Clergy doth in England, is to pray men souls out of Purgatory.

The most good the Popes Clergy doth in England, is to pray men souls out of Purgatory.

(b) If the Pope may deliver souls out of Purgatory for money, he may then as well deliver them without money, if he please him.

Again, if he deliver one, he can deliver a thousand, if he can deliver a thousand, he can deliver all, and so make a Giant-delivery, and a clean dispatch of all Purgatory. If he would, and if he would not, what is his may, then is there no charity in him.

Christ himself should be always obeyed; yea himself (although he were most free Lord of all, and innocent) was obedient unto the high powers unto death.

The cause touched why the Popes Clergy will not let the new Testament go abroad in the Mother tongue.

Christ himself should be always obeyed; yea himself (although he were most free Lord of all, and innocent) was obedient unto the high powers unto death.

Here may your Grace well perceive, that except you suffer their hypocritie to be disclosed, all is like to run into their hands; and as long as it is covered, so long shall it seem to every man to be a great impiety, not to give them. For this I am sure, your Grace thinketh (as the truth is) I am as good a man as my Father; why may I not as well give them as much as my Father did? And of this mind, I am sure are all the Lords, Knights, Squires, Gentlemen, and Yeomen in England; yea, and until it be disclosed, all your people will think that your Statute of Mortmain was never made with any good confidence, seeing that it taketh away the liberty of your people, in that they may not as lawfully buy their souls out of Purgatory by giving to the Spirituality, as their Predecessors did in times past.

Wherefore if ye will eschew the ruine of your Crown and Dignity, let their hypocritie be uttered, and that shall be more speedful in this matter, than all the laws that may be made, be they never so strong; for to make a Law to punish any offender, except it were more to give other men an example to beware how they commit such like offence, what should it avail? Did not Doctor Allen most presumptuously now in your time, against his Allegiance, all that ever he could, to pull from you the knowledge of such Pleas as belong unto your High Courts, unto another Court, in derogation of your Crown and Dignity?

Did not also Doctor Horsley and his Complices, most heinously (as all the World knoweth) murder in Prison that honest Merchant Richard Hun, for that he sued your Writ of Proemure against a Priest that wrongfully held him in Plea in a Spiritual Court, for a matter whereof the knowledge belongeth unto your high Courts? And what punishment was there done that any man may take example of, to beware of like offence? Truly none, but that the one paid five hundred Pounds (as it is said) to the building of your Chamber; and when that payment was once passed, the Captains of his Kingdom, because he fought so manfully against your Crown and Dignity, have heaped to him Benefice upon Benefice, so that he is rewarded

Ten times as much. The other (as it is said) paid six hundred pound for him and his Complices; which, because that he had likewise fought so manfully against your Crown and Dignity, was immediately, as he had obtained your most gracious Pardon, promoted by the Captains of the Kingdom, with Benefice upon Benefice, to the value of 4 times as much. Who can take example of punishment to beware of such like offence? Who is he of their Kingdom that will not rather take courage to commit like offence, seeing the promotions that fell to these men for their so offending? So weak and blunt is your sword to strike at one of the offenders of this crooked and perverse generation.

And this is by reason that the chief instrument of your Law, yea the chief of your Council, and he which hath your Sword in his hand, to whom also all the other instruments are obedient, is always a spiritual man, which hath ever such an inordinate love unto his own Kingdom, that he will maintain that, though all the temporal Kingdoms and Commonwealths of the World should therefore utterly be undone. Here leave we out the greatest matter of all, lest that we declaring such an horrible carnation of evil against the Ministers of Iniquity, should seem to declare the one only fault, or rather the ignorance of our best beloved Minister of righteousness, which is to be hid till he may be learned by these small enormities that we have spoken of, to know it plainly himself.

But what remedy to relieve us your poor, sick, lame, and fore Beadmen? To make many Hospitals for the relief of the poor people? Nay truly. The more the worse: for ever the fat of the whole foundation hangeth on the Priests Beards. Divers of your noble Predecessors, Kings of this Realm, have given Lands to Monasteries, to give a certain sum of money yearly to the poor people, whereof for the ancient of the time they give never one penny. They have likewise given to them, to have a certain of Masses said daily for them, whereof they say never one. If the Abbot of Westminster should sing every day as many Masses for his Founders, as he is bound to do by his foundation, a thousand Monks were too few. Wherefore if your Grace will build a sure Hospital that never shall fail, to relieve us all your poor Beadmen, then take from them all these things. Set these sturdy Lobbies abroad in the World to get them Wives of their own, to get their living with their labour in the sweat of their faces, according to the Commandment of God, Genesis the first, to give other idle people, by their example occasion to go to labour.

These holy idle Thieves to the Carts, to be whipped naked about every Market Town, till they fall to labour, that they by their importunate begging, take not away the Alms that the good Christian people would give unto us, fore, impotent, miserable people, your Beadmen. Then shall as well the number of our fore-said monstrous sort, as of the Bawds, Whores, Thieves, and idle people decrease. Then shall these great yearly Exactions cease. Then shall not your Sword, Power, Crown, Dignity, and Obedience of your People be translated from you. Then shall you have full obedience of your people. Then shall the idle people be set to work. Then shall Matrimony be much better kept. Then shall the Generation of your people be increased. Then shall your Commons increase in riches. Then shall the Gospel be preached. Then shall none beg our Alms from us. Then shall we have enough, and more than shall suffice us; which shall be the best Hospital that ever was founded for us. Then shall we daily pray to God for your most noble estate long to endure.

Against this Book of the Beggars, above prefixed, being written in the time of the Cardinal, another contrary Book or Supplication was devised and written shortly upon the same, by one Sir Thomas More Knight, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, under the Name and Title of, The poor silly souls perishing out of Purgatory. In the which Book, after that the said Master More, Writer thereof, had first divided the whole World into four parts, that is, into Heaven, Hell, Middle-Earth, and Purgatory; then he maketh the dead mens souls, by a Rhetorical Prosopopeia, to speak out of Purgatory pin-fold, sometimes lamentably complaining, sometimes pleasantly dallying and scoffing at the Author of the Beggars Book; sometimes scolding and railing at him, calling him Fool, Witless, Frantick, an Ass, a Goote, a mad Dog, an Heretick, and all that naught is. And no marvel, if these silly souls of Purgatory seem to furnish and tell; for heat (ye know) is telly, and soon inflameth choler. But yet these Purgatory souls must take good heed how they call a man Fool and Heretick so often; for if the sentence of the Gospel do pronounce them guilty of Hell Fire, which say, Fool, Fool, it may be doubted, lest those poor silly melancholy souls of Purgatory, calling this man Fool so oft as they have done, do bring themselves thereby out of Purgatory fire to the fire of Hell, by that just sentence of the Gospel, so that neither the five wounds of Saint Francis, nor all the merits of Saint Dominick, nor yet of all the Priests, can release them poor wretches. But yet forasmuch as I do not, nor cannot think that those departed souls either would so far overthrow themselves if they were in Purgatory, or else that there is any such fourth place of Purgatory at all (unless it be in Master More's Utopia) as Master More's Poetical Vein doth imagine, I cease therefore to burden the souls departed, and lay all the wit on Master More, the Author and Contriver of this Poetical Book, for not keeping Decorum personae, as a perfect Poet should have done. They that give precepts of Art do note this in all Poetical Fictions, as a special observation, to foresee and express what is convenient for every person, according to his degree and condition to speak and utter. Wherefore if it be true that Master More saith in the sequel of his Book, that grace and charity increaseth in them that lie in the pains of Purgatory, then is it not agreeable, that such souls lying so long in Purgatory, should so soon forget their charity, and fall a railing in their Supplication so humbly, both against this man

KING with such opprobrious and unfitting terms, and also against John Badby, Richard Horndon, John Gosfe, Lord Cokham, and other Martyrs of the Lord burned for his Word; also against Luther, William Tindal, Richard Hun, and other more, falsely belying the Doctrine by them taught and defended; which is not like that such charitable souls of Purgatory would ever do, neither were it convenient for them in that case; which indeed, though their Doctrine were false, should redound to the more increase of their pain. Again, where the Bishop of Rochester defineth the Angels to be Ministers to Purgatory souls, some will think peradventure Master More to have misfed some part of his Decorum, in making the evil Spirit of the Author, and the Devil to be messenger, between middle-Earth and Purgatory, in bringing tidings to the prisoned souls, both of the Book, and of the name of the marker.

Mr. More's Anticks. Now, as touching the manner how this Devil came into Purgatory, laughing, grinning, and gnashing his teeth, in looth it makes me to laugh, to see the merry Anticks of Master More. Belike then this was some merry Devil, or else had eaten with his teeth some Nasfureum before; which coming into Purgatory, to shew the name of this man, could not tell his tale without laughing. But this was (saith he) an envious and an envious laughing, joyed with grinning and gnashing of teeth. And immediately upon the same, was contrived this scoffing and railing Supplication of the pewling souls of Purgatory, as he himself doth term them. So then, here was envying, envying, laughing, grinning, gnashing of teeth, pewling, scoffing, railing and begging, and all together to make a very black Sanctus in Purgatory. Indeed we read in Scripture, that there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth in Hell, where the souls and bodies of men shall be tormented. But who would ever have thought before, that the evil Angel of this man, that made the Book of Beggars, being a spiritual and no corporal substance, had teeth to gnash, and a mouth to grin? But where then stood Master More, I marvel all this mean while, to see the Devil laugh with his mouth so wide, that the souls of Purgatory might see all his teeth? Belike, this was in Utopia, where Master More's Purgatory is founded; but because Mr. More is hence departed, I leave him with his merry Anticks.

A black Sanctus in Purgatory.

The answer of J. Frith against Mr. More's Purgatory. And as touching, his Books of Purgatory, which he hath left behind, because John Frith hath learnedly and effectuously overthrown the same, I will therefore refer the Reader to him, while I repair again (the Lord willing) to the History.

Provision by the Bishops against Seditious books.

After, that the Clergy of England, and especially the Cardinal, understood these Books of the Beggars Supplication aforesaid, to be strawn abroad in the Streets of London, and also before the King, the said Cardinal caused not only his servants diligently to attend to gather them up, that they should not come into the Kings hands, but also when he understood, that the King had received one or two of them, he came unto the Kings Majesty, saying, if it shall please your Grace, here are divers seditious persons which have scattered abroad Books containing manifest Errors and Heresies; desiring his Grace to beware of them. Whereupon the King, putting his hand in his bosom, took out one of the Books, and delivered it unto the Cardinal. Then the Cardinal, together with his Bishops, consulted how they might provide a speedy remedy for this mischief, and thereupon determined to give out a Commission to forbid the reading of all English Books, and namely, this Book of Beggars, and the New Testament of Tindal's Translation, which was done out of hand by Cuthbert Tonsil Bishop of London, who sent out his Prohibition unto his Archdeacons with all speed, for the forbidding of that Book and divers other more; the tenor of which Prohibition here followeth.

A Prohibition sent out by Cuthbert Tonsil, Bishop of London, to the Archdeacons of his Diocese, for the calling in of the New Testaments translated into English, with divers other Books; the Catalogue whereof hereafter insueth.

CUTHBERT by the permission of God, Bishop of London, unto our wellbeloved in Christ, the Archdeacon of London, or to his Official, Health, Grace and Benediction. By the duty of our Pastoral office, we are bound diligently with all our power to foresee, provide for, root out, and put away all those things, which seem to tend to the peril and danger of our Subjects, and specially the destruction of their souls. Wherefore we having understanding, by the report of divers credible persons, and also by the evident appearance of the matter, that many children of iniquity, maintainers of Luther's Sect, blinded through extreme wickedness, wandering from the way of truth, and the Catholick Faith, craftily have translated the New Testament into English Tongue, intermeddling therewith many Heretical Articles, and erroneous Opinions, pernicious and offensive, seducing the simple people, attempting by their wicked and perverse interpretations, to prophanate the Majesty of the Scripture, which hitherto hath remained undefiled, and craftily to abuse the most holy Word of God, and the true sense of the same, of the which Translation there are many Books printed, some with glosses, and some without, containing in the English Tongue that pestiferous and most pernicious poison dispersed throughout all the Dioceses of London in great number; which truly, without it be foreseen, without doubt will contaminate and infect the flock committed unto us, with most deadly poison and Heresie, to the grievous peril and danger of the souls committed to our charge, and the offence of Gods Divine Majesty: Wherefore, we Cuthbert, the Bishop aforesaid, grievously forswearing for the premises, willing to withstand the craft and subtlety of the ancient enemy and his ministers, which seek the destruction of my flock, and with a diligent care to take heed unto the flock committed to my charge, desiring to provide speedy remedies for the premises, do charge you joyntly and severally, and by virtue of your obedience strictly injoin and command you, that by our authority you warn, or cause to be warned all and singular, as well exempt as not exempt, dwelling within your Archdeaconsries, that within thirty days space, whereof ten days shall be for the first, ten for the second, and ten for the third and peremptory term, under pain of Excommunication, and incurring the suspension of Heresie, they do bring in, and really deliver unto our Vicar general, all and singular such Books as contain the Translation of the New Testament in the English Tongue; and that you do certify us, of our said Commissary, within two Months after the day of the date of these Presents, duly, personally, or by your Letters, together with these presents, under your seals, what you have done in the premises, under pain of contempt.

Given under our Seal, the three and twentieth of October, in the fifth year of our Consecration, Anno 1526.

The like Commission in like manner and form was sent to the other three Archdeacons of Middlesex, Essex and Colechester, for the execution of the same matter, under the Bishops Seal.

The New Testament, in the Catalogue above recited, began first to be translated by William Tindal, and so came forth in Print, about the year of our Lord 1529, wherewith Cuthbert Tinsal Bishop of London, with Sir Thomas More, being fore aggrieved, devised how to destroy that false erroneous Translation, as he called it. It happened that one Augustine Packington a Mercer, was then at Antwerp, where the Bishop was. This man favoured Tindal, but shewed the contrary unto the Bishop. The Bishop, being desirous to bring his purpose to pass, communed how that he would gladly buy the New Testaments. Packington hearing him say so, said, My Lord, I can do more in this matter, than most Merchants that be here, if it be your pleasure; for I know the Dutchmen and strangers that have bought them of Tindal, and have them here to sell, so that if it be your Lordship's pleasure, I must disburse money to pay for them, or else I cannot have them; and so I will assure you to have every Book of them that is printed and unsold. The Bishop thinking he had God by the Toe, said, Do your diligence, gentle Master Packington, get them for me, and I will pay whatsoever they cost; for I intend to burn and destroy them all at Pauls Cross. This Augustine Packington went unto William Tindal, and declared the whole matter, and so, upon contract made between them, the Bishop of London had the Books, Packington had the thanks, and Tindal had the money. After this Tindal corrected the same New Testaments again, and caused them to be newly imprinted, so that they came thick and threefold over into England. When the Bishop perceived that, he sent for Packington, and said to him, How cometh this that there are so many New Testaments abroad? you promised me that you would buy them all. Then answered Packington, Surely, I bought all that were to be had. But I perceive they have printed more since. I see it will never be better so long as they have Letters and Stamps: Wherefore you were best to buy the Stamps too, and so you shall be sure. At which answer the Bishop smiled, and so the matter ended.

In short space after, it fortuned that George Constantine was apprehended by Sir Thomas More, which was then Chancellor of England, suspected of certain Heresies during the time that he was in the custody of Master More. After divers communications, amongst other things, Master More asked of him, saying, Constantine, I would have thee be plain with me in one thing that I will ask, and I promise thee, I will shew thee favour in all other things whereof thou art accused. There is beyond the Sea, Tindal, Joy, and a great many of you, I know they cannot live without help. There are some that help and succour them with money, and thou being one of them hadst thy part thereof, and therefore knowest from whence it came. I pray thee tell me, who be they that help them thus? My Lord, quoth Constantine, I will tell you truly; it is the Bishop of London that hath helped us, for he hath bestowed among us a great deal of money upon New Testaments to burn them, and that hath been, and yet is our only succour and comfort. Now by my truch, quoth More, I think even the same; for so much I told the Bishop before he went about it.

Of this George Constantine, moreover it is reported by Sir Thomas More, that he being taken and in hold, seemed well contented to renounce his former Doctrine, and not only to disclose certain other of his fellows, but also studied and devised, how these Books, which he himself, and other of his fellows had brought and shipped, Augustine Packington the Bishop of London's Merchant.

Shipped, might come to the Bishops hands to be burned, and shewed to the aforesaid Sir Thomas More, Chancellor, the Ship-mans name that had them, and the marks of the Fardels, by the which the Books afterward were taken and burned. Besides this, he is reported also to have disclosed divers of his Companions, of whom some were abjured after, some had abjured before, as Richard Nelson, who was committed to Newgate upon the same, and is thought there to have died in prison, or else had not escaped their hands, but should have suffered burning, if the report of Master More be to be credited. More in his Preface against Tindal.

George Constans a disloyal of his fellows

George Constans a trouble of Fear of St. Davids

Notwithstanding the same Constans afterward, by the help of some of his friends, escaped out of prison over the Seas, and after that, in the time of King Edward, was one of them that troubled the good Bishop of St. Davids, which after in Queen Maries time was burned. But of Constans enough.

Mention was made in the leaf before, how the Bishops had procured of the King a Proclamation to be set forth in the year of our Lord 1529, for the abolishing of divers Books aforesaid, and also for the withstanding of all such as taught or preached any thing against the dignity and ordinances of the Church of Rome. Upon this Proclamation ensued great persecution and trouble against the poor innocent flock of Christ, as here following you may see, with the said Proclamation also prefixed before the same, the tenour whereof is this.

A Proclamation for resisting and withstanding of most damnable Heresies, sown within this Realm by the Disciples of Luther, and other Hereticks, perverters of Christs Religion.

This Proclamation was made throughout all England the year of our Lord, 1519, and the 7 year of & Henry the Eighth

THE King our Sovereign Lord, of his most virtuous and gracious disposition, considering that this noble Realm of England hath of long time continued in the true Catholick Faith of Christs Religion, and that his noble Progenitors, Kings of this his said Realm, have before this time made and Enacted many devout Laws, Statutes and Ordinances, for the maintenance and defence of the said Faith against the malicious and wicked Sects of Hereticks and Lollards, who by perversion of Holy Scripture do induce Erroneous opinions, sow sedition amongst Christian people, and finally disturb the peace and tranquillity of Christian Realms, as lately happened in some parts of Germany, where by the procurement and sedition of Martin Luther, and other Hereticks, were slain an infinite number of Christian people; considering also, that as well by the corruption and malice of indiscreet Preachers, fators of the said Erroneous Sects, as by certain Heretical and blasphemous Books lately made, and privily sent into this Realm, by the Disciples, fators and adherents of the said Martin Luther, and other Hereticks the Kings subjects, are like to be corrupted, unless his Highness (as the Defender of the Faith) do put to his most gracious help and Authority Royal, to the due and speedy reformation thereof: his Highness therefore like a most gracious Prince, of his blessed and virtuous disposition, for the incomparable zeal which he hath to Christs Religion and Faith, and for the singular love and affection that he beareth to all his good subjects of this Realm, and specially to the salvation of their souls, according to his office and duty in that behalf, will and intendeth to provide with all convenient expedition, that this his noble Realm may be preserved from the said perilous, cursed, and seditious errors. And inasmuch as his Highness is credibly informed, that some of the said Errors be already sown and spread within this his Realm, partly by the corruption of indiscreet Preachers, partly by Erroneous Books, compiled, printed and written, as well in the English Tongue, as in Latin and other Languages, repleat with most venomous Heresies, blasphemies, and slanders, intolerable to the clean ears of any good Christian man: his Highness therefore like a most Gracious and Christian Prince, only intending the safeguard of this his Realm, the preservation of his subjects, and salvation of their souls, willesh now to put in execution, with all diligence possible, all good Laws, Statutes and Ordinances, concerning the premises before this time provided, made, and ordained by his most noble Progenitors, Kings of England for that purpose and intent. Which Laws and Statutes by our Sovereign Lord, and his most Honourable Council, by long and deliberate advice for the extirpation, suppressing and withstanding of the said Heresies, have been seen, examined, and by them in every part thought good and necessary to be put in execution.

Wherefore his Highness chargeth and straitly commandeth all and every his Lords Spiritual and Temporal, Judges, Justices of Peace, Sheriffs, Mayors, Bayliffs, Constables, and all other his Officers, Ministers, and all his true and loving subjects, that all favour, affection, and partiality laid apart, they effectually, with all diligence and study endeavour themselves substantially for the executing of all and every of the Articles hereafter ensuing, without dissimulation, intermission, or excuse, as they will avoid his high indignation and displeasure.

First, That no man within the Kings Realm, or other his Dominions subject to his Highness, hereafter presume to preach, teach, or inform any thing openly or privily, or compile and write any Book, or hold, exercise, or keep any Assemblies or Schools, in any manner of wise, contrary to the Catholick Faith, or determination of Holy Church; nor that any person within this his said Realm and Dominions do presume to preach openly or secretly, without they have first obtained license of the Bishop of the Dioceses where they intend to preach; Curates in their Parishes, persons privileged, and other by the Law of the Church only except.

Also that no man wittingly hereafter, favour, support, or maintain any person, which preacheth in form aforesaid, or maketh any such or like Conventicles and Assemblies, holdeth or exerciseth any Schools, maketh, writeth, or publisheth any such Book, teacheth, informeth, or stirreth the people, or any of them, in any manner of form to the said errors. Maxwell and Stacy, Londoners.

This Richard Bayfield, sometime a Monk of Bury, was converted by Doctor Barns, and two godly men of London, Brickmakers, Master Maxwell, and Master Stacy, Wardens of their Company. Who were grafted in the Doctrine of Jesus Christ, and through their godly conversation of life, converted many men and women, both in the said Country: and once a year of their own cost, went about to visit the Brethren and Sisters scattered abroad. Doctor Barns at that time, much resorted to the Abbey of Bury, where Bayfield was, to one Doctor Ruffam, who had been at Louane together Students. At that time it happened that this Bayfield the Monk was Chamberlain of the house to provide lodging for the strangers, and to see them well entertained: who delighted much in Doctor Barns talk, and in the other lay-mens talk, afore rehearsed; and at the last, Doctor Barns gave him a New Testament in Latin, and the other two gave him Tyndals Testament in English, with a Book called, The wicked Mammon, and the obedience of a Christian man: wherein he was commanded to mightily in two years space, that he was cast into the prison of his house, there fore whipped, with a Gag in his mouth, and then stocked, and so continued in the same torment three quarters of a year before Doctor Barns could get him out; which he brought to pass, by the means of Doctor Ruffam aforesaid, and so he was committed to Doctor Barns to go to Cambridge with him. By that time he had been there a good while, he talked so well of good Letters, that he never returned home again to his Abbey, but went to London to Maxwell and Stacy, and they kept him secretly a while, and so conveyed him beyond the Sea; Doctor Barns being then in the Fleet for Gods Word. This Bayfield mightily prospered in the knowledge of God, and was beneficial to Master Tyndal, and Master Frisch: for he brought substance with him, and was their own hand, and sold all their works, and the German works, both in France and in England, and at the last coming to London, to Mr. Smiths house in Bucklers-Bury, there was he betrayed, and dogged from that house to his Book-binders in Mark-Lane, and there taken, and carried to Lollards Tower, and from thence to the Coalhouse, by reason that one Parion Pastmore, Parion of Murbaddam in Essex, then lying in Lollards Towers, was in the Doctrine and in the Kingdom of Christ there confirmed by him. This Parion Pastmore, after long trouble was abjured and condemned by the Bishops to perpetual prison, and delivered afterward by the Kings pardon, as more appareth in the sequel of his story among abjurors, &c. He was taken, because he married his Priests in those days. He had always Com plenty, and when the Markets were very dear, he would fend plenty of his Com thither to pluck down the prices thereof.

handling of R. Bayfield in the Col-lehouse.

This Richard Bayfield being in the Colehouse, was worse handled than he was before in the Lollards Tower; for there he was tyed both by the neck, middle, and legs, standing upright by the walls, divers times manacled, to accuse other that had bought his Books; but he accused none, but stood to his Religion and Confession of his Faith, even unto the very end, and was in the Confilory of Pauls thrice put to his trial, whether he would abjure or no? He said he would dispute for his Faith, and so did to their great shame; Stokesley then being his Judge, with the assistance of Winchester, and other Bishops, whereof here followeth now the circumstance in order to be seen.

The Articles laid to Richard Bayfield, by the foresaid Bishops, were these, Anno 1531. November 10.

Articles laid to Richard Bayfield.

Articles objected against Rich.
Bayfield.

First, That he had been many years a Monk, professed of the Order of Saint Bennet, of Saint Edmundsbury in the Diocese of Norwich.

2. That he was a Priest, and had ministered and continued in the same order the space of nine or ten years.

3. That since the Feast of Easter last, he being beyond the Sea, bought and procured to have divers and many Books and Treatises of sundry sorts, as well of Martin Luthers own Works, as of divers other of his damnable Self, and of Oecolampadius the great Heretick, and divers other Hereticks, both in Latin and English: the names of which Books were contained in a little Bill written with his own hand.

4. That in the year of our Lord 1528, he was detected and accused to Cuthbert then Bishop of London, for affirming and holding certain Articles contrary to the Holy Church, and especially that all laud and praise should be given to God alone, and not to Saints or Creatures.

5. That every Priest might preach the Word of God by the authority of the Gospel, and not to run to the Pope or Cardinals for license, as it appeared (said they) by his confession before the said Bishop.

6. That he judicially abjured the said Articles before the said Bishop, and did renounce and forswear them and all other Articles contrary to the determination of Holy Church, promising that from thenceforth he would not fall into any of them, nor any other errors.

7. That he made a solemn Oath upon a Book, and the Holy Evangelists, to fulfill such penance as should be enjoined him by the said Bishop.

8. After his Abjuration it was enjoined to him for penance, that he should go before the Crag in procession, in the Parish-Church of Saint Butolphs at Billingsgate, and to bear a Fagot of wood upon his shoulder.

9. It was enjoined him in penance, that he should provide an habit requisite and meet for his Order and profession, as shortly as he might, and that he should come or go no where without such an habit: the which he had not fulfilled.

10. That it was likewise enjoined him in penance, that he should sometime before the Feast of the Ascension, then next ensuing his Abjuration, go home unto the Monastery of Bury, and there remain according to the vow of his profession: which he had not fulfilled.

11. That he was appointed by the said Bishop of London to appear before the said Bishop the five and twentieth day of April next after his Abjuration, to receive the residue of his penance, and after his Abjuration, he fled beyond the Sea, and appeared not.

12. That the twentieth day of June next following his Abjuration, he did appear before the said Bishop Tonstall, in the Chappel of the Bishop of Norwichs place, and there it was newly enjoined him in part of penance, that he should provide him an habit convenient for his Order and profession, within eight days then next following: which he had not done.

13. That it was there again enjoined him, that he should depart from the City, Diocese, and Jurisdiction of London, and no more to come within it, without the special license of the Bishop of London, or his successor for the time being: which he had not fulfilled.

The Answer of Richard Bayfield to the Articles prefixed.

TO the first Article he confessed, that he was professed a Monk in the Monastery aforesaid, in the year 1514.

To the second Article he answered, That he was a Priest and took Orders, Anno 1518.

To the third Article he confessed the Bill and Schedule to be written with his hand, which is annexed therunto, and that he brought over the said Books and Works a year and a half past, and a great number of every sort. Being further demanded for what intent he brought them into the Realm; he answered, To the intent that the Gospel of Christ might be set forward, and God the more glorified in this Realm amongst Christian people; and that he had sold and dispersed many of those Books before named, to sundry persons within this Realm, and to divers of the Dioceses of London. Being further demanded, whether Martin Luther was condemned as an Heretick by the Pope? he answered, That he heard say, that Martin Luther was of Luthers Sect; and being demanded, whether Zuingleus was of Luthers Sect; he answered, that he never spake with him. Being asked whether Zuingleus was a Catholic; he answered, that he could not tell. Being inquired

KING inquired whether the Books contained in the Schedules did contain any errors in them; he said, he could not tell, neither could he judge. Also he confessed, That the common fame hath been within these two or three years, that Oecolampadius and Zuinglius be Hereticks; also that such as lean to Martin Luther be Hereticks. Also he confessed, That being beyond the Sea, he heard say before he brought into this Realm the Books contained in the said Bills, that the King had by Proclamation prohibited, That no man should bring into this Realm any of Martin Luther's Books, or of his Sect.

Which Confession thus ended, the Bishop appointed him to appear the next day.

Saturday being the eleventh of November, Richard Bayfield appeared, and acknowledged the answers that he had made in the Session the day before. Which thing done, the Official objected the fourth Article unto him. VVhereunto he answered, that he could not tell whether there was any Heresies in them; for he had read no Heresies in them. And being demanded whether he had read any of those Books; he answered, that he had read the greater part of them here and there, but not throughout.

He was demanded, whether he believed the famed Books to be good, and of the true Faith. He answered, that he judged they were good, and of the true Faith. Being inquired what Books he read in the Realm; he said, that he had read the New Testament in Latin, and other Books mentioned in the Bills, but he said, that he read none translated: notwithstanding he confessed that he had read a Book called Thorp, in the presence and audience of others, and also a Book of John Frith's Purgatory, which he had read to himself alone, as he said; and also had read to himself a Book called, The practise of Prelates; and also said, that he had read a Book called, The Parable of the wicked Mammon, but in the presence and hearing of others which he knew not.

Also he confessed that he had read the Obedience of a Christian man, and the Sum of Scriptures among company, and also the Dialogue betwixt the Plowman and the Gensleman, among company as he thought: also he had read a piece of the answer of Tindal made to Sir Thomas More; likewise he had read the Dialogue of Frith to himself: he had read also the Prologues of the five Books of Moses, contained in the long Schedule, and in company as he thought.

All which Books he had read under manner afore said within these two years last past. And as for the New Testament in English, he read it before he had read these Books specified in the Schedule before rehearsed.

To the third Article as touching Zuinglius and others, he supposed that they held the same Doctrine that Luther did; but that he thought them to vary in some points.

The sixteenth day of November, Richard Bayfield appeared again before the Bishop, who inquired of him of what sect Zuinglius was. He said, he thought that he held with Luther in some points, &c.

Also he confessed, that first he brought Books of the sorts above named into this Realm, about Midsummer was twelve month, and landed them at Colebecker, and afterward brought part of them to this City, and some he disposed and sold in this City. The second time that he brought Books was about All-Hallowtide was twelve month, and landed them at St. Catharines; the which Books the Lord Chancellor took from him. Also that at Easter last was the third time that he brought over the Books now shewed unto him, and contained in these two Bills, and landed with them in Northfolk, and from thence brought them to the City of London in a Male.

To the fifth, sixth, and seventh Articles, he answered and confessed them to be true.

To the eighth he answered, that it was enjoyed him as is contained in the Article; the which injunction he fulfilled.

To the ninth he answered, that he did not remember it.

To the tenth he answered, that it was enjoyed him that he should go to the Abbey of Bury, and there continue: the which he said he did three times; but he did not wear his Monks Cowl, as he was enjoined.

The eleventh Article he confessed.

For the twelfth article, that he did not wear his Monks habit according to the Abjuration, he referred himself to the Acts whether he were so enjoined or no.

To the thirteenth Article he said, that he did not remember the contents thereof, but referred himself to the Acts. Notwithstanding he confessed that he had no license of the Bishop of London to come to the City or Diocets of London, nor to make any abode there.

The Sentence given against him in a case of Relapse.

IN the Name of God, Amen. VVe John by the sufferance of God, Bishop of London, in a case of Inquisition of Heretic, and relapse of the same, hith begun before Mr. Rich. Foxford, Doctor of both Laws, our Official, now depending before us undesided, against thee Richard Bayfield Priest and Monk, professed to the order and rule of Saint Benedict, in the Monastery of Saint Edmundsbury, in the Diocets of Norwich, and by means of the causes within written under our jurisdiction, and with all favour rightly and lawfully proceeding, with all favour possible, the merits and circumstances of the causes in this Inquisition heard, weighed, underlooked, and fully discussed by us the said Bishop, referring unto our selves that which by Law ought to be referred; have thought good to proceed in this manner to the pronouncing of our definitive sentence.

Forasmuch as by the Acts enacted, inquired, propounded, and alledged, and by thee judicially confessed, we do find that thou hast abjured certain Errors and Heresies, and damnable opinions by thee confessed, as well particularly as generally, before our reverend Fellow and Brother, then thy Ordinary, according to the form and order of the Church: and that one Martin Luther, together with his adherents and complices, receivers and favourers, whatsoever they be, was condemned as an Heretic by the authority of Pope Leo the Tenth, of most happy memory, and by the authority of the Apostolick See, and the Books and all writings, Schedules and Sermons of the said Martin Luther, his adherents and complices, whether they be found in Latin, or in any other languages imprinted or translated, for the manifold Heresies and Errors, and damnable opinions that are in them, are condemned, reprov'd, and utterly rejected, and inhibition made by the authority of the said See, to all faithful Christians, under the pain of Excommunication, and other punishments in that behalf to be incurred by the Law, that no man by any means presume to read, teach, hear, imprint, or publish, or by any do means defend, directly or indirectly, secretly or openly, in their houses, or in any other publick or private places, any such manner of Writings, Books, Errors, or Articles, as are contained more at large in the Apostolick Letters, drawn out in form of a publick Instrument; whereunto and to the contents thereof we refer our selves as far as is expedient, and no otherwise. And forasmuch as we do perceive that thou diddest understand the premises, and yet these things notwithstanding after thy Abjuration made (as is afore said) thou hast brought in divers and sundry times many Books of the said Martin Luther, and his adherents and complices, and of other Hereticks, the names, Titles and Authors of which Books here follow, and are these, Martin Luther, Of the abrogating of the private Mass. The Declarations of Martin Luther upon the Epistles of St. Peter. Luther upon the Epistles of Saint Paul and Jude. Luther upon Monastick Vowes. Luthers Commentary upon the Epistle of Saint Paul to the Galatians. Johannes Oecolampadius, upon the Exposition of these words, Hoc est corpus meum. The Annotations of Oecolampadius upon the Epistles of Saint Paul unto the Romans. Oecolampadius his Commentary upon the three last Prophets, Aggeus, Zachary, and Malachy. The Sermons of Oecolampadius upon the Catholick Epistles of John. A Book of Annotations upon Genesis, gathered by Huldricus Zuinglius. The Commentaries of Pomeran, upon four Chapters of the first Epistle to the Corinthians. Annotations of Pomeran upon Deuteronomy and Samuel. Pomeran upon the Psalms.

Of all which kind of Books, both in Latin and English, translated, set forth, and imprinted, containing not only Lutheran Heresies, but also the damnable Heresies of other Hereticks condemned; forasmuch as thou hast brought over from the parties beyond the Sea, a great number into this Realm of England, and specially to our City and Diocesis of London, and hast procured them to be brought and conveyed over, also hast kept by thee, and studied those Books, and hast published and read them unto divers Christian men, and many of those Books also hast dispersed and given unto divers persons dwelling within our City and Diocesis of London, and hast confessed and affirmed before our Official, That those Books of Martin Luther and other Hereticks his complices and adherents, and all the contents in them are good and agreeable to the true Faith: saying thus, That they are good, and of the true Faith: And by this means and pretence hast commended and praised Martin Luther, his adherents and complices, and hast favoured and believed their Errors, Heresies, and opinions. Therefore we John the Bishop aforesaid, first calling upon the Name of Christ, and setting God only before our eyes; by the counsel and consent of the Divines and Lawyers, with whom in this behalf we have conferred, do declare and decree thee the aforesaid

If Christ were before your eyes, ye would not condemn this good man for these good Books.

Richard Bayfield, otherwise called Somersham, for the contempt of thy Abjuration, as a favourer of the aforesaid Martin Luther, his adherents, complices, favourers, and other condemned Hereticks, and for commending and studying, reading, having, retaining, publishing, selling, giving and dispersing the Books and Writings, as well of the said Martin Luther, his adherents, and disciples, as of other Hereticks before named, and also for crediting and maintaining the Errors, Heresies, and damnable opinions contained in the said Books and Writings, worthily to be and have been an Heretick; and that thou by the pretence of the premisses art fallen again most damnable into Heresie; and we pronounce that thou art and hast been a relapsed Heretick, and hast incurred and oughtest to incur the pain and punishment of a relapse: and we do decree and declare, and also condemn thee thereunto, and that by the pretence of the premisses, thou hast even by the Law incurred the sentence of the greater Excommunication; and thereby we pronounce and declare thee to have been and to be Excommunicate, and clearly discharge, exonerate, and degrade thee from all privilege and prerogative of the Ecclesiastical Orders, and also deprive thee of all Ecclesiastical Office and Benefice; also we pronounce and declare thee, by this our sentence or decree, the which we here promulgate and declare in these writings, that thou art actually to be degraded, deposed, and deprived, as followeth.

In the Name of God, Amen. We John by the permission of God Bishop of London, rightfully and lawfully proceeding in this behalf, do dismiss thee Richard Bayfield, alias Somersham, being pronounced by us a relapsed Heretick, and degraded by us from all Ecclesiastical privilege out of the Ecclesiastical Court, pronouncing that the secular power here present should receive thee under their jurisdiction; earnestly requiring and desiring in the bowels of Jesus Christ, that the execution of this worthy punishment to be done upon thee, and against thee in this behalf, may be so moderated, that there be neither overmuch cruelty, neither too much favourable gentleness, but that it may be to the health and salvation of thy soul, and to the extirpation, fear, terror, and conversion of all other Hereticks unto the unity of the Catholic Faith. Thus our final decree by this our sentence definitive we have caused to be published in form aforesaid.

Monday the twentieth of November 1531, in the Quire of the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, before the said John Bishop of London judicially sitting, being assisted with John Abbot of Westminster, and Robert Abbot of Waltham, Nicholas Prior of Christ Church in London, these Honourable Lords being also present, Henry Earl of Essex, Richard Gray, Brother to the Marquess of Somerset, John Lambert Mayor of London, Richard Gresham, and Edward Altam Sheriffs, (the which Mayor and Sheriffs were required to be there present by the Bishop of London's Letters hereafter written, and by virtue of a Statute of King Henry the Fourth, King of England) also in the presence of divers Canons, the Chancellor, Official, and the Archdeacon of London, with the Bishops Chaplains, and a great number both of the Clergy and Laity; Matthew Greffon the Register, being also there present: Master Richard Bayfield, alias Somersham, was brought forth by Thomas Turner the Apparator his Keeper, in whose presence the transumpt of the Apostolic Bull of Pope Leo the Tenth, upon the condemnation of Martin Luther and his adherents, was brought forth and shewed, sealed with the seal of Thomas Wolsey late Legate de Latere, and subscribed with the sign and name of Master Robert Turnes, public Notary, and also the Decree upon the condemnation of certain Books brought in by him, sealed with the Seals of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and subscribed by three Notaries.

Then the Bishop of London repeated in effect before him his Abjuration which he had before made, and other his demerits committed and done beside his Abjuration: And the said Bayfield said, That he was not culpable in the Articles that were objected against him, and desired that the Heresies contained in the Books which he brought over might be declared in open audience. Then the Bishop after certain talk had with the said Bayfield as touching the desert of his cause, asked him, Whether he could shew any cause why he should not be delivered over unto the secular power, and be pronounced as a relapse, and suffer punishment as a relapse. The said Bayfield declared or propounded no cause, but said that he brought over those Books for lack of money, and not to sow any Heresies. And incontinent the said Bayfield with a vehement spirit (as it appeared) said unto the Bishop of London. The life of you of the Spirituality is so evil, that ye be Hereticks, and ye do not only live evil, but do maintain evil living, and also do let, that what true living is may not be known; and said, that their living is against Christs Gospel, and that their belief was never taken of Christs Church. Then the said Bishop, after long deliberation had, for so much as the KING said Richard Bayfield, he said, could shew no cause why he should not be declared as a relaps, read the Decree and sentence against him: by the which amongst other things he condemned him as an Heretick, and pronounced him to be punished with the punishment due unto such as fall again into Heresie, and by his words did degrade him, and also declared that he should be actually degraded, as is more at large contained in the long sentence.

Bayfield.

The foresaid sentence being so read by the Bishop of London, he proceeded immediately to the actual and solemn degrading of the said Rich. Bayfield, alias Somersham, and there solemnly and actually degraded him before the people; the which thing being done, he dismissed him by the sentence aforesaid from the Ecclesiastical Court. Whereupon the secular power, being there present, received him into their jurisdiction, without any writ in that behalf obtained, but only by virtue of the Bishops Letters by the Statute of King Henry the Fourth, in that behalf provided and directed unto them under the Bishops Seal. The tenor of which Letters hereafter follow.

John by the permission of God Bishop of London, unto our dearly beloved in Christ, the right honourable Lord Mayor of the City of London, and the Sheriffs of the same, Health, Grace, and Benediction. Whereas we have already by our Vicar general, proceeded in a certain cause of Heresie, and relaps into the same against one Richard Bayfield alias Somersham, and intend upon Monday next being the twentieth day of this present month of November, to give a sentence definitive against the said Richard Bayfield alias Somersham, and to leave and deliver him over unto the secular power: We require you the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs aforesaid, the Kings Majesties Vicegerents, even in the bowels of Jesus Christ, that according to the form and effect of the Statute of our most Noble and famous Prince in Christ our Lord, the Lord Henry the Fourth, by the Grace of God late King of England, you will be personally presents in the Quire of the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, with your favourable aid and assistance in this behalf, the day that the sentence shall be given, and to receive the said Richard Bayfield, alias Somersham, after his sentence so given, to discharge us and our Officers, and to do further according to the tenor and effect of the said Statute, as far as shall be required of you according to the Canonical sanctions, and the laudable custom of the famous Kingdom of England, in this behalf accustomed. In witness whereof we have set our Seal unto this present. Dated the nineteenth day of November, Anno 1531, and in the first year of our consecration.

On Monday the 20 day of November in the year aforesaid in the Quire of the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul, the Bishop of London calling unto him John Abbat of Westminster, Robert Abbat of Waltham, Nicholas Prior of Christs Church of the City of London, Master J. Cox Auditor and Vicar General to the Archbishop of Canterbury, Peter Ligham, Official of the Court of Canterbury, Thomas Bagh, Chancellor of the Church of Saint Pauls, William Cliffe, Archdeacon of London, John Incent Canon Residentiary of the same, William Britton, Robert Birck, and Hugh A-price, Doctors of both Laws, in the presence of us Matthew Griffon Register, Anthony Hufise, Richard Martine, and Thomas Shadwall publick Notaries and Scribes appointed in this behalf, briefly rehearsed the answers of the same Bayfield in effect, and his abjuration, and order his demerits by him done betide his abjuration. The which religious persons, and other Ecclesiastical men aforesaid; thought it good and agreed that the said Bishop should proceed against him in this case of relaps, and should pronounce, and give forth the sentence against him in case aforesaid; and so he was delivered to the Sheriffs to carry to Newgate, being commanded to bring him again upon Monday following into Pauls upper Quire, there to give attendance upon the Bishop of London with the residue till they had done with him; and by and by the Sheriffs were commanded to have him into the Vestry, and then to bring him forth again in Antichrists apparel to be degraded before them. When he had degraded him kneeling upon the highest step of the Altar, he took his Crozier staff, and smote him on the brest, that he threw him down backwards, and brake his head, that he founded, and when he came to himself again, he thanked God that he was delivered from the malignant Church of Antichrist, and that he was come into the true sincere Church of Jesus Christ militant here in Earth ; and I trust anon, said he, to be in Heaven with Jesus Christ, and the Church Triumphant for ever : and so was he led forth through the Quire to Newgate, and there relict about an hour in prayer, and so went to the Fire in his apparel manfully and joyfully, and there, for lack of a speedy Fire, was half an hour alive. And when the left Arm was on Fire and burned, he rubbed it with his right hand, and it fell from his body, and he continued in prayer to the end without moving.

Sir Thomas More, after he had brought this good man to his end, sealed not to after his death rake in his Almes, to pry and spy out what sparks he could find of reproach and contumely, whereby to race out all good memory of his name and fame. In searching whereof he hath found out two things to lay against him. The one is, that he saith, he went about to assure himself of two Wives at once, one in Brabant, another in England. The second, that after his taking, all the while that he was not in utter despair of his Pardon, he was content to forswear his Doctrine, and letted not to disclose his brethren. For the answer whereof although there were no more to be said, yet this were enough to say, that Master More thus said of him, a man so blinded in the zeal of popery, so deadly set against the one side, and so partially affectionate unto the other, that in them whom he favoureth he can see nothing but all fair Roles and sweet Vernies in the other which he hateth, there is never a thing can please his phantasie, but all as black as pitch, vice, abomination, Heresie and folly, whatsoever they do, or intend to do. But as touching the defence of this Bayfield, as also of other more, I will defer the defence of them to a several Apology by it self, hereafter God willing, to be adjoynd.

John Tewkesbury Leather-seller of London, Martyr.

Mr. More a partial Judge in matters of Heresie.

John Tewkesbury was converted by the reading of Tindals Testament, and the wicked Mammam. He had the Bible written. In all points of Religion he openly did dispute in the Bishops Chapel in his Palace. Who in the Doctrine of Justification and all other Articles of his Faith was very expert, and prompt in his answers, in such sort as Tonstal and all his learned men were affamed, that a Leather-seller should so dispute with them, with such power of the Scriptures and heavenly wisdom, that they were not able to resist him. This disputation continued a sevennight. The procees of whole Examinations, Articles, and answers, here follow, as they are out of the Bishops Register extracted.

Lec.

On Wednesday the one and twentieth day of April, in the year of our Lord 1529. John Tewkesbury was brought into the Conlitory at London, before Cuthbert Bishop of London, and his assistants, Henry Bishop of Saint Asse, and John Abbas of Westminster. Unto whom the Bishop of London declared that he had at divers times exhorted him to recant the errors and Heresies which he held and defended, even as he did then again exhort him, not to trust too much to his own wit and learning, but unto the doctrine of the holy Mother the Church. Who made answer, that in his judgment he did not err from the Doctrine of the holy Mother the Church.

The examination of John Tewkesbury before
Thomas Bishop of London.

And at the last, being examined upon errors, which, they said, were in the said Book called the wicked Mammam, he answered thus : Take ye the Book and read it over, and I think in my Conscience, ye shall find no fault in it. And being asked by the said Bishop, whether he did rather give credit to his Book or to the Gospel, he answered that the Gospel is and ever hath been true. And moreover, being particularly examined what he thought of this Article, That the Jews of good intent and zeal slew Christ ; He answered, Look ye the Book through, before and after as it lieth, and ye shall find a better tale in it, than ye make of it ; and further thought, that who-soever translated the New Testament, and made the Book, meaning the wicked Mammam, he did it of good zeal, and by the Spirit of God.

Also being further asked, by the said Bishop of London, whether he would stand to the contents of his Book, he answered, Look ye the Book before and after, and I will be content to stand unto it. Then being examined, whether that all good works must be done without respect of any thing ; He answered, that a man should do good works for the love of God only, and for no hope of any reward higher nor lower in Heaven ; for if He should, it were presumption. Also being demanded, whether that Christ with all his works did not deserve Heaven, He answered and said, that it was plain enough. Which things being done, the Bishop said further to John Tewkesbury thus ; I tell thee before God and those which are here present, in examination of my Conscience, that the Articles above named, and many other more contained in the same Book are false, heretical, and condemned by the holy Church : how thinkest thou ? And further, the said Bishop of London said unto him again, I tell thee before God and those which are here present, &c. and so asked him again, what he thought of those Articles. And after many exhortations, he commanded him to answer determinately under pain of the Law, saying further unto him, that if he refused to answer, he must declare him an open and obstinate Heretic according to the order of the Law. Which things so done, the Bishop asked John Tewkesbury again, whether the said Book, called the wicked Mammam, were good ?

To which Interrogatory he answered, That he thinketh in his Conscience there is nothing in the Book but that which is true. And to this Article objected, that is, that Faith only justifieth without works, he answered, that it is well said. Whereunto the Bishop inferneth again, that the Articles before objected, with divers other contained in the Book called the wicked Mammam, were false, erroneous, damnable, and heretical, and reprov'd and condemned by the Church ; and before God, and all those that were present, for the discharge of his Conscience, he had often and very gently exhorted the said John Tewkesbury, that he would revoke and renounce his errors : otherwise if he did intend to persevere in them, he must declare him an Heretic, which he would be very sorry to do. These things thus done, the Bishop oftentimes offered him, that he should chuse what Spiritual or Temporal man he would to be his Counsellor, and gave him time as before to deliberate with himself until the next sitting.

Also in the same month of April, in the year of our Lord aforesaid, the Bishop of London Cuthbert Tonstal sitting in the Conlitory, with Nicholas of Ely, John of Lincoln, and John Bath and Wells, &c. This John Tewkesbury was brought before them. After certain Articles being repeated unto him, the Bishop of London brought before him a certain Book, called the wicked Mammam, asking him whether the Book was of the same Impression and making, as was his Books that he had sold to others ? Who answered and said, it was the same. Whereupon the Bishop of London asking him again, Whether the Book contained the same error or no ? Who answered again, saying, I pray God, that the condemnation of the Gospel, and translation of the Testament be not to your shame, and that you be not in peril for it : for the condemnation of it and of the other is all one. Further he said, that he had studied the holy Scripture by the space of these seventeen years, and as he may see the spots of his face through the glass, so in reading the New Testament, he knoweth the faults of his foul. Furthermore, he was examined upon certain Points and Articles, extracted out of the said Book of the wicked Mammam ; as followeth.

First, That Antichrist is not an outward thing, that is to say, a man that should suddenly appear with wonders, as your Forefathers talked of him, but Antichrist is a spiritual thing. Whereunto he answered and said, That he findeth no fault in it. Again, it was demanded of him of Antichrist, touching the Articles, whether Faith only justifieth a man. To this he said, that if he should look to deserve Heaven by works, he should do wickedly, for works follow Faith, and Christ redeemed us all with the merits of his passion.

That the Devil holdeth our hearts so hard, that it is impossible for us to consent unto Gods Law. To that he answered, that he findeth no fault in it.

That the Law of God sufficeth no merits, neither any man to be justified in the sight of God. To that he answered, that it is plain enough, considering what the Law is ; and he said, that he findeth no ill in it.

[KING] That the Law of God requireth of us things impossible. To that he answered, that the Law of God doth command, that thou shalt love God above all things, and thy Neighbour as thy self, which never man could do; and in that he doth find no fault in his Conscience.

That as the good tree bringeth forth fruit, so there is no Law put to him that believeth and is justified through Faith. To that he answered and said, he findeth no ill in it.

All good works must be done without respect of any thing, or any profit to be had thereof. To that he answered, it is truth.

Christ with all his works did not deserve Heaven. To that he answered, that the Text is true as it lieth, and he findeth no fault in it.

Peter and Paul, and Saints that be dead are not our friends, but their friends whom they did help when they were alive. To that he said, he findeth no ill in it.

Alms deserve no reward of God. To that he answered, that the Text of the Book is true.

The Devil is not cast out by merits of fasting or Prayer. To that he answered, thinking it good enough.

We cannot love except we see some benefit and kindness. As long as we live under the Law of God only, where we see but sin and damnation, and the wrath of GOD upon us, yea where we were damned afore we were born, we cannot love God, nor cannot but hate him as a Tyrant, unrighteous and unjust, and flee from him, as did Cain. To that he answered, and thinketh it good and plain enough.

We are Damned by nature, as a Tode is a Tode by nature, and a Serpent is a Serpent by nature. To that he answered, it is to be true as it is in the Book.

Item, As concerning the Article of fasting. To that he answered and said, the Book declareth it self.

Every one man is a Lord of whatsoever another man hath. To that he answered; what Law can be better than that? For it is plainly meant there.

Love in Christ putteth no difference betwixt one and another. To that he answered and said, it is plain enough of it self.

As concerning the preaching of the word of God and waiving of Diliges, there is no difference as concerning Salvation, and as touching the pleasing of God. To that he answered, saying, it is a plain Text, and as for pleasing God it is all one.

That the Jews of good intent and zeal put Christ to death. To that he answered, that it is true, and the Text is plain enough.

The Sects of Saint Francis, and Saint Dominick, and others be damnable. To that he answered and said Saint Paul repugneth against them. Which Articles being objected, and answer made unto them by John Tewkesbury, the said Bishop of London asked him whether he would continue in his Heresies and errors above rehearsed, or renounce and forsake them. Who answered thus, I pray you reform your self, and if there be any error in the Book, let it be reformed, I think the Book is good enough.

Further the Bishop exhorted him to recant his errors. To the which the said John Tewkesbury answered as is above written; to wit, I pray you reform your self, and if there be any error in the Book, let it be reformed, I think it is good enough. Which thing being done, the Bishop appointed him to determine better with himself against the morrow, in the presence of Master John Cox, Vicar general to the Archbishop of Canterbury, Master Gaufred Warton, Rowland Phillipp, William Philow, and Robert Ridley, professors of Divinity.

The thirteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord above said, in the Chappel within the Palace of London, before Cuthbert Bishop of London, with his assistants, Nicholas Bishop of Ely, &c. Tewkesbury again appeared, and was examined upon the Articles drawn out of the Book called the wicked Mammon, as followeth.

First, Christ is thine, and all his deeds be thy deeds; Christ is in thee, and thou lovest him inseparably, neither canst thou be Damned, except Christ be Damned with thee; neither canst thou be saved except Christ be saved with thee. To this he answered, that he found no fault in it.

Item, We desire one another to pray for us. That done, we must put our Neighbour in remembrance of his duty, and that we trust not in his Holiness. To this he answered, ed, Take ye it as ye will, I will take it well enough.

Item, Now test thou what Alms meaneth, and wherefore it serveth. He that seeketh with his Alms more than to be merciful, to be a Neighbour to succor his Brothers need, to do his duty to his Brother, to give his Brother that he ought him, the same is blind and seeth not Christs blood. Here he answereth, that he findeth no fault throughout all the Book, but that all the Book is good, and it hath given him great comfort and light to his Conscience.

Item, That ye do nothing to please God but that he commanded. To that he answereth, and thinketh it good, by his truth.

Item, So God is honoured on all fides, in that we count him righteous in all his Laws and Ordinances. And to worship him otherwise than so, it is idolatry. To that he answered, that it pleaseth him well.

The examination of these Articles being done, the Bishop of London did exhort the said John Tewkesbury to recant his errors above said; And after some other communication had by the Bishop with him, the said Bishop did exhort him again to recant his errors, and appointed him to determine with himself against the next Session what he would do.

IN the next Session he submitted himself, and abjured his opinions, and was enjoyed Penance, as followeth; which was the eighth of May.

Imprimis, That he should keep well his Abjuration, under pain of relapse.

Secondly, That the next Sunday following, in Pauls Church in the open Procession, he should carry a Fagot and stand at Pauls Crofs with the same.

That the Wednesday following he should carry the same Fagot about Newgate-Market and Cheapside.

That on Friday after he should take the same Fagot again at S. Peters Church in Cornhill, and carry it about the Market of Leden-hall.

That he should have two signs of Fagots embroidered; one on his left sleeve, and the other on his right sleeve; which he should wear all his life time unless he were otherwise dispensed withal.

That on Whitsunday Eve he should enter into the Monastery of S. Bartholomew in Smithfield, and there abide, and not come out unless he were released by the Bishop of London.

That he should not depart out of the City or Diocesis of London, without the special Licence of the Bishop or his successors. Which Penance he entered into the eighth day of May, An. 1529.

And thus much concerning his first examination, which was in the year 1529, at what time he was enforced through infirmity, as is before expressed, to retract and abjure his Doctrine. Notwithstanding, the same John Tewkesbury, afterward confirmed by the grace of God, and moved by the example of Bayfield above said, that was burned in Smithfield, did return and continually abide in the testimony of the truth, and suffered for the same. Who recovering more grace and better strength at the hand of the Lord, two years after being apprehended again, was brought before Six Tho. More, and the Bishop of London; where certain Articles were objected of him: The chief whereof we intend briefly to recite, for the matter is prolix.

Imprimis, That he confessed that he was baptised, and intended to keep the Catholick Faith.

Secondly, That he affirmeth, that the abjuration, Oath, and subscription that he made before Cuthbert, late Bishop of London, was done by compulsion.

Thirdly, That he had the Books of the obedience of a Christian man, and of the wicked Mammon, in his custody, and hath read them since his abjuration.

Fourthly, That he affirmeth that he suffered the two Fagots that were embroidered on his sleeve, to be taken from him, for that he deserved not to wear them.

Fifthly, He saith, that Faith only justifieth, which lacketh not charity.

Sixthly, He saith, that Christ is a sufficient Mediator for us, and therefore no prayer is to be made unto Saints. Whereupon they laid unto him this verse of the Aitheme: Salve Regina advocata nostras, &c. To the which he answered, That he knew none other Advocate but Christ alone.

Ed. Freefe
purgatory.

Seventhly, He affirmeth that there is no Purgatory after this life, but that Christ our Saviour is a sufficient purgatory for us.

Eighthly, He affirmeth, That the souls of the faithful, departing this life, rest with Christ.

Ninthly, He affirmeth, That a Priest, by receiving of Orders, receiveth more grace, if his Faith be increased, or else not.

Tenthly, And last of all, he believeth, that the Sacrament of the Flesh and Blood of Christ, is not the very body of Christ, in Flesh and Blood, as it was born of the Virgin Mary. Whereupon the Bishops Chancellor asked the said Tewkesbury, if he could shew any cause why he should not be taken for an Heretick, falling into his Heresie again, and receive the punishment of an Heretick. Whereunto he answered that he had wrong before, and if he be condemned now, he reckoneth that he hath wrong again.

Then the Chancellor caused the Articles to be read openly, with the answers unto the same; the which the said Tewkesbury confessed, and thereupon the Bishop pronounced sentence against him and delivered him unto the Sheriffs of London for the time being, which were Richard Greham and Edward Alam; who burned him in Smithfield upon Saint Thomas Eve, being the twentieth of December, in the year aforesaid, the tenor of whose sentence, pronounced against him by the Bishop, doth here ensue, word for word.

IN the Name of God, Amen. The deservings and circumstances of a certain cause of heretical gravity, and falling again thereunto by thee John Tewkesbury, of the Parish of Saint Michaels in the Queen, of the City of London, and of our Jurisdiction, appearing before us sitting in judgment, being heard, seen, and understood, and fully discussed by us John, by the sufferance of God, Bishop of London, because we do find by inquisition; manifestly enough, that thou dost abjure freely and voluntarily before us, late Bishop of London, thy Ordinary, divers and sundry Heresies, errors, and damnable opinions, contrary to the determination of our Mother Holy-Church, as well special as general, and that fallen and beside the foresaid abjuration thou art again fallen into the same damnable Heresies, opinions, and errors, (which is greatly to be lamented) and the same dost hold, affirm, and believe: we therefore John the Bishop aforesaid, the Name of God first being called upon, and the same only God yet before our eyes, and with the Counsel of learned men assisting us in this behalf (with whom in this cause we have communicated of our definitive sentence and final Decree, in this behalf to be done) do intend to proceed and do proceed in this manner. Because, as it is aforesaid, we do find thee, the foresaid John Tewkesbury of our jurisdiction, to be a contemner of the first abjuration, and moreover, before and after the foresaid first errors and other damnable opinions, to have fallen, and to be an Heretick fallen, and to have incurred the pain of such fallen Hereticks: we do pronounce, determine, declare and condemn thee of the premises, to have incurred the danger of the great Excommunication, and also do pronounce thee to be excommunicated, and also do declare thee the said Tewkesbury, so damnable fallen again into Heresie, to be in the secular power and in their judgment (as the holy Canons have decreed) and here we do leave thee to the foresaid secular power, and to their judgment; beseeching them earnestly in the bowels of Jesus Christ, that such severe punishment and execution, as in this behalf is to be done against thee, may be so moderated, that no rigorous rigor be used but to the health and salvation of thy soul, and to the terror fear, and rooting out of Hereticks, and their conversion to the Catholick Faith and Unity, by this our final Decree which we declare by these our writings.

Tewkesbury.

This foresaid sentence definitive against John Tewkesbury was read and pronounced by the Bishop of London, the sixteenth day of the month of December, the year aforesaid, in the house of Sir Thomas More high Chancellor of England in the Parish of Chelsey. After the which sentence, the Sheriffs received the foresaid Tewkesbury into their custody, and carried him away with them, and afterward buried him in Smithfield, as is aforesaid, having no Writ of the King for their Warrant.

The apprehension of one Edward Freefe a Painter.

Edward Freefe was born in York, and was Apprentise to a Painter in the same City, and by the reason of working for his Master in Bearfe Abbey, or by some such occasion, was known unto the Abbot of the same House, for he was a Boy of a pregnant wit, and the Abbot favoured him so much, that he bought his years of his Master, and would have made him a Monk. And he had not liking of that kind of living, and not knowing how to get out because he was a novice, ran away after a long space, and came to Colchester in Essex, and remaining there according to his former vocation, was married and lived like an honest man. After he had been there a good time, he was hired to paint certain cloths for the new Inn in Colchester, which is in the middle of the Market place, and in the upper border of the cloths he wrote certain sentences of Scripture, and by that he was plainly known to be one of them which they call Hereticks.

And on a time he being at his work in the same Inn, they of the Town, when they had seen his work, went about to take him; and he having some inkling thereof, thought to shift for himself, but yet was taken forcibly in the Yard of the same Inn, and after this he was brought to London, and so to Fulham, to the Bishops House, where he was cruelly imprisoned, with certain others of Essex, that is to wit, one John and his Wife, Wyke, and his Wife, and his Son, and Father Bate of Rowledge. They were fed with fine Manchester made of law-dust, or at the least a great part thereof, and were so straitly kept, that there wives and their friends could not come to them. After the Painter had been there a long space, by much suite he was removed to Lallards Tower. His Wife, in the time of the suite, whiles he was yet at Fulham, being desirous to see her husband, and pressing to come in at the Gate, being then bigg with Child, the Porter lift up his foot and struck her on the belly, that a length the child of the same, but the Child was destroyed immediately.

After that, they were all flocked for a long time, and then they were let loose in their Prisons again. Some had Horflocks on their legs, and some had other Irons. This Painter would ever be writing on the Walls with chalk or a coal, and in one place he wrote, Doctor Dredpoll would make me believe the Moon were made of Green-cheese. And because he would be writing many things, he was manacled by the Wrists, so long till the flesh of his Arms was grown higher than his Irons. By the means of his manacles he could not Comb his head, and he remained so long manacled, that his Hair was folded together.

After the death of his Wife, his Brother sued to the King for him, and after long suite he was brought out in the Confilary at Pauls, and (as his Brother did report) they kept him three days without meat before he came to his answer. Then, what by the long imprisonment and much evil handling, and for lack of sustenance, the man was in that case, that he could say nothing, but look and gaze upon the people like a wild man, and if they asked him a question, he could say nothing, but my Lord is a good man. And thus, when they had spoiled his body, and destroyed his wits, they sent him back again to Bearfe Abby; but he came away again from thence, and would not tarry amongst them: Albeit he never came to his perfect mind, to his dying day.

His Brother, of whom I before spake, whose name was Valentine Freefe and his Wife, gave their lives at one stake in York, by the testimony of Jesus Christ.

Also the Wife of the said Father Bate, while he was at Fulham, made many supplications to the King with out redress, and at the last delivered one to his own hands, and he read it himself, whereupon she was appointed to go into Chancery Lane, to one, whose name (as is thought) was master Selyard, and at last she got a Letter of the said Selyard to the Bishop, and when she had it, she thought all her suite well bestowed, hoping that some good should come to her husband thereby. And because the wicked Officers in those days were cruel, and desirous of KING of his blood, as some others had proved their practice, some of her friends would needs fee the contents of her Letter, and not suffer her to deliver it to the Bishop: and as they thought, so they found indeed: for it was after this manner.

A costly Letter of a wicked Office. After commendations had, &c. Look what you can gather against Father Bate, send me word by your truly friend, Sir William Saxie, that I may certify the Kings Majesty, &c. Thus the poor woman, when she thought her fate had been done, was in less hope of her Husbands life than before. But within short space it pleased God to deliver him: for he got out in a dark night, and so he was caught no more, but died within a short time after.

Roy burned in Portugal. In this year also, as we do understand by divers notes of old Registers and otherwise, Frier Roy was burned in Portugal, but what his examination, or Articles, or order of his death was, we can have no understanding: but what his Doctrine was, it may be easily judged by the testimonies, which he here left in England.

The Bishop commanded by the King to set forth a new Translation of the new Testament. In the beginning of this year which we are now about, through the complaint of the Clergy made to the King, the Translation of the New Testament, with a great number of other Books, were forbidden. For the Bishops coming into the Star-Chamber the five and twentieth day of May, and coming with the Kings Council, after many pretences and long debating, alleged that the Translation of Tindal and Lye were not truly Translated, and moreover, that in them were Prologues and Prefaces, that smelled of Heresie, and railed against the Bishops: wherefore all such Books were prohibited, and commandment given by the King to the Bishops, that they, calling to them the best learned mean of the Universities, should cause a new Translation to be made, so that the people might not be ignorant in the Law of God. Notwithstanding this commandment, the Bishops did nothing at all, to the setting forth of any new Translation, which caused the people much to study Tindals Translation, by reason whereof many things came to light, as ye shall hereafter hear.

The Translation of the New Testament inhibited by the Bishops. This year also, in the month of May, the Bishop of London caused all the new Testaments of Tindals Translation, and many other Books which he had bought, to be brought unto Pauls Church-yard, and there openly to be burned.

James Bainham, Lawyer and Martyr.

James Bainham Gentleman, son to one Master Bainham a Knight of Gloucestershire, being virtuously brought up by his Parents, in the studies of good Letters, had knowledge both of the Latin and the Greek tongue. After that he gave himself to the study of the Law, being a man of virtuous disposition, and godly conversation, mightily addicted to Prayer, an earnest reader of Scriptures, a great maintainer of the godly, a visiter of the Prisoners, liberal to Scholars, very merciful to his Clients, using equity and justice to the poor, very diligent in giving Counsel to all the needy, Widows, Fatherless and afflicted, without money or reward, briefly a singular example to all Lawyers.

This Master Bainham, as is above noted, married the Wife of Simon Fish aforesaid, for the which he was the more suspected, and at last was accused to Sir Thomas More Chancellor of England, and arrested with a Sergeant at Arms, and carried out of the middle Temple to the Chancellors house at Chelsey, where he continued in free Prison a while, till the time that Sir Thomas More saw he could not prevail in perverting of him to his Sect. Then he call him into prison in his own house, and whipping him at the Tree in his Garden, called the Tree of Truth, and after sent him to the Tower to be wracked, and so he was, Sir Thomas More being present himself, till in a manner he had lamed him, because he would not accuse the Gentlemen of the Temple of his acquaintance, nor would they where his Books lay; and because his Wife denied them to be at his House, she was sent to the Fleet, and their goods confiscated.

After they had thus practised against him what they could by tortures and torments, then was he brought before John Stokesley, Bishop of London, the fifteenth day of December Anno, 1531, in the said Town of Chelsey, and there examined upon these Articles and Interrogatories ensuing.

First, whether he believed there were any Purgatory of Interrogatories souls hence departed.

Whereunto he made answer as followeth: If we walk in light, even as he is in light, we have Society together with him, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son hath cleansed us from all sin. If we say we have no sin, we deceive our selves, and the truth is not in us: If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just, and will forgive us our sins, and will purge us from all our iniquities.

2. Secondly, Whether that the Saints hence departed are to be honoured and prayed unto, to pray for us.

To the which he answered on this wise: My little children, I write this unto you, that you sin not. If any man do sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Just, and he is the propitiation for our sins also for the sin of the whole World. And further upon occasion of these words, Omnes sancti Dei orate pro nobis. Being demanded what he meant by these words, Omnes sancti, he answered, That he meant them by those that were alive, as Saint Paul did by the Corinthians, and not by those that be dead: for he prayed not to them, he said, because he thought that they which be dead cannot pray for him. Item, when the whole Church is gathered together, they use to pray one for another, or desire one to pray for another, with one heart: and that the Will of the Lord may be fulfilled, and not ours: and I pray, said he, as our Saviour Christ prayed at his last hour; Father, take this Cup from me if it be possible, yet thy Will be fulfilled.

3. Thirdly, He was demanded whether he thought that any souls departed were yet in Heaven pained, or no.

To this he answered and said, That he believed that they be there as it pleased God to have them, that is to say, in the Faith of Abraham, and that herein he would commit himself to the Church.

4. Fourthly, It was demanded of him, whether he thought it necessary to Salvation, for a man to confess his sins to a Priest.

Whereunto his answer was this, That it was lawful for one to confess and acknowledge his sins to another. As for any other confession he knew none. And further he said, that if he came to the Sermon, or any other where, whereas the Word of God is preached, and there take repentance for his sin, he believed his sins forthwith to be forgiven of God, and that he needed not to go to any confession.

5. Fifthly, That he should say and affirm, that the truth of the holy Scripture hath been hid, and appeared not these 800 years, neither was known before now.

To this he said, That he meant no otherwise, but that the truth of holy Scripture was never, these eight hundred years past, so plainly and expressly declared unto the people, as it hath been within these few years.

6. He was demanded further, for what cause holy Scripture hath been better declared within these six years, than it hath been these 800 years before.

Whereunto he answered, To say plainly, he knew no man to have preached the Word of God sincerely and purely, and after the vain of Scripture, except Master Crome and Master Latimer, and said moreover, that the New Testament now Translated into English, doth preach and teach the word of God, and that before that time men did preach but only that folks should believe as the Church did believe, and then if the Church erred, men should err too. Howbeit the Church, said he, of Christ cannot err: and that there were two Churches, that is, the Church of Christ militant, and the Church of Antichrist, and that this Church of Antichrist may and doth err, but the Church of Christ doth not.

7. Seventhly, Whether he knew any person that dyed in the true Faith of Christ, since the Apostles time.

Answer. He said, He knew Bayfield, and thought that he dyed in the true Faith of Christ.

Answer. Purgatory.

8. Eighthly, He was asked what he thought of Purgatory.

He answered, If any such thing had been moved to Saint Paul of Purgatory after this life, he thought Saint Paul would have condemned it for an Heresie. And when he heard Master Crome preach and say, that he thought there was Purgatory after this life, he thought in his mind that the said Master Crome lied, and spake against his Conscience; and that there were an hundred more, which thought the same as he did: saying moreover, that he had seen the confession of Master Crome in Print, God was a very foolish thing, as he judged.

And as concerning Vows, he granted that there were lawful Vows, as Annias vowed, Acts 5. for it was in his own power, whether he would have sold his possession or not, and therefore he did offend. But Vows of Chastity, and all godliness is given of God by his abundant grace, the which no man of himself can keep, but it must be given him of God. And therefore a Monk, Friar, or Nun, that have vowed the vows of Religion, if they think after their vows made, that they cannot keep their promises that they made at Baptism, they may go forth and Marry, so that they keep, after their Marriage, the promise that they made at Baptism. And finally, he concluded, that he thought there were no other vows, but only the vow of Baptism.

9. Ninthly, He was demanded, whether Luther being a Friar, and taking a Nun out of Religion, and afterward marrying her, did well or no, and what he thought therein.

Answer. He answered, That he thought nothing. And when they asked him, whether it was lechery or no. He made answer, he could not say so.

As concerning the Sacrament of Amelung, being willed to say his mind.

Answer. He answered and said, It was but a ceremony, neither did he wot what a man should be the better for such annoying and anointing. The best was, that some good prayers be said to that effect.

Likewise, touching the Sacrament of Baptism, his words were these,

Answer. That as many as repent, and do on them Christ, shall be saved: that is, as many as dye concerning sin, shall live by Faith with Christ. Therefore it is not we that live after that, but Christ in us. And so whether we live or dye, we are Gods by adoption, and not by the water only, but by water and faith: That is, by keeping the promise made. For ye are kept by Grace and Faith, saith Saint Paul, and that not of your selves, for it is the gift of God.

He was asked moreover of Matrimony, whether it was a Sacrament or not, and whether it conferreth Grace, being commanded in the old Law, and not yet taken away.

Answer. His answer was, That Matrimony is an order or Law, that the Church of Christ hath made and ordained, by the which men may take to them women and not sin.

Answer. Lastly, For his Books of Scripture, and for his judgment of Tindal, because he was urged to confesse the truth, he said, That he had the New Testament translated into the English tongue by Tindal within this month, and thought he offended not God in using and keeping the same, notwithstanding that he knew the Kings Proclamation to the contrary, and that it was prohibited in the name of the Church at Pauls Cross. But for all that he thought the Word of God had not forbid it: confessing moreover, that he had in his keeping within this month these Books; The wicked Mammon, The Obedience of a Christian man, The Practice of Prelates, The Answer of Tindal to Thomas More's Dialogues, The Book of Fifth against Purgatory, The Epistle of George Ge, alias George Geik: adding furthermore, that in all these Books he never saw any errors. And if there were any such in them, then if they were corrected, it were good that the people had the said Books. And as concerning the new Testament in English, he thought it utterly good, and that the people should have it as it is. Neither did he ever know (said he) that Tindal was a naughty fellow. And to these answers he subscribed his name. This examination (as is said) was the fifteenth day of December.

The next day following, which was the sixteenth day of December, the said James Bainham appeared again before the Bishop of London, in the foresaid place of Sir Thomas More at Chelsey, where, after the guile and form of their proceedings, first his former Articles with his Answers were again repeated, and his hand brought forth. Which done, they asked him whether he would persist in that which he had said, or else would return to the Catholick Church, from whence he was fallen, and to the which he might be yet received, as they said: adding moreover many fair inticing and alluring words, that he would reconcile himself, saying, the time was yet that he might be received; the bosom of his Mother was open for him. Otherwise, if he would continue stubborn, there was no remedy.

Now was the time either to save, or else utterly to cast himself away. Which of these ways he would take, the case present now required a present answer, for else the sentence definitive was ready there to be read &c.

To conclude long matter in few words: Bainham was in a doubtful perplexity, between life on the one hand, and death on the other, at length giving over to the Adversaries, gave answer unto them that he was contented to submit himself in those things wherein he had offended, excusing that he was deceived by ignorance. Then the Bishop requiring him to say his mind plainly of his answers above declared, demanded what he thought thereof, whether they were true or no.

To this Bainham said, that it was too high for him to judge. And then being asked of the Bishop, whether there was any Purgatory; He answered and said, he could not believe that there was any Purgatory after this life.

Upon other Articles being examined and demanded, he granted as followeth; that he could not judge whether Bayfield dyed in the true Faith of Christ or no. That a man making a vow, cannot break it without deadly sin. That a Priest promising to live chaste, may not marry a Wife. That he thinketh the Apostles to be in Heaven. That Luther did naught in marrying a Nun. That a child is the better for confirmation. That it is an offence to God, if any man keep Books prohibited by the Church, the Pope, the Bishop, or the King: and said, That he pondered those points more now than he did before, &c.

Upon these answers, the Bishop thinging to keep him in safe custody, to further Tryal, committed him to one of the Counters.

The time thus passing on, which bringeth all things to their end, in the month of February next following, in the year of our Lord, 1532, the foresaid James Bainham called for again to the Bishops Consistory, before his Vicar General and other his assistants: To whom Foxford, the Bishops Chancellor recited a new Articles and Answers above mentioned; protesting That he intended not to receive him to the unity of the holy Mother Church, unless he knew the said Bainham to be returned again purely and unfeignedly to the Catholick Faith, and to submit himself penitently to the judgment of the Church. To whom Bainham spake to this effect, saying, That he hath, and doth believe the holy Church, and holdeth the Faith of the Holy Mother the Catholick Church.

Wherefore the Chancellor offering to him a Bill of his abjuration, after the form of the Popes Church conceived, required him to read it. Who was contented; and read to the clause of the abjuration, containing these words; I voluntarily, as a true penitent person returned from my Heresies, utterly abjure, &c. And there he stayed and would read no further, saying, that {KING, that he knew not the Articles contained in his Abjuration to be Heretic, therefore he could not see why he should refuse them. Which done, the Chancellor proceeded to the reading of the sentence definitive, coming to this place of the sentence; The Doctrine and determination of the Church, &c. and there paused, saying, He would reserve the rest till he saw his time. Whom then Bainham desired to be good unto him, affirming that he did acknowledge that there was a Purgatory; that the Souls of the Apostles were in Heaven, &c. Then Began he again to read the sentence: but Bainham again desired him to be good to him. Whereupon he ceased the sentence, and said that he would accept this his confession for that time as sufficient.

Bainham again brought to the Confessory. Bainham took to abjure.

So Bainham for that present was returned to his Prison again. Who then the fifth day after, which was the eighth day of February, appeared, as before, in the Confessory. Whom the foresaid Chancellor repeating again his Articles and Answers, asked if he would abjure and submit himself. Who answered, That he would submit himself as a good Christian Man should. Again, the Chancellor the second time asked if he would Abjure. I will (said he) forsake all my Articles, and will meddle no more with them; and so being commanded to lay his hand upon the Book, read his Abjuration openly. After the reading whereof, he burst out into these words, saying, That because there were many words in the said Abjuration, which he thought obscure and difficile, he protested that by his Oath he intended not to go from such defence, which he might have had before his Oath. Which done, the Chancellor asked him why he made that protestation. Bainham said, For fear, lest any Man of ill will do accuse me hereafter. Then the Chancellor taking the definitive sentence in his hand, disposing himself (as appeared) to read the same; Well Master Bainham, said he, take your Oath, and kiss the Book, or else I will do mine office against you: and so immediately he took the Book in his hand and kissed it, and subscribed the same with his hand.

Which done, the Chancellor receiving the Abjuration at his hand put him to his Fine, first to pay twenty pounds to the King. After that, he enjoined him Penance, to go before the Cross in Procession at Pauls, and to stand before the Preacher during the Sermon at Paul's-Cross, with a Fagot upon his Shoulder, the next Sunday, and so to return with the Sumner to the Prison again, there to abide the Bishops determination: and so the seventeenth day of February he was released and dismissed home. Where Bainham enjoyed Penance. Bainham dissatisfied out of Prison.

James Bainham enjoined penance.

Repentance of Bainham after his fall. he had scarce a month continued, but he bewailed his Fact and Abjuration, and was never quiet in his Mind and Conscience until the time he had uttered his fall to all his acquaintance, and asked God and all the World forgiveness before the Congregation in those days, in a Water-house in Bow-lane: and immediately the next Sunday after he came to St. Austins, with the New Testament in his hand in English, and the Obedience of a Christian man in his bosom, and stood up there before the people in his Pew, there declaring openly with weeping tears, that he had denied God, and prayed all the people to forgive him, and to beware of his weakness, and not to do as he did: for (said he) if I should not return again unto the Truth (having the New Testament in his hand) this Word of God would damn me both Body and Soul at the Day of Judgment. And there he prayed every body rather to die by and by, than to do as he did: for he would not feel such an Hell again as he did feel, for all the Worlds good. Besides this, he wrote also certain Letters to the Bishop, to his Brother, and to others; so that shortly after he was apprehended, and so committed to the Tower of London.

Bainham again appeared, headed and sent into the Tower.

The Process against James Bainham in case of relapse.

THE nineteenth day of April, 1532, Master Richard Fosford, Vicar General to the Bishop of London, accompanied with certain Divines, and Matthew Gresford the Register, sitting judicially, James Bainham was brought before him by the Lieutenant of the Tower; before whom the Vicar-General rehearsed the Articles contained in his Abjuration before made, and shewed him a bound Book, which the said Bainham acknowledged to be his own writing, saying, That it was good. Then he shewed him more of a certain Letter sent unto the Bishop of London, the which also he acknowledged to be his: objecting also to the said Bainham, that he had made and read the Abjuration which he had before recited: shewing him moreover certain Letters which he had written unto his Brother, the which he confessed to be his own writing; saying moreover, That though he wrote it, yet there is one thing in the same that is naught, if it be as my Lord Chancellor faith. Then he asked of Bainham, how

How he understood this which followeth, which was in his Letters: Yet could they not see nor know him for God, when indeed he was both God and Man, yea, he was Three Persons in one, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; and Bainham said it was naught. Which things thus done, there was further objected unto him these words: That he had as leue pray to Joan his Wife, as to our Lady. The which Article Bainham denied. The said Bainham amongst other talk, as touching the Sacrament of the Altar, said, Christs Body is not chewed with Teeth, but received by Faith. Further it was objected against him, That notwithstanding his Abjuration, he had said, that the Sacrament of the Altar was but a mystical or memorial Body: the which Article Bainham denied. It was further laid unto him, that he should say, That St. Thomas of Canterbury was a Thief and a Murderer, and a Devil in Hell. Whereunto he answered thus: That St. Thomas of Canterbury was a Murderer, and if he did not repent him of his Murther, he was rather a Devil in Hell, than a Saint in Heaven.

Another
appearance.

The twentieth day of April, in the year aforesaid, the said James Bainham was brought before the Vicar-General, in the Church of All Saints, of Barking, whereas he ministred these Interrogatories unto him.

First, That since the Feast of Easter last past, he had said, affirmed, and believed, That the Sacrament of the Altar was but a mystical Body of Christ; and afterward he said, It was but a memorial. The which Article Bainham denied. Then the Vicar-General declared unto him, that our holy Mother the Catholick Church determineth and teacheth in this manner: That in the Sacrament of the Altar, after the words of Consecration, there remaineth no Bread. The Official asked Bainham, whether he did believe or not? Whereunto Bainham answered, saying, That St. Paul calleth it Bread, rehearsing these words; Quotiescunque comederitis panem hunc, & de poculo bibetis, mortem Domini annuntiabitis. And in that point he faith as St. Paul faith, and believeth as the Church believeth. And being demanded twice afterward what he thought therein, he would give no other answer.

The which Key is the same Scripture that is preached, and the Pope hath no other power to bind and to loose, but by the Key of the Scripture.

James Bainham.

The fix and twentieth day of April, in the year aforesaid, before Master John Foxford, Vicar-General of the Bishop of London, in the presence of Matthew Greston, Register, and Nicholas Wilson and William Philley, professors of Divinity, John Oliver, William Middleton, and Hugh Apprise, Doctors of the Law, M. Richard Gresham Sheriff of London, and a great company of others, James Bainham was brought forth by the Lieutenant of the Tower, in whose presence the Vicar-General rehearsed the merits of the cause of Inquisition of Heresy against him, and proceeded to the reading of the Abjuration. And when the Judge read this Article following, contained in the Abjuration: Item, That I have said, That I will not determine whether any Souls departed be in Heaven or no, but I believe that they be there as it pleaseth God to have them; that is to say, in the Faith of Abraham: and I wote not whether the Souls of the Apostles or any other be in Heaven or no. To this James answered, That I did Abjure, and if that had not been, I would not have Abjured at all.

The Sacrament of Baptism.

After all the Articles were read contained in the Abjuration, and certain talk had as touching the Sacrament of Baptism, the said James Bainham spake these words: If a Turk, a Jew, or a Saracen do trust in God, and keep his Law, he is a good Christian Man. Then the Official shewed unto him the Letters which he sent unto his Brother, written with his own hand, and asked him what he thought as touching this Clause following: Yet could they not see and know him from God, when indeed he was both God and Man, yea, he was three Persons in one, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Whereunto Bainham said, That it was naught, and that he did it by ignorance, and did not over-see his Letters. Then Master Nicholas Wilson amongst other talk, as touching the Sacrament of the Altar, declared unto him, That the Church did believe the very Body of Christ to be in the Sacrament of the Altar. Bainham answered, The Bread is not Jesus Christ, for Christs Body is not chewed with Teeth, therefore it is but Bread. Being further demanded whether in the Sacrament of the Altar is the very Body of Christ, God and Man in Flesh and Blood; after divers doubtful answers, Bainham answered thus: He is there very God and Man in form of Bread.

The Sacrament of the Altar.

This done, the Official declared unto him the Depositions of the Witnesses which were come in against him, and objected unto him, that a little before Easter, he had Abjured all Heresies, as well particularly as generally. Then the said Vicar-General, after he had taken deliberation and advice with the learned his Affiliants, did proceed to the reading of the definitive sentence against him, and also published the same in writing: whereby amongst other things, besides his Abjuration, he pronounced and condemned him as a relapsed Heretic, damnably fallen into sundry Heresies, and so to be left unto the Secular Power; that is to say, to one of the Sheriffs being there present. After the pronouncing of which sentence, Master Nicholas Wilson counselled and admonished the said James, That he would conform himself unto the Church. To whom he answered, That he trusted that he is the very Child of God; which ye blind Asses, said he, do not perceive. And last of all, departing from his Judgment, he spake these words: Master Wilson, nor you my Lord Chancellor shall not prove by Scripture, that there is any Purgatory. Then the sentence of condemnation was given against him, the which here to repeat word for word is not necessary, forasmuch as the tenor thereof is all one with that which passed before in the story of Bayfield, alias Somerham. Here also should ensue the Letter of the Bishop of London, directed unto the Mayor and Sheriffs of the same City, for the receiving of him into their power, and the putting of him to death, the tenor whereof is also of like effect to that before-written in the story of Bayfield. After this sentence given, James Bainham was delivered into the hands of Sir Richard Gresham Sheriff, then being present, who caused him by his Officers to be carried unto Newgate, and the said James Bainham was burned in Smithfield the last day of April, in the year aforesaid, at three of the Clock at afternoon.

This Master Bainham, during his Imprisonment, was very cruelly handled. For almost the space of a fortnight he lay in the Bishops Cole-house in the Stocks, with Irons upon his Legs. Then he was carried to the Lord Chancellors, and there chained to a Post two nights. Then he was carried to Fulham, where he was cruelly handled by the space of a fortnight. Then to the Tower, where he lay a fortnight, scourged with Whips, to make him revoke his Opinions. From thence he was carried to Barking, then to Chelsey, and there condemned, and so to Newgate to be burned.

These words spake he in the midst of the flaming fire, when his Legs and Arms, as I said, were half consumed.

IN the same year of our Lord 1532, there was an Idol named the Rood of Dover-Court, whereunto was much and great resort of People. For at that time there was a great rumour blown abroad amongst the ignorant sort, That the power of the Idol of Dover-Court was so great, that no Man had power to shut the Church-door where he stood, and therefore they let the Church-door both Night and Day, continually stand open, for the more credit unto their blind rumor. Which once being conceived in the heads of the vulgar sort, seemed a great marvel unto many Men; but to many again, whom God had blessed with his Spirit, was greatly suspected, especially unto these, whose names here follow: as Robert King of Dedham, Robert Debnam of Eastbergholt, Nicholas Marshe of Dedham, and Robert Gardiner of Dedham, whose Consciences were sore burdened to see the Honour and Power of the Almighty-Living God so to be blasphemed by such an Idol. Wherefore they were moved by the Spirit of God, to travel out of Dedham in a wondrous goodly Night, both hard Frost and fair Moonshine, although the Night before and the Night after were exceeding foul and rainy. It was from the Town of Dedham, to the place where the filthy Rood stood, Ten Miles. Notwithstanding, they were so willing in that their enterprise, that they went these Ten Miles without pain, and found the Church-door open according to the blind talk of the ignorant People: for there durst no ungodly body shut it. Which happened well for their purpose; for they found the Idol which had as much power to keep the Door shut as to keep it open. And for proof thereof, they took the Idol from his Shrine, and carried him a quarter of a Mile from the place where he stood, without any resistance of the said Idol. Whereupon they strook Fire with a Flint-stone, and suddenly set him on Fire, who burned out so brim, that he lighted them homeward one good Mile of the Ten.

This done, there went a great talk abroad that they should have great Riches in that place: but it was very untrue; for it was not their thought or enterprise, as they themselves afterward confessed, for there was nothing taken away but his Coat, his Shoes, and Tapers. The Tapers did help to burn him, the Shoes they had again, and the Coat one Sir Thomas Roke did burn, but they had neither Penny, half-Penny, Gold, Groas, nor Jewel.

Notwithstanding three of them were afterward indicted of Felony, and hanged in Chains within half a year after, or thereabout. Robert King was hanged in Dedham at Burchet; Debnam was hanged at Cateaway-Cawsey; Nicholas Marshe was hanged at Dover-Court. Which three persons, through the Spirit of God at their death, did more edifie the People in godly learning, than all the Sermons that had been preached there a long time before.

The fourth Man of this company, named Robert Gardiner, escaped their hands and fled. Albeit he was cruelly sought for to have had the like death. But the living Lord preserved him to whom be all honour and glory, World without end.

The same year, and the year before, there were many Images cast down and destroyed in many places: as the Image of the Crucifix in the Highway by Cogshall, the Image of St. Petronil in the Church of great Horkesleigh, the Image of St. Christopher by Sudbury, and another Image of St. Petronil in a Chappel of Ipswich.

Allo John Seward of Dedham overthrew the Crofs in Stoke-Park, and took two Images out of a Chappel in the same Park, and cast them into the Water.

The Story, Examination, Death, and Martyrdom of John Frith.

AMONGST all other chances lamentable, there hath been none a long time which seemed unto me more grievous, than the lamentable death and cruel handling of John Frith, so learned and excellent a young Man, which had so profited in all kind of learning and knowledge, that scarcely there was his equal amongst all his companions: and besides, withal had such a godliness of life joyed with his Doctrine, that it was hard to judge in whether of them he was more commendable, being greatly praiseworthy in them both. But as touching his Doctrine by the Grace of Christ we will speak hereafter. Of the great godliness which was in him this may serve for experiment sufficient, for that notwithstanding his other manifold and singular Gifts and Ornaments of the mind in him most pregnant, wherewithal he might have opened an ease way unto Honour and Dignity, notwithstanding he chose rather wholly to consecrate himself unto the Church of Christ, excellently shewing forth and practising in himself the Precept so highly commended of the Philosophers, touching the life of Man; which life they say is given unto us, in such sort, that how much the better the Man is, so much the less he should live unto himself, but unto other, serving for the common utility, and that we should think a great part of our birth to be due unto our Parents, a greater part unto our Country, and the greatest part of all to be bestowed upon the Church, if we will be counted good Men. First of all he began his study at Cambridge. In whom Nature had planted, being but a Child, marvellous inclinations and love unto learning, whereunto he was addicted. He had also a wonderful promptness of wit, and a ready capacity to receive and understand any thing, inasmuch that he seemed not to be sent unto learning, but also born for the same purpose. Neither was there any diligence wanting in him, equal unto that towardsness, or worthy of his disposition. Whereby it came to pass, that he was not only a lover of Learning; but also became an exquisite learned Man. In the which exercise when he had diligently laboured certain years, not without great profit both of Latin and Greek, at the last he fell into knowledge and acquaintance with William Tyndal, through whose instructions he first received into his heart the Seed of the Gospel and sincere godliness.

At that time Thomas Wolsey, Cardinal of York prepared to build a College in Oxford, a marvellous sumptuous, which had the name and title of Bridge-Poole, but now named Christ Church, not so much (as it is thought): for the love and zeal that he bare unto learning, as for an ambitious desire of glory and renown, and to leave a perpetual name unto the posterity. But that building, he being cut off by the stroke of death (for he was sent forth unto the King, accused of certain crimes, and in the way by immoderate punishments killed himself) left partly begun, partly half ended, and unperfected, and nothing else save only the Kitchen was fully finished. Whereupon Rodolphus Gualterus, a learned Man, being then in Oxford, and beholding the College, said these words in Latin: Egregium opus, Cardinalis iste instituit collegium, & absolvit partem. How large and ample those Buildings should have been, what sumptuous cost should have been bestowed upon the same, may easily be perceived by that which is already builded, as the Kitchen, the Hall, and certain Chambers; whereas there is such curious Graving and Workmanship of Stone-cutters, that all things on every side did glitter for the excellency of the Workmanship, for the fineness of the matter, with the gilt Anticks and Embellishments, inasmuch that if all the rest had been finished to that determinate end as it was begun, it might well have excelled not only all Colleges of Students, but also Palaces of Princes. This ambitious Cardinal gathered together into that College whatsoever excellent thing there was in the whole Realm, either Vestments, Vessels, or other Ornaments, beside provision of all kind of precious things. Besides that, he also appointed unto that company all such Men as were found to excel in any kind of learning and knowledge. Whose names to recite all
